JEWISH LIFE IN CENTRAL EUROPE.

It is admitted on all hands that the Jews are one of the most remarkable people on earth. They are as identified with the preservation and propagation of a purer morality and more rational notions on religion than were ever entertained by any heathenish people—as the ancient Greeks were with the progress of science in general, and the Romans with the development of jurisprudence. It was reserved to modern times to bring portions of the Jews prominently forward in another region. They have assumed a political and social significence which is said to exercise a considerable influence on the fate of Central Europe. In the countries which we are wont to consider the seats of learning, they have generally ranged themselves with the progressive party; and how far they interested themselves in the recent continental struggles for popular rights is abundantly clear. The greater part of the German press is said to be in their hands.

The appearance of this population in a political character must be considered as an extraordinary phenomenon; for not only do they not appear, by their past history, to have been destined for such a part, but they were, two generations ago, avowedly so far behind what is regarded as European learning, that few of them were able to write the language of their country. It may therefore not be uninteresting to give a sketch of Jewish life as it was a score of years ago, in those districts of Central Europe, where the Jewish settlements are most ancient; where the Jews have been for centuries objects of a special legislation; and where, consequently, their peculiarities had ample time to develop themselves, and strongly to impress their character upon all the relations of life. A reflecting reader will perhaps be able to trace the lineaments of the present conduct of that section of Jews in their outbursts of wild fervor and enthusiasm—in their extraordinary versatility of mind—in their peculiar training—and, lastly, in the cruel oppression and deep degradation to which they were subject for centuries, and which will be depicted in as far as they enter into the plan of these pages. The humane will no doubt be gratified to learn that this oppression has, in consequence of the recent revolutions throughout Germany—Bavaria excepted—been succeeded by the full emancipation of this ill-treated race.

We propose that our sketch shall to some extent consist of a review of the life and social relations of an individual male Jew; and first of his entrance into the world.

Birth.—The rational anxiety for the safety of the mother being removed by the birth of a babe, (whom we will suppose to be a boy,) an irrational one for the life of the offspring quickly takes possession of the parental heart. The family are haunted with the dread lest the Mureth (cursed ones) might use, or rather abuse, the power supposed to be possessed by them over male infants during the period which elapses between their birth and admission into the Abrahamic covenant, (Gen. 17: 12,) by either carrying it off and substituting for it a misshapen deaf and dumb idiot, a changeling, a kind of Caliban.

It would be a mistake to fancy these "cursed ones" as evil spirits, delighting by nature in mischief, like the tribe of hobgoblins. They are human beings to every intent and purpose—unlucky wights, high and low, young and old, married and single, Jew and Gentile, who, in an unguarded moment, have fallen under the dominion of the ruthless Lilith, (Isia. 34: 14,) whose cruel behests they must implicitly execute whatever their reluctance. At the bidding of the superior, the "cursed one" must leave her nightly couch with the view of clandestinely introducing herself into the room of the babe, which is generally that of the mother. For this purpose the evil messenger is endowed with the power of assuming the form of various animals; the favorite shape under which she generally makes her apperance being that of a black cat.

The most dangerous period for the infant, when Lilith is most intent upon its destruction, is the seventh night after its birth; for this reason the babe is watched during that night with the greatest anxiety, and by the side of the mother lies a carving knife, ready to be used for the defense of her offspring. Woe to the cat which would, during that time, approach the infant! The dangerous weapon would certainly be flung at it; not with the view of killing, but rather with the design of releasing it from its thraldom; for, according to the popular superstition, on the slightest injury being inflicted, Lilith loses her hold on the metamorphosed human being, and in a twinkling of an eye, like the monster in "Beauty and the Beast," she assumes her former shape, never more to change it for any other. An attempt is also made to keep the enemy "at arm's length," by fastening on the walls of the room contigious to that of the babe various scraps of paper curiously incribed with cabalistical signs or charms. These, we make no doubt, inspire the fiend with a most wholesome dread, as in every instance which has come to our knowledge they proved perfectly successful.

The Abrahamic Covenant.—The rite of admission into the Jewish body is considered as a most sacred act, and is supposed to be attended by the prophet Elijah as the Angel of the Covenant (Malachi 3: 1;) on which occasion the infant receives its name, which is that of a deceased relative, and is usually a Biblical one, but occasionally of Gentile origin. This name is generally only used for religious purposes, and sometimes in domestic life; but in the intercourse with the Christian world a Gentile name is often substituted and registered. Thus, for instance, if the name received at the occasion alluded to, be Aaron, it is likely that it will only be used in affairs connected with religion; as when a prayer is offered up for the party in question, or when he is summoned at synagogue to the reading-desk, &c.; while in social intercourse he will probably go by the name of "Augustus," or "Adolph," &c., with which name he will also sign all letters and documents in the regular course of business.

The performance of this initiatory rite is generally celebrated with a banquet, to which all relations and friends are invited, and which concludes with a special prayer inserted in the usual grace offered up after meals for the new Jewish member.

The Redemption of the First-Born Son.—As soon as the infant has attained the age of thirty days, the father, conformably to Exodus 13: 11, is obliged to redeem it. He invites for this purpose on the following day a descendant of Aaron, and some other guests, acquaints the former with the fact of his wife having been delivered of her first-born son, and offers him to the priest. On his, however, preferring the alternative of receiving the redemdtion price, the sum mentioned in Numbers iii. 47, (about 12*s*.,) is paid to him by the father, who at the same time pronounces an appropriate benediction. It rests with the priest whether he will return the money to the parent.

The Ghetto.—The Jews on the continent were, and are still in many countries confined to Ghettos, which are generally surrounded by walls, and furnished with gates, through which the communication with the other parts of the town are kept up. These gates are closed at a certain hour in the evening, and not opened until the next morning, so that during the night the Jewish population are kept prisoners within their own domiciles. With the exception of one or two of the principal streets, which are of a tolerable size, the Ghetto usually consists of a maze of gloomy and crooked lanes, lined on both sides by high dingy walls. No steamers carrying Irish paupers to Liverpool can be more closely packed than a house in the Ghetto. It is in such a house—perhaps in one of those vaults, the walls of which are constantly oozing out a slimy moisture, as though shedding tears at the misery of the tenants, and the darkling interior of which is never cheered, not even at noontide, by the visit of a straggling ray of the sun—that the infant draws its first breath, tainted with miasm and effluvia. It is surprising, nevertheless, how far care and solicitude will go in protecting infant life. Jewish parents generally make up by this for the local disadvantages under which they labor.

Education.—Let us suppose the period to have arrived when the babe is capable of uttering words. The first sentence which the infant is taught to pronounce will be one from Scripture—as, for instance, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one;" or, "The law which Moses commanded us is an inheritance, of the assembly of Jacob;" or, "Hear, my son, the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the doctrine of thy mother." These are taught in Hebrew to the young [illegible] repeats them word for word, and they serve, together with some short appropriate prayer, for the morning devotion, which is recited immediately after awaking from sleep, and before breakfast.

At the age of four, and sometimes before that period, Jewish children are taught their letters. The most gentle means are employed for this purpose; and one of the common devices for stimulating them to proficiency, is to let fall from above their heads on the primer a sugar plum as often as they succeed in making out a letter, telling them at the same time that it was a present from an angel expressive of his approbation of their progress. Foremost in those laudible efforts are the women, who consider the looking after the little ones, equipping them for and attending them to school, as one of their chief duties. The rabbis do not fail to inculcate this duty in allegorical but most forcible language, by declaring that "the world only subsists through the breath of the little ones in the house of their teacher," and that women become deserving of the world to come by taking their children to the house of study; and, indeed the instructions laid down for the guidance of teachers do not yield in excellence to any given in modern well-regulated schools. However, it is not the language and literature of their country (the reader must remember that we speak of a bygone age) that are studied; no; it is Hebrew, and exclusively Hebrew, that is taught. At first it is the Bible in the original language, with some Hebrew commentary, and subsequently the Talmud, with its subtle interpretations, which are the only branches of knowledge supposed to be worthy of the attention of the student. The language of the country it is supposed, if at all necessary, the pupil will pick up in after life anyhow and anywhere. In the opinion of the strict Jew, the study of the law is the most meritorious occupation to which he could devote his life, and cannot fail to procure him a portion in the world to come. In his opinion everything that is worthy to be known is contained in the Talmud, and therefore the attention bestowed upon any other branch of knowledge, save that just mentioned, is a pure loss of time. To the study of the Talmud, therefore, that class of people devote the whole day and a large portion of the night; for the study of the Talmud they establish academies, to which thousands of young men resort, and where, under the guidance of a celebrated rabbi, they expend, in the exposition of the Talmud, the best years of their life.

The influence which this study exercises over the body and mind of the Jews is immense. The application to the study of so abstruse a work as the Talmud, at a period when the body is not half developed, has a most pernicious effect upon the general health of the pupil; his digestion suffers, his complexion turns sallow, and obstinate cutaneous diseases are not seldom the consequences. The large size (folio) in which that work, and especially its commentaries, are generally printed, compels the little scholar to stoop greatly when at study; hence the crooked and distorted figures of many Talmudic students. Further; the Talmud is read with an intonation of voice quite peculiar to itself; in fact, it may be said it is rather sung than read; so that a person acquainted without understanding the subject, could know whether the part just recited was a question, a reply, a narrative, a syllogism, &c. This custom impresses upon the voice of the habitual student of the Talmud the character of singing even when speaking on indifferent subjects. But on the other hand the same habit may develop at an early period in the Jewish youth the musical talent, if he possesses any, and thus account in some measure for the unusual fondness of Jews for vocal and instrumental music, and for the comparatively large number of composers which have sprung from among them.

The recitation of the Talmud is accompanied with very lively gestures. The body is in perpetual motion; the hands now quietly approach; anon are removed from each other with great rapidity; now clapped together with great vehemence; and then again slowly, with the right thumb uppermost, raised to the level of the head, in accordance with the character of the passage expounded. This habit impresses upon the Jew brought up in that school a peculiar restlessness, even in common conversation. He cannot stand still for a moment. It is not only his lips; it is his hands, his eyes, his phisiognomy, nay, his whole body, that speaks. These adverse influences are still more strengthened by Talmudical statements; for they consider an upright carriage as a sign of haughtiness; and declare that since the destruction of Jerusalem it does not become a Jew to walk upright.

Still greater is the influence exercised on their minds by the general and habitual study of the Talmud. The ingenuity which its exposition requires; the spirit of subtlety and hairsplitting with which it treats its subjects; the abrupt and enigmatical style in which it is written; and, lastly, the rhapsodical character which it presents, greatly sharpen the intellect of the student; enable him, as it were, intuitively, to seize on the right point at a glance; give him an uncommon zest for argument and debate, and a keen relish for all sorts of witticisms and bon mots, and an extraordinary versatility of mind. But, on the other hand, the same reasons render him averse to discipline and regular training, and he becomes impatient of detail; he will not plod on; he will run; if he wishes to reach the top of the ladder, he will rather try to succeed by a powerful leap, than by the slow yet sure operation of ascending step by step. Jews so constituted, betaking themselves to the field of science or literature, will be more apt to succeed in metaphysics, pure mathematics, or poetry, than in any other department; in trade, they will often prosper in those kinds of business which require a quick perception, a bold spirit of speculation, ready-reckoning, and great power of combination. The wealth which Jews have amassed is thus partly accounted for.

However, although it is chiefly the intellect of the child that is cultivated, it were erroneous to suppose that his morals are neglected [illegible] by mere word of mouth, but by practice, that morality is incalculated. No scholar of those Jewish seminaries could give a methodically-arranged account of his duties, for he has never been taught thus; but his whole day may be considered as passing in the performance of what he is taught to regard as meritorious acts. In his earliest infancy it is the scriptural precept—"The beginning of wisdom is fear of God"—which is enjoined on him. Reverence for his parents and teachers are represented as most sacred duties; and thus the behests of the parent are generally received with submission, and implicitly obeyed. A Jewish youth will scarcely ever sit down in the presence of his father, and even in his absence he will not occupy the chair upon which his parent is in the habit of resting. Prudence, economy, abstemiousness, control of temper, modesty, and chastity, are virtues which the child acquires merely from seeing them habitually exercised by those around him. Nor is cleanliness, so far, at least, as ablutions are concerned, neglected. To the performance of these, Jews of the class we are endeavoring to describe are induced, perhaps, less by their intrinsic value than by certain peculiar views. They believe that every night the soul leaves the body, in order to give an account in heaven of the manner in which the day was spent; and that during its absence an evil spirit takes possession of the body; therefore, their very first act in the morning, on awaking, is to return thanks in a short formal prayer, to the Almighty for having restored the soul. They, however, take care in that prayer not to pronounce the sacred name of God, as this would be unbecoming whilst in a state of uncleanliness; for they are of opinion that as long as they have not performed the morning ablution, they are still under the influence of the evil spirit. Similar ablutions of the hands are also prescribed before prayers, and before every meal.

Let us now suppose our infant grown up to boyhood, duly initiated into the intricacies of the Talmud, merrily gesticulating and singing over its contents, and let us throw a glance into his domestic life. Childhood is proverbial for its happiness; but, alas! the Jewish children have no childhood. They may be children in body, but not in mind. The stern earnest of life around them, the habitual sight of misery, and of the hard struggles of those nearest to them in order to obtain a scanty living, make them men and women when they have ceased to be infants. It is not merry nursery rhymes and frolicksome songs which are the first strains delighting the ears of the infant, and giving it a cheerful turn of mind; it is the recital of some bygone woe, or pending bilbul, (false accusation,) which sadly strikes the ears of the child, and overcasts its mind with a gloomy shadow for life. For our own part, we have a perfect recollection, when a mere stripling, how we used to hang on the lips of an old Jew, who could not have been less than eighty-five years of age, imbibing with the eagerness of childhood the accounts of the days of yore. We remember being horror-struck at the recital of the misery of an old Jewess, who, maintaining herself by baking bread for the workpeople who were engaged in building a church, was accused of having endeavored to cast a customer into the heated oven; how, upon this trumpery charge, the accused—a sickly creature of seventy years—in order to expiate the pretended crime, dragging along her heavy chains, was compelled to perform the hard labor of a carrier of stones for the completion of the place of worship; how a young Jew, who had accidentally hit a stone crucifix, escaped a cruel death only by embracing the religion of the country. We used to cry with rage when he related to us how the squire forced the Jews on his estate to buy of him, for hard cash, foul fish, and all kinds of offal, for which he had no use; and how the tax-gatherer made it a rule to intrude upon them on Friday nights, and when not instantly satisfied, how he carried away the Sabbath-lamp, (the lighting of which on Sabbath eve is considered as a duty,) or the food prepared for the Sabbath, knowing, as he did, that they would rather starve than desecrate the day of rest by preparing a meal. However, to return from this digression, let us see how our young Jew spends his day.

Daily Prayers—Phylacteries—Fringes—Meals.—Having performed his morning ablution, he begins to dress. Among his wearing apparel only one article deserves especial attention. It consists of two pieces of cotton, or any other material of square form, fastened to two bands of the same material, which pass over the shoulders like braces, so that one of these square pieces fall over the chest, and the other over the back. Each of the four corners of this article, called Arba Kanfolh, (four corners,) contains a hole through which woollen fringes are passed, and which are worn in commemoration of the fringes ordered in Numbers 15: 38. He next recites certain prayers, preparatory to attending the morning service at synagogue; and without tasting any food, (the satisfaction of the cravings of nature previous to the discharge of the duty of prayer he would consider as a kind of sacrilege,) he hurries off to synagogue. The signal for going there is generally given him by three several blows of a hammer, struck on the house-door of each family by an individual paid for that purpose. The service commences rather early in the morning, as the believer is taught that a particular portion of the prayer is most acceptable to the Almighty when recited not later than a certain hour in the day. Thither the faithful is seen hastening with a large bag in his hand, and a smaller one in his pocket. The larger contains a quadrangular woollen or silk scarf, furnished on the four corners with fringes identical with those just described, and in which he wraps himself, sometimes oddly enough, whilst at prayers. The smaller bag contains the phylacteries (Exodus 13: 16; Deut. 6: 8—11: 18.) These consist of two square blackened leathern cases sheltering certain parchment rolls, on which particular portions of the Pentateuch are written. These cases are fixed to long and slender leathern thongs, blackened [illegible] the cases on the forehead, surrounding the head like a bandelet, and the other on the left arm next to the skin, opposite the heart.

After the performance of another ablution within the precincts of the synagogue, the faithful attires himself with his talith (scarf) and tephilin (phylacteries,) devoutly pronouncing certain benedictions expressive of the command of God to perform these rites; and now, having, on entering the synagogue, reverentially bowed before the ark containing the scrolls of the law, and recited certain appropriate scriptural verses, he commences his prayers, which are all in Hebrew. These he offers up with a fervor which cannot be imagined by those who have not witnessed it. He is convinced that by using the proper devotion in the recital of certain portions, he will obtain a part in the world to come, and bring down blessings upon himself and others. His enthusiasm reaches the highest pitch when reaching "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one!" In his imagination he is ready to sacrifice everything for the unity of God; and whilst dwelling upon the word "one," he is taught to review in his mind the sufferings and glory of those co-religionists who incurred martyrdom for the unity of God. He bends his body backwards and forwards, he screams, he shouts, and all that without the least sense of impropriety. This noise very strangely contrasts with the stillness which prevails a little while after the recital of the prayers called Shemoneh Essrah (Eighteen; so called because it originally consisted of eighteen benedictions.) It must be offered up in a standing posture; every one of the faithful turning his face towards the side containing ark—namely, the east—(in which direction, as it is known, Jerusalem lies; and with his feet closely drawn together, without stirring from the spot, as if riveted to the ground, he reads the prayer in solemn silence and with great devotion. The idea of sacredness attached to this prayer will become apparent to the reader when he is told that, according to the teachings of the rabbis, the faithful should not interrupt himself whilst reciting this portion of the service, not even if a snake were to wind round his heels.

After service, breakfast is taken; but previous to sitting down to this meal, another ablution of hands is performed, the 23d Psalm and a short benediction are said, and on breaking the first morsel of bread, the following blessing is offered up by each individual—"Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, who bringeth forth bread from the ground." After breakfast grace is said, which forms a very long prayer. In short, there is not any kind of enjoyment, however trivial, the partaking of which is not preceded by a prayer; nay, before drinking a drop of water, the strict Jew will say, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, through whose word everything was formed." The most religious are anxious to offer up a hundred benedictions every day, and this they found upon a certain fanciful interpretation put upon Deuteronomy 10: 12. No religious rite, however, is performed with the head uncovered.

The young student is now sent off to school. These, with the exception of the dinner-hour, when the observances as described at breakfast, are repeated, he usually remains until the evening service, which is followed by the night service. The labors of the day being now completed, supper, preceded and followed by the usual prayers, is taken, and the day is finally closed by devoutly kissing the Mesusah, (which will be explained hereafter,) and by reciting another long prayer. On retiring to rest, the strict mother rarely forgets to caution her son against loosening the strings of the nightcap which she ties round his head, as she considers the sleeping without such covering as irreligious; she further looks whether the tape is still fastened, which she likewise, from religious motives, has tied next to his shirt around his waist. DO A GOOD TURN WHEN YOU CAN.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

It needs not great wealth a kind heart to display;
If the hand be but willing, it soon finds a way;
And the poorest one yet, in the humblest abode,
May help a poor brother a step on the road.

Oh! whatever the fortune a man may have won,
A kindness depends on the way it is done;
And though poor be our purse, and though narrow our span,
Let us all try to do a good turn when we can.

The fair bloom of pleasure, may charm for a while,
But its beauty is frail, and inconstant its smile;
Whilst the beauty of kindness, immortal in bloom,
Sheds a sweetness o'er life, and a grace o'er the tomb.

Then if we enjoy life, why the next thing to do,
Is to see that another enjoys his life too;
And though poor be our purse, and though narrow our span,
Let us all try to do a good turn when we can.

From the Presbyterian of the West.

A WORD ABOUT GIVING.

"That is not for me, I have nothing to give." Nothing? If you have nothing, then nothing is required. The Bible rule is, that "each one is to give as the Lord has prospered him." If you have not been at all prospered, you have nothing to give. But if you have any thing, the Lord has given it, and he requires you to give in proportion. When you say you have nothing to give, you mean that you have nothing which you want to spare, nothing that you can't make use of some other way, or nothing left after you have accomplished certain designs. Some men manage to keep always a little in debt, or at least to keep very little money on hand. They add farm to farm, or they are making one improvement after another—one speculation, or investment, or another keeps them constantly poor and embarrassed, and when a contribution is asked they are very much embarrassed or in debt. I know a farmer, whose family is amply provided for, and who is laying by in some form not less than a thousand dollars a year, who yet does not give ten dollars a year to all the Boards of the Church. Can that man, with the Bible in his hand, persuade himself that he loves Christ and his cause? He may; for he when it is read, there are many thorns to choke it. The heart is very deceitful; but yet it does seem strange that a man who loves the world supremely, can persuade himself that the love of God is in his heart.

But others besides the rich make the world their idol, and "withhold" from the treasury of benevolence "more than is meet." People of very small means frequently suppose the rich should give, but they may be excused. But the Head of the Church kindly permits and requires the poor as well as the rich to give. The widow's two mites are accepted, and the self-denying spirit which gave them is commended. "As the Lord hath prospered, each one" is to give. Paul directs the poor to "labor, working with their hands" that they may have something to give. His spirit and that of his Master was very different from what we often see manifested in the Church now. There are many, alas! many, in the Church, who show very plainly that they "have not the spirit of Christ," concerning whom his infallible decision is, that "they are none of his."

But still there is some improvement in the Church regarding this thing. This is hopeful. Men and woman can't now maintain a good standing and reputation in the Church and give nothing to objects of benevolence, (unless they have nothing.) It was not always so. Though there may be many who give nothing, or next to nothing, and yet are not excluded, it is in vain for them to expect to have a good reputation among the true followers of Christ.

But if men only knew the blessedness of giving, they would not be so backward in this duty. Could they but know the happiness of deep and heartfelt sympathy with Christ and his cause, of cheerful giving to sustain it, how grateful they would be for the opportunity and privilege of giving.

THE KING SHALL HAVE HIS OWN AGAIN.

In the first chapter of the Revelation, our Saviour is entitled 'the Prince of the kings of the earth.' To him belongs the primacy over all monarchs in point of dignity and power. He is King of kings and Lord of lords. The whole world is his territory, and to him pertains absolute dominion over all persons and things therein contained. The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof.

It is true, that for the present, and for a long time past, he has been excluded from his just sovereignty over the greater part of his wide domain, and his authority is but imperfectly obeyed in any part of it. Yet he is truly King and Lord of all in point of right, if not in point of fact; and it is also true that in the fullness of time, he will recover entire possession of his rightful empire, and receive the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession. However discouraging the present aspect of his kingdom and its affairs may be to human view, every loyal subject of his divine crown is bound to believe most fully in the promised restoration of his spiritual power over the whole earth; and also to pray without ceasing, and toil without fainting, to hasten that day of glory.

When Oliver Cromwell was in possession of Great Britain and its dependencies, the vigilance and energy of his rule so effectually put down all the resources of the royalist party that it would seem that they must have utterly despaired of the restoration of the Stuarts. And yet with boundless devotion to the fortunes of that house of worthless tyrants, the cavaliers, whether suppressed at home, or wandering in exile abroad, still cherished the confident assurance of the return of their idolized monarchs to power. Wherever they dared, they sang an enthusiastic song, of which the oft repeated burden was,—"the king shall have his own again!" This confidence of theirs, thus hoping against hope, greatly helped to bring about the event for which they sighed; and the banished Stuarts at last, for a while, resumed the ancestral throne they were so unworthy and incapable of filling.

Oh, that among the followers of Jesus, the great King, there were a like enthusiastic feeling in this case most worthy and desirably excited, that "the King shall have his own again!" that he must have it—that he will have it—until every knee shall bow in homage to him, and every tongue shall own him Lord, and pronounce solemn oath of allegiance sealed at the sacramental board—until he shall be King of saints and nations, and shall sit supreme with undisputed sway upon his holy hill of Zion. What a blessed anticipation! "Our King shall have his own again." We see, on the review of the history of the world, that the great event draws nigh. As Coleridge has nobly said: "The whole march of nature and history from the first impregnation of chaos by the Spirit, converges toward this kingdom as the final cause of the world." It was for the setting up of this kingdom on the western hemisphere, that our Pilgrim Fathers crossed the deep, so terrible to them. It is for this their descendants are planting the banner of his cross all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific shores. It is for this that so many of their sons and daughters, inheriting their loyalty, and faith, and zeal, are going forth as missionaries to proclaim him king among the Gentile nations, and to say unto Zion everywhere, "Thy God reigneth!" Yes, Jesus shall reign. The King shall receive his own again! [Puritan Recorder.

UNCONSCIOUS INFLUENCE.

The account of Mr. Daniel Murray, written by F. S. Key, Esq., and published some years ago by the American Tract Society, furnishes a curious instance of the unconscious influence of the mother of a little boy. Speaking of Mr. Murray's faultless character in early life, Mr. Key says:—

"The difficulties, however, that I had felt from this appreciation of his early character were all cleared up at the death-bed of my friend. On my first seeing him he said, 'You [illegible] not describe it to you. Now I owe it all to you, though I never told you, and you never knew it.' Shortly after this when we were alone, he called to me and said, 'Now I will tell you what I never told you or any one. When we first met, and you were a little boy, your good mother had taught you a hymn, which you used to repeat aloud every night on getting into bed. That hymn made a remarkable and deep impression on me, which was never effaced. Without your knowing it I got it by heart from hearing you repeat it, and from that time to this I have never gone to my rest at night without repeating to myself that hymn and praying. This had a most salutary effect upon me all my life. When at sea, I never under any circumstances omitted it; and under the influence produced by it, I remember that when I was once for a short time in command of a small brig we had captured from the French in the Mediterranean, one of the first orders I gave was for the regular meeting of all hands for reading and prayer, which was well received and had a good effect.' He then repeated it to me, and I took a pencil and wrote it down. I had forgotten every word of it.

"Here then I saw the true source of all that had so charmed and surprised me in his life. What I attributed to the impulse of a gentle and noble nature, was the 'fruits of the Spirit,' and the excellence that shone forth in his conduct and character was 'the beauty of holiness.' This he acknowledged with all thankfulness and with the deepest humility; speaking of it as an infinite and undeserved mercy, which he had not improved as he ought. It now seems strange that I have never discovered this, but I was walking in darkness, and therefore perceived not the light by which he was directed.

"Surely God has here shown us some of the doings of his wonder-working hand. A pious mother teaches her child a hymn. It makes no impression upon his heart, and is soon effaced from his memory. But its work is done, and its fruits appear in the heart and life of another."

Mr. Key was himself brought by other influences to embrace the truth that his mother unsuccessfully sought to impress upon his heart by means of that hymn. [Vt. Chron.

TRUE HONESTY.—Some years ago, two aged men, near Marshalton, traded, or, according to Virginia parlance, swapped horses, on this condition—that on that day week the one who thought he had the best bargain, should pay the other two bushels of wheat. The day came, and as luck would have it, they met half way between their respective homes.

"Where art thou going?" said one.

"To thy house with the wheat," answered the other. "And whither art thou riding?"

"Truly," replied the first, "I was taking the wheat to thy house."

Each, pleased with his bargain, had thought the wheat justly due to his neighbor, and was going to pay it.

We should be careful to practise, and treat the humblest menial with courtesy as delicate as we would show the children of affluence and honor. So shall we transfuse in them a corresponding refinement which will tend eventually, perhaps, to make them purer in morals and more elevated in mind.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, June 19, 1851.

TO OUR READERS.

In commencing a new volume of the Sabbath Recorder, we are constrained to urge upon our patrons generally the importance of doing something to increase our subscription list. We ask them to do it, not so much for the sake of saving the concern from pecuniary embarrassment, as for the sake of the cause we advocate. What we particularly suggest, therefore, is that an effort be made to obtain a larger number of subscribers among first-day people. The Recorder was started for the express purpose of advocating the claims of the Bible Sabbath. With this leading object before us, we have endeavored to notice whatever has been said or written by others in opposition to our views, and to keep our readers advised of the various aspects which the question has assumed among different classes of people, as well as of all the movements, political, social, and ecclesiastical, which have seemed to have any important bearing upon the subject. We claim that our paper is emphatically a register of Sabbath matter. Those who take the pains to preserve it on file, will, after a few years, find it to be a storehouse of valuable information upon all points relating to the Sabbath controversy—a source of reference indispensable to every man who wishes to be well posted up in this branch of religious history. Important it is, no doubt, that our own people should be put in possession of this information for the confirmation of their faith, especially that those of them who may be called to stand forth publicly in defense of our views should not be deficient in it; but it is also very desirable to have it laid before those who differ from us. It is desirable that they should know now how the question stands, what are the various phases which it assumes, the political and social agitations to which it gives rise, and what is the real strength of the cause which they will have to combat if they continue to repudiate the claims of the seventh day. The necessity of special effort to get this information before them, is but imperfectly apprehended by our people. They have but a faint conception of the thick darkness which rests upon the Christian world in regard to this question. Hundreds—yes, we shall speak within bounds if we say thousands—of ministers of the gospel have never given it a serious investigation. They take the popular opinion upon trust, adhere to it, preach it, and die in it, never dreaming but what it rests upon a 'thus saith the Lord.' Never called to defend their practice, they scarcely think it worth while to inquire whether it is tenable or not. And we venture the assertion, that not one in a hundred of [illegible] of the Fourth Commandment. Of all those who have banded together in societies for the promotion of the better observance of what is falsely called the Sabbath, perhaps not one really understands what the Fourth Commandment requires. Their ignorance is truly astonishing. But our people, because they see the subject so clearly themselves, can hardly be persuaded that such ignorance is any thing more than willful prejudice. "They have the Bible before them," they say; "how is it possible for them to be so much in the dark?" Hence they think it of little or no use to furnish them with our books, our tracts, and our denominational newspaper. It is of no use to solicit their subscription for the Recorder, they think, for the request will only be met by a cold repulse. We, however, are of a different opinion. We do not believe that our first-day brethren generally are determined to adhere to their own ways, right or wrong. In fact, we know better. There are multitudes among them, "the excellent of the earth," who wait only to be thoroughly convinced that they are upholding a human tradition by keeping the first day of the week, and they will then abandon the practice. Let such be furnished with our paper; it will do them good. It will, at least, make them feel more kindly towards us, and do something towards perfecting that union which ought to exist between all that truly love our Lord Jesus Christ. We say, then, let the effort to obtain subscribers among them be made. What profit was it, that week after week we reviewed the Sabbath discussion of the Christian Chronicle, if no body ever sees our remarks but our own people? If the Chronicle would tranfer them to its columns, and let its readers see what could be said in behalf of true Sabbatarianism, we should be measureably satisfied. But when it does that, "you'll catch a weasel asleep." And what profit was it, that for so many weeks we paid our respects to the Rev. Mr. Bennett, of Wisconsin, in review of his discourse entitled, "Not the Jewish, but the Christian Sabbath," so long as but few besides our own people knew any thing about it? Of what use was it for us, some four or five years ago, to offer our strictures, in several successive numbers, upon a discussion which sprung up in the columns of the Christian Chronicle between "E. W. D." and "Indagator," when very few first-day people were permitted to see them? And of what use is it to notice, from time to time, the doings of the "Sabbath Union," the sophistry of its publications, the jesuitism of its agents, together with the spirit of oppression which pervades the Sunday laws and the judicial proceedings under them, if those for whose special benefit our remarks are intended never see or hear of them? We are under no necessity of doing all this for the confirmation of Seventh-day Baptists. Our object is to enlighten others, if possible. But unless something can be done to get our paper into the hands of those who might be benefited by it, we think that our labor might be more profitably directed; and we shall accordingly have to modify our sermons to suit the congregation that hears us, or else find a more useful field of labor.

But we have another thing to suggest. In almost every church will be found some families who are too poor to supply themselves with the Recorder. Some, it is true, will plead poverty, who are abundantly able to subscribe, and pay for it. But there will always be a few, who cannot do so without manifest injustice to themselves. Is it not the duty of the church to raise a fund, which shall suffice to place the Recorder in the hands of every poor family belonging to the congregation? We think this ought to be done. We do not believe that there is any necessity, that even one Seventh-day Baptist should be deprived of the privilege of reading our denominational paper. With a little effort, in the spirit of benevolenee, it might be placed in every house where there is a Seveventh-day Baptist to read it.

RAIL-ROADS, PLANK-ROADS, &C.

WAITING AT A RAILROAD STATION,
Rome, N. Y., June —, 1851.

MR. EDITOR,—What a relief for a person who has long been accustomed to write with the idea before him of several thousand readers, to pen a letter now and then for one reader—for "Mr. Editor." He feels that the responsibility is thus divided, and made to rest in part upon the man whose prerogative it is to accept or reject. If newspaper correspondents generally understood their privilege in this respect, it is likely that editors would fare much better at their hands. There are two classes of correspondents, entirely unlike in most points, who agree in one thing, and that is in giving to editors a great deal of labor and trouble. The members of one class are in the habit of jotting down from time to time, in a very careless style, their most commonplace thoughts, which are dispatched to the Editor, in expectation that if they are entirely worthless he will throw them under the table, or that, if they will pass muster after numerous corrections and alterations, he will give them the finishing touches. In most cases, these good-natured, easy souls, are not particularly inclined to find fault, and of course make but little trouble in that way; but they often impose an unreasonable amount of severe and exhausting labor upon him who has business of his own to do. The other class is made up of persons who never send the editor a commmunication without considering well the subject, and giving scrupulous attention to the manner of developing it, but who, if their production should chance to be withheld, no matter for how good a reason, consider its suppression a personal offense, which they are never to forget, and for which they are in duty bound to show proper resentment. Of the two classes, it is difficult to say which is the more troublesome. One thing is certain—if correspondents considered well the duty of fully preparing for the press what they undertake to prepare, and then appreciated the privilege of having their work reviewed and passed upon by one who is likely to be free from the bias to which they are exposed, the representatives of either class would be scarce.

Pardon the digression, Mr. Editor, into which the penning of your official title has led me. I brought out my writing materials with a view of telling you something about the facilities for travel in this region. Several months ago it was announced that with the opening of Spring business, the rail-roads between Albany and Buffalo would greatly reduce their fares, and add to their facilities. This promise has been well redeemed. The fare on most of the roads is now reduced to two cents a mile, and even less for "through passengers." Seven trains of passenger cars leave Albany daily for the West, at hours well suited to accommodate every class of travelers. The Express Trains start at seven o'clock morning and evening, and reach Buffalo in about twelve hours. Each of these heavy trains is preceded by a light accommodation train, which takes up and sets down passengers at all the stations, and enables persons starting from the unimportant stations, at which the express trains do not stop, to get on board those trains at the proper places, without loss of time. The mail train leaves Albany at 9 o'clock A. M., and is the pleasantest train for the leisure tourist. There is also a train from Albany at 2 o'clock P. M., which stops at all the stations on the line to Buffalo. It is a pleasant indication of progress to contrast the present arrangement with that of only a few years ago, when a person reaching Albany too late for the morning train West was compelled to lie over till evening, and thus lose a whole day. Many influences are operating to make the officers of the line of railroad through Central New York, particularly anxious to accommodate the public. The proposition to build a road from Schenectady to Utica on the west side of the Mohawk river, has probably had some weight. But the completion of the Erie Railroad, which opens a direct communication between New York City and the Great West, has doubtless done more than any thing else to produce this desirable result. One convenience, which might be supplied at a trifling cost, is still much needed on this line, as well as on other lines, and that is a card or handbill, for general distribution, which would show the times at which the several trains arrive at each of the stations. Such a programme would aid materially in the transaction of business at places along the roads, and would save an incalculable amount of time now lost at the stations in waiting for trains.

Plank Roads have increased wonderfully in this section within a few years. From Rome there are roads of this kind to Oswego, to Western, to Taberg, to Madison, and I know not in how many other directions. From Utica, one may drive east, west, north, or south, on plank. The cost of these roads ranges from twelve hundred to two thousand dollars per mile, according to the amount of grading required. The road from Rome to Madison cost only $1,300 per mile, while there is one running from Utica southward, which cost $2,100 per mile. The toll amounts to about three-quarters of a cent per mile for a one-horse team, and twice that for a double team. This is found adequate, in most cases, to keep the roads in repair, and pay a dividend of seven to ten per cent. annually on the stock. Instances have occurred in which the dividends were as high as forty per cent. The stock is principally owned by farmers along the roads, and by the business men of the villages through which they pass. If there were never any profits to divide, the stockholders would probably realize the worth of their investment in the increase of business and the saving of wear and tear on teams.

The Rome and Watertown Railroad is rapidly hastening to completion. It is now open to Pierpont Manor, five miles South of Adams, and nineteen miles from Watertown. The present season will probably suffice to finish the track for the iron horse to Watertown—a village, by the way, which has the air and bustle of a city, and is destined to figure largely in the business operations of Northern New York. GLIMPSES OF DOMESTIC LIFE IN CHINA.

NUMBER TEN.

SHANGHAE, November, 1850.

I have told you that the Chinese dwellings are not warmed, even in the coldest weather, by fires. Like all general rules, this has its exceptions. Foot stoves and hand stoves are much used in winter, and sometimes also a pan of burning coal may be seen placed in the center of the room, but this is rare. A curious invention is that which supplies fuel for these little foot and hand stoves. A quantity of pulverized charcoal is moistened with its due proportions of rice gruel, or paste, and pressed into a small brass mould, varying from an inch and a half to two or more inches in diameter. These little balls, called tan kits, are then thoroughly dried, after which they may be easily ignited; and being placed in the center of the stove, upon a thick stratum of ashes, with which also they are slightly covered, they preserve an equal and constant heat for the half or whole day together, according to their size. Sometimes the dust of the anthracite coal is used, in which case it is cemented with clay; but it constitutes a very inferior article, is easily crumbled, and hardly worth the buying. No invention I have ever known, designed to answer the same purpose, can equal this for economy and comfort, the expense not necessarily exceeding four cash per day, or about one penny for four days.

We must yield to the natives the palm of economy on many points. That "nature's wants are few and easily supplied," they have thoroughly learned. Kitchen, parlor, and dormitory, alike give evidence of this. With respect to the kitchen, any accommodations for baking seems uncalled for, where pastry is so little used, and that little can be so much more easily supplied, and economically obtained, at the baker's, than prepared at home, whether the prudential considerations have reference to time, labor, or expense. The family "cook-rice man" must have a comparatively easy life of it. The breakfast—"tea-sing," as it is called—consists of a few cakes, or small pies, of the size of an apple, which rarely, if ever, exceed the penny-worth. This, with occasional drafts upon the tea-pot, suffices till the mid-day meal; and many abstain entirely from food until that time. This is called the great or noon rice, and consists of that article as the principal, accompanied with such condiments as fancy or economy dictate. Pork and fish are eaten in abundance; but in superabundance is consumed the garlick, and a species of cabbage called "sean-pah-tsae." This may be boiled with or without the rice, but when used they are invariably mixed in the eating. "Have you dined?" is the most common of compliments at meeting. "What kind of greens did you eat?" is a very proper as well as common supplement to the inquiry; for the variety of "greens" are many, although the "sean-pah-tsae," from its abundance, is most economical, and therefore most generally used.

Beans should hold an almost equal rank, in the enumeration of their articles of vegetable ~~diet~~, being used in great abundance, in their native state, as well as in the ever-abounding forms of oil and soy. If any proof can be drawn from analogy of the origin of the Chinese, the expert traveler, who is said to have found himself able to detect the Jews of Egypt, even in the dark, by their strong odor of sesamum, might think proper to confer the title of brotherhood upon the Chinese by the same odoriferous sign. This is not last or least among the aromatic nuisances, which so annoy us in our walks, being constantly used in their cooking, and that too, as I have already told you, in such fearful proximity to the narrow lanes, which are dignified with the names of streets, that pedestrians find themselves driven to the necessity of preserving the order of single file in their march. One soon learns to associate bean oil with every thing national in China, until it becomes, in fact, as much a part of the Celestial Empire as are its porcelian towers, or the great wall itself. If they to whom the smell of bean oil is as savory as were the garments of Jacob to his satisfied parent, still find it necessary, in threading their own highways, to keep their senses well appeased by the counter influences of charms and amulets, how much more should we, who, in addition to all that heathenism itself can loathe, have this to combat, which is at once their glory and our abhorrence. Even the fumes of the tobacco pipe, offensive as they are to our uncultivated senses, become a desideratum amid the indispensables of our Chinese domestics, and we cheerfully leave them to the enjoyment of that, which may thus in part serve as an antidote to those evils, which are not likely soon to cure themselves.

"Tea-table chat" might perhaps include all the chatting that is done in the Empire; for the man that has friends can hardly be said to show himself friendly, but over the contents of the steaming tea-cup, and the absence of fire in the house furnishes no excuse for a default, in case of sudden or unexpected calls, hot-water depots being always at hand, and they are, in fact, to this tea-drinking nation, about as indispensable as are the Croton Water Works to the good people of New York. The most neighborly calls must begin and end with a cup of tea, if one would not be thought unpardonably recreant to the rites of hospitality; the tobacco pipe being considered its alternate, or its substitute, if you decline the tea.

But if you would see tea-sipping in its perfection, you must enter the public tea-shops, which are as frequent as are the victualing houses of your own city. You encounter the spacious stalls at every turn. Their roofs are low, and their open fronts stand temptingly contiguous to the narrow streets. The tile, or earthen floor, is thickly strewn with stools, alternating with the small square tables of the nation, just large enough to accommodate four persons. Servants are in waiting, who hand you the covered cup, with its quota of tea leaves, upon which the boiling water has just been poured; and this is from time to time replenished, from a circulating tea-kettle, until the last vestige of the original aroma is extracted and swallowed, and as much longer as the avaricious consumer chooses to drain the tasteless fluid from the equally tasteless dregs, fearful lest he should fail to secure the full worth of his four copper cash, the apprised value of the precious beverage.

Like every thing else in China, these tea-parties are just the reverse of what would pass under the same nomenclature at home. Ladies have no part nor lot in the matter, and the lordly bearing of creation's lords is well displayed in the dignified politeness, the pompous courtesy, with which their tea is sipped, the news of the day discussed, the jest bandied, the cash deposited, and the satisfied recipient of its cheaply-bought pleasures resigns his seat, his table, and his cup, in favor of some more thirsty successor.

A particular description of the far-famed tea-cup would, like the thrice-told tale, be void of interest to you; so I pass it by. I will, however, say that I think writers have generally mistaken the use of the small saucer-like lid, which I have never yet seen a native use as a substitute for the saucer, however prone foreigners may be to do so, as I have sometimes known them to do and be sure to get, for their awkwardness, only the ill-suppressed smile of sarcastic surprise, from some one or more of the initiated gentry around them. The nature of the case makes these lids quite indispensable in their place, the heat which is by this process secured being only adequate to the extracting of the aroma from the tea-leaves, the whole process of steeping being thus carried on in the cup.

As there is no family fireside, there is, strictly speaking, no family board in China. True, the bowls of steaming rice, heaped and piled until there is barely room to lay the indispensable chop-sticks across their edge, may be placed in any number upon one common table; but they are soon monopolized, and taken away to be eaten at pleasure, in the remote recesses of the room, or, which is, I think, still more common, at the entrance of the house, or even outside the doorway. Thus may we often see, in our evening walks, a multitude of men, women, and children, crowding about the doors, perhaps on the inner, perhaps on the outer side, holding their bowl of rice, with the left hand, in a horizontal position to the mouth, and with their pair of chop-sticks in the right, lifting the contents most dexterously to the edge, whence it seems to leap to the lips as if by magic, accompanied by a sound which is any thing but agreeable to our unaccustomed ears. This social way of eating separately, must go far to do away the rigors of that custom which prevents the male and female members of the family from eating at the same table, except among the nearest relatives. Of course I speak not now of the higher classes, whose rank or wealth entitle them to all the luxuiries of the closest confinement, and among whom, if any where, must be found the enforcement of the custom, which you have learned from books to consider as a regulation of society, requiring that all the tribes of the land should eat, every family apart, and their wives apart. NOTICE TO MEMBERS OF THE SHILOH CHURCH.—The following Resolution was adopted by the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Shiloh, Cumberland Co., N. J., 4th mo. 27, 1851:—

Resolved, That every member of this church be requested to report himself or herself at least once a year, either personally or by letter, to this church; and in case of a failure to comply with this resolution, such will be subject to a loss of membership.

Resolved, That this resolution be read before the church quarterly, and published in the Sabbath Recorder.

By order of the Church.
ABEL S. RANDOLPH, Church Clerk.

REVISING AND ABRIDGING THE LAW.

"Jesus Christ came into the world, not only to expound the moral law, but to revise and abridge it."

Although we were once pretty thoroughly schooled in what are termed good old fashioned Baptist sentiments, we confess that we had forgotten this part of our Baptist catechism, until we heard it lately from the lips of a preacher of that denomination. The idea appeared new, and awakened a few thoughts respecting the object of Christ's coming into the world.

According to the preacher, Jesus Christ came into the world to revise and get up a new edition of the law. But, according to Christ himself, he came "not to destroy the law, but to fulfill." One of the prophets said that he would "magnify the law and make it honorable." Paul says that "the law is spiritual;" if so, how does it become necessary to abolish a part and retain a part? Christ came to redeem us from the curse of a violated law, not to free us from obedience to the law. The moral law as a whole, and every particular of it, is a rule of right, and unalterable, according to the Saviour's own words: "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."

We cannot help suspecting the tendency of such a sentiment, viz., to weaken confidence in the Fourth Commandment, and add weight to the practice of sanctifying the first day of the week as a holy day. It is possible that the preacher meant it to apply to the no-sabbath doctrine. Be that as it may, we are glad that, now and then, our opponents do expose the ground-work of their no-sabbath and first-day Sabbath sentiments. We have only time to add, that the doctrine attributes to Christ a work which, we believe, is no where claimed for Him in the Bible. "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart." W. M. J.

"A BILL OF SALE OF A D. D."

A minister of the gospel upon whom the University of Heidelberg had conferred the title of Doctor of Divinity, being in Europe at the time the fugitive slave law went into operation, was obliged to remain there, lest, if he should return to this country where it is politically confessed that "all men are created equal," he should suddenly discover that he is not a man, but a thing—a chattel personal. Our readers will be interested to know that he will be permitted to return, and still cherish the delusion that he is a human being. The Rev. Dr. Pennington, alias Jim Pembroke, "a first-rate blacksmith, and well worth a thousand dollars," has obtained a legal title to his own body and soul. The way in which this has been brought about, will be learned from the following very interesting letter, which we find in the last number of the Independent.

HARTFORD, CONN., June 3, 1851.

Messrs. Editors:—It will probably interest most of your readers to know that the "chattel personal" generally called Rev. Dr. Pennington, is in a fair way of becoming a man.

Dr. P., was born the slave of Frisbie Tilghman, of Hagerstown, Maryland, by whom he was educated a blacksmith, though an important branch of his education was forgotten—that of teaching him his letters. At the age of 21 he was regularly graduated in the "peculiar institution;" and his late master ceritfied to me in a writing which I now have in my possession, and which we may regard as his diploma, that at this time, "Jim was a first-rate blacksmith, and well worth a thousand dollars." At this age, feeling a desire to see something of the world before he decided where to settle, he one night took hasty leave and struck for the North Star; and finding after careful observation that he could locate himself more advantageously elsewhere, he has never returned to "the paternal roof." His experience of the "Institution" satisfied him that it was "a first-rate place to emigrate from."

After his escape he found protection and assistance in a Quaker family in Pennsylvania, with whom he remained some time, and whose kindness he has ever since remembered with inexpressible gratitude. Here he began those studies which, ever since pursued with unremitting ardor and industry, have made him a man of intelligence and a scholar. He had stolen from Heaven a Promethean fire which made the chattel a living man.

After pursuing his studies for some years he entered upon the Christian ministry, and as a Congregational preacher was settled some years in Hartford, and since in New York. His history during the last half of this time is well known to the public.

About the year 1844 Mr. P. disclosed to me the fact that he was a fugitive from slavery. He did it under the most solemn injunction of secrecy, and told me at the time that he had never before divulged the fact to any living person except his Quaker friends in Pennsylvania—not even to his wife so great was his fear that by some misadventure the fact would get abroad and expose him to danger. It was withheld from his wife, however, mainly to save her from disquieting fears. He informed me that in his studies in his domestic life, and in the discharge of his parochial duties, he was constantly burdened with harrassing apprehensions of being seized and carried back to slavery. The name which he bore was an assumed one; that of the chattel was James Pembroke, or more commonly the "household word" Jim. He disclosed the fact to me that I might attempt a negotiation with his master, for the purchase of his freedom. I accordingly wrote to Mr. Tilghman to ascertain on what terms he would manumit him, taking care to give him no intimation of his present name, or of his residence. Mr. T. soon after wrote me that "with regard to the ungrateful servant of whom" I had written him—as servants were then very high in the market—he could not take less than $500; adding in a postscript, "Jim is a first-rate blacksmith and well worth $1000." As Mr. P. could not raise so large a sum, and as it was an exorbitant price for "a bird in the bush," he decided to pursue the negociation no further. Mr. Tilghman died soon after.

The passage of the late Fugitive Slave law found Mr. P. in Scotland; and with the arrests of fugitives under it, of which he received frequent intelligence, filled him with new apprehensions as to his own fate on his return to New York—then immediately contemplated—particularly as he had made the fact public in England that he was a fugitive slave. In these circumstances he wrote to me for my advice as to the risk he would incur by returning; and I advised him to remain for the present. Soon after some friends of his in the village of Dunse, in Berwickshire, determined to take the matter in hand, and raise the necessary funds to secure his freedom, whatever might be the amount required, and appointed a committee to correspond with me on the subject. This was some four or five months ago, and I have since that time been negotiating with the administrator of Mr. Tilghman, until at last an arrangement was made for his purchase for the sum of $150. The administrator having no power to manumit, it was necessary for him to sell him to a third person, and for the vendee to execute the deed of manumission. I accordingly directed the bill of sale to be made to me. The money was remitted, and I have to-day received the bill of sale making over James Pembroke to me as my own property forever, to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

I remarked at the opening of my letter that Dr. P. was in "a fair way of becoming a man." He is not yet completely one. The title to him still rests in me, and it remains for me, by deed under my hand and seal, to "create him a Peer of the Realm" I shall however defer the execution of this instrument for half an hour, till I have walked up and down the whole length of Maine street, to see how it seems to be a slaveholder, especially to own a Doctor of Divinity. Possibly during the walk I may change my mind and think it best to send him to a sugar plantation.

Very Respectfully yours,
JOHN HOOKER.

P. S.—I have returned from my walk. The deed is executed. Jim Pembroke is merged in Rev. Dr. Pennington. The slave is free—the chattel is a man.

I spoke of half an hour's walk. I must confess that my return was a little hastened by the thought which suddenly struck me on my way, that perhaps the "legal relation" I had rashly assumed was a "malum in se." I thought for a moment of going for consolation to one of the "lower law" divines, but feared that it might end in me sending the Reverend Doctor to the auction-block.

THE METHODIST CHURCH CASE.

The law suit between the two bodies of the Methodist Church, the North and the South, which has been on trial in this city is terminated. The case is now in the hands of the court, and a decision is expected in a few days. Judge Nelson remarked at the close of the argument, that the court would not be able to render a decision for some time; and he hoped meanwhile, that the suggestions of counsel on both sides, would be adopted, and the affair brought to an amicable compromise and agreement.

The argument in this law-suit has been urged on both sides with great ability; Daniel Lord and Reverdy Johnson for the South, Geo. Wood and Rufus Choate for the North. The former being the plaintiffs, contend not that they are the Church, and entitled to the whole property, but that they are Methodist Episcopalians in the United States, and have never separated or seceded from the Church; that the General Conference by its action on slavery, made it necessary for them to form a Southern General Conference, but they are still in connection, and have a right to have a fair share of the property which they helped to create. On the other hand, the defendents, North, contend that the members of the Southern Annual Conferences or districts, who left the General Conference in 1844, and subsequently formed a new General Conference and a separate ecclesiastical jurisdiction, under the name of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, seceded and separated from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and are no longer in connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church, which is now composed of that portion of the former members who remained in it, and are identified with it, and therefore by their own act deprived themselves of all right and title to the property which is held as a sacred trust for the relief of disabled preachers in the connection.

COMMENCEMENT.—The Providence Journal says:—By the new arrangement the commencement of the Brown University will be held on the 9th of July, being the second Wednesday of the month. This change removes the commencement from the end of the long vacation to the beginning. Its advantage is that the members of the graduating class to whom parts are assigned, and who live far from the city, are saved the expense and inconvenience of a journey home and back, or of remaining here during the vacation. The number of students affected by this is very small, not probably more than a dozen each year. The disadvantage of the change is that it spoils commencement.

THE NEXT VESSEL FOR LIBERIA.—The Colonization Herald states that a vessel will leave Baltimore for Liberia about the 1st of July. The Pennsylvania Colonization Society proposes to send by this vessel Charles L. Still and Joseph E. Gardner, of Reading, Rev. L. A. Williams and wife, and C. Johnson, wife, and six children, of Columbia, and perhaps a few more. Most of them know some mechanical art. They design locating at the new town of "Cresson," near Bassa, at which place Mr. Gardner is under appointment to open a school for the gratuitous tuition of the children of the colonists and natives—the entire expense being borne by persons in Philadelphia.

THE LONDON PEACE SOCIETY held its anniversary meeting on the 20th of May, at which addresses were delivered in French, Italian, German, and English. Mr. Elihu Burritt, of Massachusetts, was one of the speakers. The report speaks in encouraging terms of the cause. Over $2,000 were contributed, to be applied in peace publications, which are to be printed in the above-named languages and distributed to the visitors to the Industrial Exhibition.

General Intelligence.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the arrival of the steamer America we have dates to the 31st ult.

The debate on the Roman Title Bill is still going on in the English Parliament, but no advance has been made with the measure.

On the evening of the 27th, the Protectionists held a banquet at Tamworth, the residence of the late Sir Robert Peel, when the people of the town rose up en masse, and dispersed the gathering; windows were broken several persons injured, and at length the military had to be called out to quell the riot.

The Glass Palace continues to attract its thousands. Upward of 50,000, passed through the doors in one day.

The United Service Gazette states, "We hear, from high authority at the Cape, that the cost incurred in the first month of hostilities, was about $260,000, and that it has been betwen 80 and $90,000 per month since."

There is nothing of moment from the French Capital, beyond the fact that the Legitimists are making every effort to retain their desired revision of the Constitution. The party of order remained firmly attached to the President.

Lisbon letters of the 22d mention the installment of a new Cabinet, principally Progressistas, with the Duke of Saldanha as President of the Council. All the new Ministry were held to be men of honor and integrity, and had been Ministers of State before.

The disturbances betwen the Roman and French soldiers still continue. The French authorities in Rome have caused 10,000 rations and a large supply of ammunition to be taken on to the Castle of St. Angelo.

Accounts from Algeria state that a conflict had taken place betwen the Cabylese and the French forces, in which the former were defeated, several hundred having been killed and wounded.

Accounts from lower Fabylin are not so satisfactory. The French had entered the country on the 14th, and were desperately opposed by tha inhabitants. They, however, were driven from all their positions, and the blockade of Gagilla raised. The loss of the French was estimated at 100, and 300 wounded, and that of the Fabyle at 437 killed and 1,200 wounded; 42 villages were burnt on the 15 and 17th. Several tribes have made their submission.

Destructive Storm in Wisconsin.—A correspondent of the Milwaukee Commercial Advertiser of the 9th inst., gives a deplorable account of a storm which passed over Walworth County on the previous night. A house on Duck Creek was blown from its foundation, and turned topsey-turvey—the inmates, with the exception of one female, having previously rushed out, she being badly crushed among the falling timbers. The house of P. Brown, near the head of the lake, was blown some nine rods from its foundation. Mr. Brown, wife and two children, and a young man, were in the house at the time. All except the children were much injured, but, it is thought, not dangerously. The children were asleep in a trundle bed under the bed of their parents, and thus escaped unhurt. It is stated that from the appearance of the ruins, the house must have been taken bodily from its foundation, and struck first upon its ridge. This, of course, seems incredible. But, if it is true, the escape of the family, or a member of it, is almost miraculous. To show the extraordinary force of the whirlwind, it is also stated that a jack oak near the house was torn up by its roots, and conveyed some distance into an adjoining field. In one place, on Bloom Prairie, about twenty acres of meadow land were reft from the subsoil to the depth of three feet, by the rushing water, and deposited in uncouth masses some distance below. Many other instances of a similar character, but less in magnitude, have been reported. So far as is now heard from, not a bridge or dam remains—everything is swept clean. A letter received by L. B. Goodsell, of Milwaukee, from Jas. Simmons, Esq., of McHenry County, Ill., 14 miles South of here, contains the intelligence that about 25 houses were blown down in Highland Prairie, and that three persons were killed in one house.

Trouble on the Half-Breed Tract in Iowa.—The Burlington (Iowa) Telegraph states that two or three hundred settlers on the Half-breed tract, incensed by some violation of their local code, lately proceeded in a body to the house of one of the settlers about four miles below Fort Madison, and, after removing the family and furniture out-doors, deliberately set fire to the building fences, &c., reducing the whole to ashes. The occupant of the house, seeing them approach, fled into the woods, and, it is presumed, from the excited state of feeling existing against him, thus escaped the California penalty. We are not advised of the causes which led to this sudden outbreak, but presume it arose from that constant source of trouble among them—unsettled titles. It is much to be regretted that these contested questions should still drag their slow length along through our various Courts. We know not where or with whom the blame or delay may rest—but we do know that the prosperity and growth of our neighboring County is retarded, and the character of our State somewhat the sufferer by these long procrastinated suits and repeated broils among our citizens.

The Gold Excitement in Maine.—The Bath, Maine, Tribune of the 5th inst., has the following:—Probably not less than two hundred men have started this week, and are ready to start next Monday, for the gold mines of the North. A company of a dozen men, from Gardiner, passed up the river this morning. Companies are fitting out here and in Augusta to start next week. We are informed upon good authority, that gold has been recently found in the streams that rise on the east side of the hight of land and flow east into the west branch of the Penobscot. The head of these streams is in the vicinity of the head waters of the streams that flow west into the Chaudiere. No doubt exists of the presence of gold in the streams that flow into Moose river, emptying into Moosehead Lake. The whole country around the tributaries of the west branch of the Penobscot and Moose rivers, is mountainous, and similar in many respects to the mining regions in other countries. We do not wish to favor the excitement on this subject further than the truth will warrant. One fact is undisputed—that gold has been for about two years obtained in this region. The discoveries were deemed of sufficient importance to cause a geological survey of the Chaudiere river by the Provincial Government of Canada. Since that survey the Government has quietly carried on mining operations.

Tragedy in Roxbury.—On Sunday, June 8, a fearful tragedy took place in Roxbury, Mass. A young man who proved afterwards to be insane, called himself Ephraim G. Daggett, and said he was a stranger from Hope, Me., stopped at the house of Dr. A. G. Cumming, a very respectable physician, and requested medical advice. The doctor being out, Mrs. C. invited him to step into the parlor, where he sat down and took off his cravat, and complained of pain in his side. At that moment a little daughter of Dr. C.'s came running into the room, when the man instantly drew a razor from his pocket, and cut the child's throat from ear to ear. The mother sprang forward, and in her efforts to protect her child, was herself badly cut in the hands. She then fled from the house, with the servant girl pursued by the assassin. The neighbors were alarmed, and rushed to the spot, when the man cut his own throat, and fell dead in the street. The little girl, who was an only child, died instantly.

Productions of the Isthmus.—The New Orleans Picayune of the 4th inst., says: "We saw yesterday a variety of the productions of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec—cotton, corn, tobacco, vanilla, sugar, and cocoa among other things—and can truly say that our eyes have never fallen upon finer specimens. The cotton of wild growth was of rich color, strong, and of long and silky texture, the cern was well filled, hard, and of great size, the tobacco of high and rich flavor, and the other productions were equally remarkable in their way. Besides these, there were gums in the box containing the different productions, as well as specimens of the shell fish from which the Tyrean purple dye was obtained, and which has long been extinct on the shores of the Mediterranean. These shell fish are now found near Ventosa. Of a truth, the land on the Isthmus of Tehanutepec not only 'flows with the milk and honey,' and everything calculated to make the heart of man glad, but we find there productions which must enrich the inhabitants to a degree whenever they can find a market."

Cholera in the West.—This disease has made its appearance at different points in the west. The Louisville Courier says that a cabin passenger on the steamer Bob Rogers, from St. Louis, died of cholera, and was buried at a wood yard below Evansville.

The Louisville Journal says: "We learn from the officers of the Bostona that this disease was prevailing in several towns and on the plantations along the Mississippi.

The steamer Sultana arrived at St. Louis on the 6th, with a large number of emigrants. Only four deaths occurred during the trip. The quarantine below St. Louis has been abandoned, the ground being under water.

The Natchez Courier, of the 4th, says: The cholera, as we regret to learn, appeared a few days since on the "Waterloo Plantation" of Capt. Minor, and several deaths occurred among the negroes. It is no doubt one of the results of the crevasse which took place in that neighborhood last winter.

The Cincinnati Times of Monday, says: There is no doubt whatever that cases of cholera occur daily in every part of the west—on the rivers, and inland beyond contagion, if that is essential to its existence. Louisville and Cincinnati both furnish well-defined cases, in no wise connected with river employment. Bowel complaints are now general, and should attract attention.

Episcopal Convention in North Carolina.—This ecclesiastical body met in St. John's Church, in Fayetteville, on Wednesday the 28th ult. The Bishop of the Diocese, and 28 clergymen with 45 lay delegates, representing 24 parishes were present. This attendance was much more full than has ever before been in the diocese. This was caused by the troubles which have occurred within the last three years in regard to an alleged Romish tendency in the teachings and practices of the bishop and some of the clergy—chiefly or altogether those brought here from other States. The Bishop made to the Convention a full and most emphatic retraction of all those offensive doctrines and practices, which he attributes mainly to violent diseases, which prostrated his mental and physical system. The discussions in the Convention were earnest, interesting, and sometimes excited. A satisfactory arrangement of all difficulties was finally perfected and unanimously agreed to under circumstances of impressive solemnity.

Tragic Affair.—The Philadelphia Ledger gives an account of a tragic affair that recently occurred at Morristown, N.J. A man named Cowperthwaite about a year ago made some threats against a Mr. Van Shiver, who thereupon caused a warrant to be issued for his arrest, when Cowperthwaite fled. On Tuesday last he returned to the neighborhood, and, armed with a shot gun, concealed himself in a field near the house, from which he shot at Mr. Van Shiver, wounding him slightly. A party of citizens headed by a constable, hastened to arrest the ruffian, who finding himself closely pursued turned and fired wounding the constable. The pursuers returned the fire, and Cowperthwaite was so seriously injured, that he was immediately captured and conveyed to jail at Mount Holly.

Gentle Hint to Postmasters.—A Postmaster in Pennsylvania recently had judgment given against him for the price of subscription of several years to a newspaper, on the plea that he had not given sufficient legal notice to the publisher to stop it, and had continued to receive the numbers for several years, and sell them for the postage! The magistrate decided that merely returning a copy of "John Smith's paper," with "stop this" written on it without postmark or other indication of locality was not sufficient or legal notice; but a written notice, with name, place, date, and reason, must be sent to the publisher and "franked," that it may be taken out by him. SUMMARY.

The Keokuk Dispatch, of the 2d inst., says: "The river at this place yesterday was fifteen feet and a quarter above low water mark, and rose ten inches last night. It is now thirty-nine inches higher than in the great flood of 1844. It is said that a rise of three feet more is on its way from above! The prospect is truly alarming. Immense damage to property is reported from both above and below. Even the wood for the steamboats is said to be nearly all floated off from the banks of the river.

The Legislature of New York met in special session at Albany, Tuesday, June 10. The Standing Committees of the Senate were appointed. Hon. J. B. Varnum, Jr., of New York was chosen Speaker of the Assembly. Gov. Hunt sent in a message arguing the merits of the new act which brought the last session abruptly to a close; pressing the importance of completing the canal en arge-ments, and various other internal improvements.

A movement being on foot at Richmond, Va., to raise $10,000 for the Male Orphan Society there, the banking firm of Selden, Withers & Co., at Washington—who are native Virginians—have offered a donation of $400 whenever that sum shall complete the subscription. Another gentleman at Richmond proposed to give $100, if ninety-nine others would do the same, and there are only thirty-six names now wanting to accomplish it.

A little school girl in McDonough county, Ill., near the village of McComb, was charged with stealing a piece of money by her mistress, who threatened to hang her if she did not confess. She protested her innocence, when the mistress proceeded to put a handkerchief around her neck, with which she lifted the child from the floor, dislocating her neck!

The Hagerstown (Md.) News says that several persons in that place have been stung by locusts in the past week. It says: "In each case the parties were stung in the hand, which became much swollen and somewhat painful. The parties were also in each case, of such an age as to preclude the possibility of a mistake as to what it was by which they were stung."

A few days ago, in the Burlington court, the jury in an assault and battery case could not agree. As soon as the difficulty became apparent, they obtained a quantity of provisions and liquors on which they feasted. Some of them got quite lively procured a violin, with which they amused themselves. They so far stepped beyond the bounds of duty, that the judge told them they were a disgrace to the county.

A dispatch dated Boston, Monday, June 16, states that the case of Hayden for aiding in the rescue of Shadrach, the Fugitive Slave, was given to the Jury at 1 o'clock to-day in an able charge from Judge Sprague. The Jury came in at 6, unable to agree upon the evidence. The Judge directed them to retire, and report to-morrow morning at 9 o clock.

A Mr. C. Hopkins of Pittsford N. Y., was recently engaged in sawing wood wtth a buzz saw, driven by horse power, when the saw flew from the mandrel, while it was revolving at the greatest speed, and struck Mr. H. with great violence, cutting off his collar bone, several of his ribs, and actually lacerating his lungs, leaving them exposed to view through the external wound.

On the night of June 3d the store of Asa Fish, Esq., of Mystic Bridge, Ct., was entered by thieves, who, by boring a hole into the iron safe and introducing powder, produced an explosion which burst the safe and came near rending the building. They took some $300 which they found in the safe. No trace of them has been discovered.

A dispatch dated Boston, Monday, June 9, says: Lewis Hayden colored, a second-hand clothes dealer, of some property, was put on trial this morning for aiding in the rescue of Shadrach. The prisoner is defended by Hon. J. P. Hale and R. H. Dana, jr. This case presents the same features as the former one.

The President of Middlebury College, Vt., since his mission to Boston to raise a $35,000 fund, has been at New York and added $10,000 or more to the subscription, making the amount now raised about $25,000. $10,000 more is wanted to place the College in the position desired by its friends.

The Chicago Journal states that those who arrived in the Queen City, on Friday evening, were but fifty-two hours from New York city. And yet an individual, before the boat reached the landing, made desperate attempts to get off, by climbing over the guards. Fifty-two hours from New York, and yet the man was in a hurry!

The Catocin (Md.) Whig says: "Throughout all Middleton valley we have the most cheering accounts of the crops—the Wheat, Rye, Corn, &c., never before looked so promising for an abundant yield as at the present season." The Frederick Citizen says: "Not within our recollection has the Wheat crop at this season promised so fine a yield in this country."

On removing an old house adjoining the Seminary buildings, at Aston Ridge, in Delaware county, Pa., a beam was discovered distinctly marked February 26th, 1704. A lead medal was also taken from the cellar wall. The house was built by a Dutton family, who were the associates of Wm. Penn.

The abundance of summer vegetables and fruits now in New York market is so great as to create general surprise. Beets, turnips, new potatoes, of the largest size, green peas, and potatoes, are to be seen on all the stalls of all the small markels in every part of the city.

The following is the number of physicians in the city of Philadelphia:—Regular physicians, 397; homœopathic, 42; hydropathic, 2; Thompsonian, 50; advertising doctors, 32; dsuggist physicians, 37; nondescripts, 42; total, 582.

Every week, 40,000 pounds of starch, said to be of the best quality are manufactured Oswego; it is good for both the laundry and for food. The produce amounts to $120,000 a year, and the weekly amount of corn used is 2000 bushels.

Some idea of the cost of royalty in England may be formed from the fact that the Prince of Wales, though under ten years of age, has a revenue of nearly $300,000 per annum from the Duchy of Cornwall.

The Worcester (Mass.) Spy, of the 9th inst., says on Sunday afternoon, as one of the Professors of the Catholic College in this city, was proceeding homeward from the church on Temple-st. in an open buggy, the high-spirited horses attached to the vehicle suddenly took fright, and in spite of all the efforts of the driver, upset the carriage. The driver escaped with only a few slight bruises, but we regret to say that the Professor was seriously, if not dangerously hurt. One leg was broken, and so bent under him that the fractured bone protruded through the flesh and skin. Surgical assistance was promptly rendered, but the result of examination by the physicians we have not heard.

A Convention of Christians of all denominations, who believe the system of slaveholding to be sinful, is called to be held at Chicago, Ill., on the 3d of July next. We learn from the Oberlin Evangelist that arrangements are being made for conveying the delegates at half price. Through tickets can be had from Cleveland for $5. The Golden Rule says:—"If we rightly understand, this meeting is not merely anti-slavery, but anti-sin, a meeting of general reform, a united consecrated onset against all sin, the works of darkness and death."

At a Mass-Meeting at Burlington, Vt., recently, Milton Clark stated that when he escaped from Slavery into the Free States, he was soon supplied by friends with letters to different persons to help him on his way northward, and among them was one Millard Fillmore, who seemed rejoiced at his escape, harbored him, gave him money, and helped him on his way—performing, in fact, the very acts which he says now shall be visited with condign punishment!

In the Superior Court, on the 5th inst., Judge Oakley presiding, in the case of C. St. John, H. A. Burr, and Alva B. Taylor, vs. The American Mutual Fire and Marine Insurance Company, the claim of the plantiffs for loss occasioned by the blowing up of their foundry in Hague street was sustained, and a verdict rendered against the Insurance Company for the full amount of the claim and interest. In defense, it was urged that the explosion resulted from a want of proper caution.

Near Westchester, Pa., last week, a young man named Hamorton was severely stung on the hand by a young locust, in consequence of which the arm soon became much swollen up to the shoulder, attended with considerable pain. The general impression seems to be that the locust has no sting. The female nevertheless has a spiral sting, and some deaths have been ascribed to wounds inflicted by it.

A dispatch dated St. Louis, Saturday, June 7, says:—"The Mississippi river still continues to rise, and the whole length of our levee is submerged; the merchants in that vicinity are, consequently, moving their goods from the ground floors. A large amount of produce on the levee has already been injured by the high stage of water and the difficulty in shipping and landing goods has nearly caused a suspension of business.

A destructive fire occurred at Fitchburg, Mass., Wednesday, June 11, consuming a number of buildings owned by Shepherd Atherton, of Newton-lane and occupied as planing, machine, chair, and iron furnace factories. The loss is estimated at $20,000 on which there is but a slight insurance. Messrs. Damon and Saunders are the principal sufferers.

The President has decided in favor of detached wings to the capitol—the detachments to be covered by colonnades, so as to present the tout ensemble of the whole building, and yet preserve the old capitol. The plan of a young architect of New Hampshire, is of this character, and probably it will be selected.

Private accounts from Mexico convey the distressing intelligence that a grat drouth has for a long time prevailed in the state of Zacatecas. No rain had fallen since last August, and a general famine was impending. Corn was worth $9 per bushel.

A mass convention of the mechanics of Georgia is to be held on the 4th of July, to take into consideration the interests of that class of citizens. Strong efforts are made by the mechanics of Georgia to exclude negroes from all mechanical employments.

Dispatches from Quincy June 11, state that the rise in the upper Mississippi is unprecedented. Some sections of the O'Reilly telegraph lines on the flats above Quincy are unable to work for a few days, owing to the floods being higher than the wires.

Within 30 hours of Tuesday and Wednesday last no less than six splendid Ocean Steamers arrived at the port of New York, bringing news from all parts of the world. They were the Washington, North America, Empire City, Alabama, Marion, and Asia.

A letter of the notorious Levi Cole, who is now in the Rhode Island State Prison, on a charge of forgery, was intercepted the other day, and disclosed where 30,000 counterfeit dollars were hidden in an old wall.

The President having adopted the plan submitted by Mr. Walter for the enlargement of the Capitol, the corner stone will be laid on the 4th of July next.

Hon. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, has almost recovered from the injuries he received a short time since.

New potatoes, the first of the season, are selling in the Cincinnati market at $4 per bushel.

A fossil kangaroo has been found at Middleton, Conn. It was taken from a quarry.

In the Boston Municipal Court on Saturday, Julian McCrea and B. F. Roberts (both colored) were found guilty upon the charge of assault with intent to kidnap Thomas P. Smith, a very respectable colored man, who gave offense to some of his colored brethren by opposing the abolition of separate schools for colored children. The offence is a very serious one, and was committed under very aggravated circumstances.

At a Convention of Universalist clergymen held in Chicopee, Mass., many of the leading men of the denomination being present, a resolution was almost unanimously adopted, protesting against the Fugitive Slave Law as an outrage upon humanity, worthy of no obedience, and demanding speedy repeal.

We learn that the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church, acting upon the suggestion of the Court in the late trial respecting the church property, have proposed to the commissioners of the Church South, "an adjustment of their preferred claims by a legal arbitration under the authority of the Court."

The Utica and Syracase railroad Company have constructed at their works in Oneida, five new passenger cars, with doors on the side instead of the end, in order to prevent persons from standing on the platform.

The Ephiscopal Convention of Rhode Island assembled in Providence on Tuesday. Rev. D. R. Brewer of Newport, preached the opening sermon. The Bishop's report represented the Church in that Diocese to be in a prosperous condition.

As the President of a Court in Darmstadt was recently passing sentence upon a convict for forgery, he was struck by apoplexy and died. His name was Baentano and he was a man of learning and irreproachable character.

The Ladies' Wreath.

PROSPECTUS OF THE SIXTH VOLUME.—The May number commenced Vol. VI. of this popular Magazine; and the Publishers confidently assert, that the forthcoming volume will rival, in the beauty and elegance of its Embellishments, and the Literary Merit of its contents, any former volume, or any Dollar Magazine in the World! Each number will contain one or more fine Steel Engravings, and a beautifully colored Flower Plate. It will be printed on Fine White Paper, with Large, Clear-Faced Type. The best Writers in the country have been engaged to enrich its pages, and no pains will be spared to make it what it assumes to be—a Model Magazine.

The Editorial Department will be conducted by Helen Irving, a lady justly celebrated for her refined taste and extensive literary acquirements; besides occasional gems from the pen of Mrs. S. T. Martyn, the late Editress, under whose control the work has secured its present high standard of literature and moral excellence, and a circulation unparalleled by any similar work. The present Editress will be sustained by a list of Contributors not excelled by any periodical in the country; many of them are among the most popular writers of the day.

The Musical Department, under the control of an eminent Professor, will be enriched by Original Pieces from some of the ablest Composers.

Particular Notice!—Postage Reduced!—On and after the 1st of July, the Postage on the "Wreath," within 500 miles of the office of publication, will be one cent per number; and any distance over 500 and within 1,500 miles, two cents—if paid quarterly in advance.

Terms.—The subscription price of the "Ladies' Wreath" is One Dollar a year—invariably in advance. Best Terms to Clubs.—We offer to Clubs the following low terms, which are very near the cost: Four copies for one year, to be sent to one address, $3; Eight do. do. $6; Fourteen do. do $10; Twenty do. do. $14. Any person wishing to get up a Club, will be supplied with a Specimen Number by writing for it, and paying the postage. Bound Volumes are always on hand, and will be exchanged for numbers in good order, by paying the price of Binding. Back Numbers can always be supplied.

☞ One Hundred Efficient Agents Wanted, to canvass all parts of the country. To men of energy, furnishing testimonials of character, liberal encouragement will be given. Postmasters are authorized to act as Agents. Address, J. M. FLETCHER & CO.,

New Era for the "Best Youth's Magazine!"

☞ GREAT REDUCTION OF POSTAGE! ☜

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET

STILL under the editorial charge of Francis C. Woodworth, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, commences a new series with the issue of the number for July, 1851. This number is now ready. Now is the time to subscribe.

The great reduction in postage goes into effect on the first day of July. From and after that day, the postage on a single number of the Cabinet (paid quarterly, in advance) will be, for any distance not over 500 miles, 1 cent; over 500, and not over 1500, 2 cents—it being a reduction to all subscribers within 500 miles from 42 cents to 12 cents per annum, to all other subscribers in the Union a reduction of almost one half from the old rates. The publisher anticipates, as the result of this liberal reduction, a large and immediate addition to his subscription list from every part of the country, as the former high rates of postage have deterred many from receiving the work by mail.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet, in its reading matter, in the number, variety, and beauty of its illustrations, and in its general costume, now stands at the head of all monthly publications for the young. "It is unqualifiedly the best youth's magazine in America."—Brattleboro Democrat. "It is a model for all works of its class. We cannot too warmly commend it."—N. Y. Tribune. "It gives us pleasure to recommend it to our southern friends."—Balt. West. Continent. "Best magazine for youth we have ever seen."—Christ. Adv. & Jour. "It is a little world within itself."—N. Y. Independent. "Best publication of its class that I am acquainted with."—Rev. Dr. Adams.

Each number contains 32 pages, and some 8 or 10 beautiful engravings. The reading matter is just such as is best adapted to amuse, entertain, and instruct the young mind.

☞ Please send on your orders at once. Specimen numbers can be seen at the office of this paper, or they will be forwarded, gratis, on application, (post paid,) to the publisher. Subscribers may send money by mail, at the publisher's risk.

Terms, (invariably in advance,) $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5.

Clergymen, postmasters, editors, and school teachers, who will form clubs of four or more, and who will forward the money, shall be allowed an additional copy for their trouble; or they are authorized to retain 25 per cent. on all new subscriptions, where the full price ($1) is paid.

Bound volumes, (of which there are now 5,) $1 25 each; the whole set, $5 50.

☞ Postage Free!—Subscribers at a distance, who will remit the full price ($1 25 each), shall receive the volumes postage free. These volumes contain nearly 500 pages each.

AGENTS WANTED.

The publisher wishes to employ several gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, Publisher.
118 Nassau-st., New York.

Note.—The publishers or editors of those newspapers to whom this advertisement is sent, marked, are requested to give it (not including this note) some half a dozen conspicuous insertions; for which they shall be entitled to receive a copy of the Cabinet, monthly, for two years, on their sending to the address of "Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet" copies of the papers containing the advertisement; or, if preferred, they shall receive one volume of the Cabinet bound in muslin, and a copy of "Woodworth's Stories about Animals," illustrated with 40 engravings. Those who prefer the latter, must signify such preference and inform us how the books are to be sent. D. A. Woodworth.

Miscellaneous.

AN EDICT AGAINST CHSISTIANITY.

The following curious and interesting Chinese document against Christianity is the production of a Government Official—a Prefect of the department of Kea-ying Chau, in the Canton Province, China. The writer is a man of high literary attainments and extensive reading:—

Wan, acting Prefect of the independent Chow of Kea-ying, who has been raised ten steps, and recorded ten times, issues an earnest proclamation—to rectify the hearts of men, and assert the dignity of the laws.

Among the nations of the West, there is a religion, called that of the Lord of Heaven, which began with Jesus. Into the transmission and practice of it among the barbarians of those regions themselves, their expositions of its books, and observance of its ceremonies, it does not belong to us to inquire. But they are not permitted to enter the Inner Land, and propagate its doctrines; and inhabitants of the Inner Land, who shall invite men of (those) distant places, and, joining in league with them, excite and inveigle women, and commit bad practices in violation of the laws, are to be dealt with, as in former times, according to the prescribed statutes. The regulations of these are definite and perspicuous; will any one dare to refuse to observe them?

Throughout this Chow, the doctrines of our established literature are highly prized; the manners and customs of the people are famed for their excellence; the fragrance of their learning has rested on many families for generations—we are not going to forsake the doctrines of the sages and worthies of the Middle Kingdom, and run ignorantly to those of that religion. I have heard, however, lately, that in the village of Choo-K'ang and the neighborhood, some ignorant stupid people have invited men from distant parts, and also that some females have adopted their principles, (the whole proceeding) being a serious violation of the laws. Now, besides searching out and apprehending the guilty parties who have invited those men, and leagued with them, and punishing them according to the old statutes, it is proper for me to issue an earnest proclamation—which I do accordingly, for the full information of all, both soldiers and people.

Be it known to you all, that Jesus was born in the time of the Emperor Gae of the Han dynasty. He was barely able to save people by curing their diseases, and is to be ranked only with such persons as Hwa, To, and Chuh Yew. He was also able to divide seven cakes, so as to feed with them three thousand men, but this was no more than one of the sleight-of-hand tricks of the Taouists. This was the extent of his ability, and yet he falsely called himself the Lord who made the heavens, and said that heaven, earth, men, and all things, were produced and perfected by him. In regard to this, I beg you to consider—Before the Emperor Gae, of Han, there were the three Sovereigns, the five Emperors, Yaou, Shun, Yu, Tang, Wan, and Woo, Chow Kung, and Confucius, all, in the place of heaven, propagating (true) transforming doctrines. Even among the nations beyond the seas, at an early period, there were princes and people, there were governments supported by penal laws, there were other laws as well. How then can it be said that (the heavens and earth and all things) were not made till Jesus made his appearance in the time of the Emperor Gae of the Han dynasty?

In the Hae Kwoh T'oo Che, we find that Mary, the mother of Jesus, had a husband named Joseph, but that Jesus cast away his father and broke off all intercourse with him, saying that he had been born by his mother, while she was a virgin, and falsely calling himself the Lord who made the heavens. On this account, he would not suffer those who entered his religion to sacrifice to their forefathers or to sovereign-princes, or to any of the spirits of heaven and earth, or to the images of the sages. He deceived the world and imposed on the people. He removed the authority of heaven and of law, of parents, and of princes. He destroyed the virtues of filial piety and of loyalty, of benevolence and of righteousness. Thus he aroused the indignation of Heaven, which proceeded to cut him off, employing for that purpose the instrumentality of the King of Judea. (This prince) apprehended Jesus, clearly determined his guilt, and nailed him to a cross, according to the laws of the kingdom. There his blood flowed out over his body, till he was unable to move, and died. Orders were given to the people of the neighborhood to bury him, but his vagabond disciples falsely declared that in three days from his burial he came to life again, and after more than forty days flew up (to heaven.) (This story) was contrived (to serve as a ground) for propagating his doctrines and imposing on men. (The case) was just like that of Sun Gan, who drowned himself after the defeat of his soldiers, and whose followers then gave out that he had become a water-sprite; or like that of (the head) of the white lily sect, who was cut into ten thousand pieces, and whose partisans reported that his body had disengaged itself under the metal knives, made its escape away, been transformed, and ascended up among the Genii.

If the account be not (a forgery) like these, how is it possible that he who was the Lord of heaven, should yet not have been able to preserve himself from being bound and crucified to death by ordinary mortals? His followers indeed have glossed over the fact, saying that the Lord of heaven received (the punishment) of sin for men, but this is also laughable. The Lord and Ruler of heaven and earth—was it impossible for him to get an escape for men from their sins, and must he receive the punishment of sin in their behalf? (The tale is plainly designed) to cover over the fact of his crucifixion and death!

(The advocates of) this religion put forward its admonitions to virtue and warnings against wickedness, but these are nothing more than what is constantly spoken in our literature. When they say, "Believe on the Lord of heaven, and you will have happiness, and after death your soul shall ascend to heaven; refuse to believe on the Lord of heaven, and you will have misery, and after death your soul shall enter hell." This is like what Woo San-sze said, "He that allows that I am good, is a good man; he that says that I am bad, is a bad man." Suppose that all the believers on the Lord of heaven were thieves and robbers and wicked men—according to this principle, they should all receive happiness. And suppose that all who refused to believe on the Lord of heaven were good men, accumulating acts of virtue—they ought to be visited with misery. Never have the principles on which virtue is rewarded and vice punished been turned upside down and confounded in such a manner. Does not (the system) evidently cut itself off from the principles of heaven?

Moreover, the expressions about "heaven's hall" and "earth's prison," (which the followers of Jesus use,) are nothing more than a plagiarism of the most miserable stories and superabundant spume of the Budhists, and yet they turn round and revile the Budhists, saying that they fall forever into hell. Who, pray, ever saw them there? (No one did,) but the crucifixion of Jesus alive was like, (what the Budhists feign,) suffering from the forests of swords and mountains of knives in hell, and is moreover a matter supported by certain proofs.

Still further, I find that, among all the nations beyond the seas, there is not one so distinguished for its faith in the Lord of heaven as Germany. That kingdom, notwithstanding, has been torn in pieces, and broken down, and more than one portion of it has been taken and is held by (strangers.) Why has not prosperity been granted to it, being (such) a believer in the Lord of heaven? On the other hand, of the nations who do not believe in the Lord of heaven, there is none so opposed to this religion as Japan. On the landing place at its (principal) port they cut out a cross. When any merchant visits the kingdom and goes on shore, if he will not tread upon that cross, he is immediately beheaded. Outside their city gates also, they have buried an image of Jesus, that it may every day receive the disgrace of being trodden upon. Notwithstanding these things, the kingdom has been transmitted for more than two thousand years. Why has the Lord of heaven not visited it with calamities? It is plain that the statements of his power to confer happiness and misery are merely vague assertions, incapable of proof, which serve only to make the stupid people, in their life-time; cast off their forefathers, not permitting them to enjoy the fragrant offerings in the sacrificial vessels, and, after death, to become blind devils, which endure torment twice greater than if their bones were burnt and the ashes scattered abroad. What pleasure can there be in following such a religion?

As to the reverencing of the cross—we find the cross spoken of in the tablet of the "Illustrious Religion," "He determined the four quarters according to the figure of a cross." I do not know at what time this religion devised the story of the crucifixion on the cross, but supposing the thing really took place, for the followers of Jesus to honor and reverence the instrument on which he suffered punishment, and to say that it is Jesus, and not to dare to tread upon it or walk across it, is to me inexplicable. Suppose that a man's grandfather or father had been killed by a fowling-piece or a sword, what would be thought of him, if he were to reverence a fowling-piece or a sword, just as if it were his grandfather or father?

Now, though a recent regulation permits the barbarians to explain their books to one another, it does not permit them confusedly to enter the Inner Land and propagate their doctrines. If there be any pretending to be barbarians, or if persons of the Inner Land invite men of distant parts, and, joining in league with them, excite and deceive the people, inveigle women, and commit bad practices in violation of the laws, they are to be dealt with, as in former times, according to the prescribed statutes. Strangulation immediate, or suspended only during a representation to the Emperor, banishment to the most distant frontiers, or to a distance of two or three thousand le, or at least, from this Chow, or beating with the large bamboo, these are the punishments, and in the infliction of them no indulgent leniency can be shown.

If parties, however, present themselves to the magistrate, repenting of their guilt, and will walk over a crucifix, the degree of their criminality shall be determined, and a portion of the punishment remitted according to a scale. The laws of the kingdom are severe, and yet they have never refused to allow men to repent of their errors. If any of you stupid people have been deluded (by this religion,) be quick and come to your senses, make public acknowledgment of your guilt, and avoid falling into the net of the law. If any of you hate your own bodies, and will follow the religion of the Lord of heaven, you shall forthwith be apprehended, and punished as a warning to the blinded and obstinate.

Let (the heads of) those families, on which the fragrance of their learning has rested for generations, determine on the (necessary) regulations, and suspend them in their ancestral temples. Parties who enter this religion cut themselves off by the act from their forefathers, and ought to be publicly and by common consent driven from among their kindred, and immediately reported to the magistrates—to maintain the rectitude of the social bonds and relations.

HONGKONG, October 24th, 1850.

THE POPE'S PALACE AT ROME.

A correspondent of the St. Louis Republican gives the following account of the priceless treasures of Art which the Popes have in the course of a thousand years gathered in the famed Vatican, so that it is now incomparably the first Palace in the world.

"In a former letter I made allusion to the Vatican, the Grand Palace of the Pope, adjoining St. Peters. This is probably the most interesting palace in the world. It has been used for more than a thousand years, and how much longer is not certainly known. Charlemagne, it is said, resided here at the time he was crowned by Leo 3d, in the 8th century. Its length is eleven hundred and fifty-one English feet—about five times as long as the Planters' House at St. Louis, and its breadth is seven hundred and sixty-seven feet. It has no regularity or outward architectural beauty to recommend it, for it has received so many additions on different plans, and undergone so many changes during the reign of its numerous occupants, each of whom has pulled down or built up according to his own taste, that the most you can say of its exterior is, that it is a huge pile. But its museums of antiquities and exquisite works of art are unrivalled. The number of paintings, frescoes and mosaics, to say nothing of the relics of past ages that are garnered here, is almost incredible. No labor or expense has been spared to make this the depository of every thing that is beautiful in art or wonderful and interesting in antiquity. It has, as I have mentioned, four thousand four hundred and twenty-two apartments, and one of these, the Hall of the Candelabra, is one thousand feet long. Not only are the walls of the various rooms covered with rich paintings, but the ceiling overhead is adorned with many of the finest frescoes in the world. Every scene, almost, described in the Bible, you will find here represented in tapestry, mosaic, frescoe or oils, and the historical events of ages, with the heroes of every age and all the mythological and allegorical figures of classic lore, are all embodied before you. In the Gallery Lapidary, you almost feel that you are walking through a cemetery. Embedded in the walls on the sides of the room, are all the marble inscriptions that have been removed from the ruined tombs and columbara, to the number of three thousand or more. On one side are the Pagan inscriptions, and on the other are those of the early Christians, in Greek or Latin, many of them originally found in the catecombs.

I was greatly interested in the Hall of Busts. Here I saw Alexander Severus, Marcus Aurelius, Cato, Septimus Severus, Nero, Adrian, Julia, the daughter of Titus, &c.

In the Hall of the Greek Cross are two sarcophagi of great beauty. They are made of porphyry and are of immense size. One contains the remains of St. Constantia, and the other of the Empress Helena.

The Library contains manuscripts, Greek, Latin, and Oriental, to the amount of twenty-three thousand five hundred and eighty. There is no other such collection in the world. The number of printed books is only thirty-thousand. Among the treasures of the Library is a Virgil of the 4th century, with a portrait of Virgil himself; a large Hebrew Bible, in folio, for which the Jews of Venice once offered its weight in gold; seventeen letters of Henry the VIII to Anne Boleyn, nine in French and eight in English; several manuscripts of Luther, and numberless other literary curiosities."

UNCLE SAM'S CROTCHET:

AND HOW HE GOT RID OF IT.

I always regarded Uncle Sam as a very worthy man. I liked to be in his family. He had a wife, and a house full of promising children. Everything used to go on very harmoniously. Uncle Sam's word was of course a law to them all. They loved to have it so; for he was among the most reasonable and considerate of men, and they were sure of prosperity and pleasant times, so long as they could have him at the head of the family affairs.

So it used to be when I was a boy. I remember but one exception to this happy course of things. Whether Uncle Sam had got the gout, or the toothache, or an indigestion, or how it came to pass, I never could certainly learn; but so it was that he came home one day with a most unaccountable crotchet in his head, that threw the whole family into a state of perplexity and utter amazement. He began by abruptly ordering my cousin Tom, who had just made a bow and arrow which he was quite proud of, to throw them into the fire. Tom stared—my aunt held up both hands in astonishment; and when the order was repeated she ventured very gently to interpose a word in favor of the plaything. Tom was a pleasant boy; he had been amusing himself quietly; it was really a good thing every way for him to have a bow and arrow; why should he, just as he got them finished, be obliged to burn them up? Children must obey their parents, roared Uncle Sam at the top of his voice. And the bow and arrow were burned.

To pass over the particulars of this dark time, my poor Uncle was every hour making some such absured and cruel requisition. The children bore up under it wonderfully; for their love and respect were boundless. At length, however, even the elastic and ingenuous spirit of boyhood gave way. Tom and his brothers grew less frank and open—they began to contrive ways to avoid their farther's orders—they would shun his presence; and as they could not enjoy themselves in the old way they more and more chose their own path, and paid less and less regard to the spirit and intent of his commands. It satisfied them if they could contrive to avoid a direct and open rupture.

This state of things grieved my aunt to the heart; she saw that the principles of the boys were in a fair way to be utterly ruined; and finally, with the courage of mingled affection and despair, she met Uncle Sam with a decided remonstrance against some unreasonable command, at war alike with the happiness and the character of the children; for the fact was that my poor Uncle had partially lost that quick sense of justice and honor that we all used so pleasantly and rejoiceingly to confide in.

This remonstrance brought things to a crisis. Uncle Sam stormed and fretted the whole day;—day after day, indeed, for I know not how long, he was like a cage of unclean beasts—his heart seemed a mere mass of feastering sourness aud ill-temper.

My aunt was at her wit's end. To endure this—that herself and her children should live so, seemed a trial too severe to be thought of. Whether she had ever read the "Taming of the Shrew," or where she got her first hint, I do not know; but when he rppeared at breakfast one morning, she desperately turned the tables upon him. The first salutation, and in a tone of mingled vinegar and pepper, was, Husbands, love your wives. And with every varying style of preverseness and ill-humor that female ingenuity could suggest, Husbands, love your wives, was dinned in Uncle Sam's astonished ear from morn till dewy eve. He tried to expostulate; but her tongue was the quickest, and her tones the keenest; and if the man's brow lowered, the woman's whole face and person seemed transformed of a sudden into a meet organ of whatever is—not lovely.

Uncle Sam did not sleep that night. The terrible sound, indeed, was hushed; but the words seemed still to ring in his wearied ears and trembled through his tortured brain.

The next morning Uncle Sam was calm. He met his family with a serious, but certainly not an angry look. My aunt's eye told her at once what had been going on, and she was silent. At length with some effort, Uncle Sam opend his heart. He had been wrong, he said. The command to children to obey their parents was a wise one, and obligatory; but he had not considered, as he ought, the duty of the parent to take care that his commands were such as ought to be given. The authority was given to the parent, because in a family such authority must be lodged somewhere, for the sake of harmony; and of course it should be with those who have the requisite knowledge, experience, and power. Throughout the universe, the principle of submission to authority obtains. The child comes into being immortal; and it will be his duty to reverence and obey forever and ever. He is placed in circumstances best calculated to form the habit of reverence and obedience from the earliest development of his powers. The superior knowledge and power, and the affectionate care of parents, naturally lead to a loving and confiding obedience; such, my Uncle said with emotion, as had ao long rendered his own family harmonious and happy. He was convinced that the parent ought to be as careful about his command, as the child about his obedience; for the great object, after all, is to cultivate the spirit of the child, that he may love and reverently obey for ever.

And Tom, my Uncle added, you are old enough to understand how this applies to larger communities as well as to the family. The citizen must obey the commands, that is, the laws, of the State. But those laws ought to be good. Those who form them are under the highest obligations to set before us no laws but such as a well-disposed citizen will instinctively respect and rejoice to obey.

And, my dear, said he at last, turning with a smile and a moistened eye to my aunt—(whose face had been concealed, I noticed, while he was speaking)—you are quite right in saying that husbands ought to love their wives; nor can I blame you, when I remember the circumstances, for making me feel, as I never felt before, that, in order to justify that love, wives ought to be lovely.

THE FLAX MOVEMENT:

Its National Importance and Advantages, with Directions for the Preparation of Flax Cotton, and the Cultivation of Flax: By the Chevalier Claussen.

Such is the full title of a fresh London pamplet just reprinted in a neat, compact octavo of 46 pages by John Wiley, 304 Broadway. The subject is just now one of deep interest to America as well as England, and portends a speedy and comprehensive revolution in Agriculture, Commerce, and Manufactures. M. Claussen's essay embodies many facts of general interest though it by no means exhausts the topic. It was not needed to convince us that Flax is destined speedily and formidably to rival Cotton, and it was not possible to print within so narrow a compass all the facts and explanations pertinent to the general theme. But the whole ground is gone over, and the conclusions are most encouraging. We copy from it M. Claussen's description of his process for the PREPARATION OF FLAX COTTON.

The principle of the invention by which flax is adapted for spinning upon cotton, wool, and silk, independent of flax machinery, consists in destroying the cylindrical or tubular character of the fibre, by means of carbonic or other gas, the action of which splits the tubes into a number of ribbon-like filaments, solid in character, and of a gravity less than cotton, the upper and under surfaces of which are segments of circles, and the sides of which are ragged and serrated. In order to explain the nature of the process by which this change is effected, it is necessary first to explain the structure of the flax plant. The stem of the plant consists of three parts; the shove or wood, the pure fibre, and the gum, resin, or glutinous matter which causes the fibres to adhere together. In the preparation of the plant for any purpose of fine manufacture, it is necessary first to separate from the pure fibre both the woody part and the glutinous substance. The former of these may be removed by mechanical means, previously referred to, almost as simple as those employed in the threshing of wheat. In order, however, to remove the glutinous substance from the fibre, recourse must be had either to the fermentation produced in the steeping process, or to some other chemical agent. The present system of steeping in water, whether cold or hot, is, however, ineffectual for the complete removal of the glutinous substances adhering to the fibres, a large per centage of which is insoluble in water. The first process, therefore, which it is necessary to adopt in the preparation of flax cotton, is to obtain a perfect and complete disintegration of the substance which binds them together.

This is effected by boiling the flax for about three hours, either in the state in which it comes from the field, or in a partially cleaned condition, in water containing about one-half per cent. of common soda. After undergoing this process, the flax is placed in water, slightly acidulated with sulphuric acid; the proportions of acid used being 1 to 500 of water. Any objections urged in the employment of such substances, even in the small proportions above stated, are at once met by the fact that the soda present in the straw after the first process, neutralizes the whole of the acid, and forms a neutral salt, known as sulphate of soda. This process, producing as it does, a complete separation of the integral fibres from each other, is equally adapted for the preparation of long fibre for the linen, or of short fibre for the other branches of textile manufacture. When required to be prepared for linen, all that is necessary after the above process, is to dry and scutch it in the ordinary modes. The advantages which this mode of preparation possesses over any other mode now in use, are stated in the official report of the proceedings at the Royal Agricultural Society, to be the following:

1. "That the preparation of long fibre for scutching is effected in less than one day, and is always uniform in strength, and entirely free from color, much facilitating the after process of bleaching, either in yarns or in cloth.

2. "That it can be also bleached in the straw at very little aditional expense of time or money.

3. "That the former tedious and uncertain modes of steeping are superseded by one perfectly certain with ordinary care.

4. "That in consequence of a more complete severance of the fibres from each other, and also from the bark and boon, the process of scutching is effected with half the labor usually employed."

Complete, however, as may be the separation produced by this mode of treatment, the fibres, from their tubular and cylindrical character, are still adapted only for the linen or present flax manufactures, as their comparatively harsh and elastic character unfits them for spinning on the ordinary cotton or woolen machinery. At this stage, therefore, it is that the most important part of the invention is brought into operation. The flax, either before or after undergoing the processes required for the severance of the fibres, is cut by a suitable machine into the required lengths, and saturated in a solution of bi-carbonate of soda (common baking soda,) a sufficient length of time to allow of the liquid entering into, and permeating by capillary attraction every part of the small tubes. When sufficiently saturated, the fibres are taken out, immersed in a solution of dilute sulphuric acid of the strength of about one part to two hundred parts of water. The action of the acid on the soda contained in the tube, liberates the carbonic gas which it contains; the expansive power of which causes the fibres to split and produces the result above described. The fibre is then bleached, and after having been dried, and carded in the same manner as cotton, is fit for being spun upon the ordinary cotton or woolen machinery; the material at this stage possessing the qualities described in the Manchester Examiner and Times, and to which allusion has already been made. The practicability of transforming flax into this cotton-like substance, was demonstrated at the last meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society, and the Secretary, Mr. Hudson, referring, in his report of the proceedings, to the experiment which then took place, says:—

"Although we have long been practically familiar with the expansive effects of æriform fluids suddenly disengaged chemically from an apparently solid and inert substance, like gunpowder, either in fire-arms or in the blasting of rocks, and with their elastic recoil when released from the pressure of condensation, as in the air gun, or the liquid gasses of Dr. Faraday, we were not prepared for so beautiful an instance of the application of this principle as the one Chevalier Claussen has given us, in the splitting of vegetable fibre, by conveying into its interstices the carbonic acid gas concealed in condensation and chemical alliance with soda, and then setting it free by the addition of acid, which breaks off that alliance by its own superior elective affinity for the alkali. Means shown in their result to be so powerful, and in their operation so gentle yet decisive, gave to the simple experiment, made in the presence of the council by Professor Way, more the air of a new instance of natural magic, than the sober reality of an ordinary operation of natural laws, of which the application only was novel; and its effect on the meeting was accordingly both singular and striking, occasioning evident marks of their agreeable surprise and admiration at the result obtained. The flax fibre soaked in the solution of sub-carbonate of soda was no sooner immersed in the vessel containing the acidulated water, than its character became at once changed, from that of a damp rigid aggregation of flax to a light expansive mass of cottony texture, increasing in size like leavening dough, or an expanding sponge. The change was no less striking when this converted mass in its turn was placed in the next vessel which contained the hypo chlorite of magnesia, and became at once bleached, attaining then the color, as it had just before received the texture, of cotton."

MARRIAGE.

God having planted the social principle in the nature of the first man, provided him with a help meet for him—one who should be his companion, his solace, and closest friend—one emphatically a part of himself, and endowed with all the tenderest sympathies of his own nature, even in a pre-eminent degree.

The marriage relationship, therefore, is the most intimate that can be formed, and when based on appropriateness of mental and moral choice, and hallowed by fervent affection, is of all others the most conductive to human comfort and enjoyment.

It is a union, however, that requires wisdom and prudence rightly to form; and much kind care and discretion to maintain, in all its close and sacred associations, unimpaired.

How few seem to be acquainted with its true merits and importance! One is enamored with a beautiful face or handsome form, and is utterly indifferent as to the mental or the moral qualifications possessed.

Some merely seek a dowry, and are much more wedded to the purse than the person.

And some enter upon it lightly and unadvisedly, as if it were a contract that could be dissolved at will, or broken at pleasure.

This never can be a concern of small import, or of minor moment; it is a life-lease of increased good, that nothing else can give; or of protracted grief and sorrow, that the opening grave alone absorbs.

Be wise, then, in this high concern; enter on its path with care and prudence, and seek that heavenly wisdom may direct thy steps, and give to thee the richest earthly treasure—a wise, affectionate, and virtuous wife.

And woman, let not thy kind and unsuspecting nature supplant that wise and prudent forethought which thou shouldst with circumspection exercise most rigidly, when thou art moved to enter the marriage circle.

To thee, this step, next to the favor of thy God, is all in all.

From henceforth, not thine own, but his whose rule will be kind and congenial to thy gentle nature, or rude and violent, and destructive of all thy peace and joy.

Let no foolish thought invade thy mind, that it is not honorable to live and die unweded, and make thee anxious the first presented bait to seize. It were better, beyond all compare, if thou hadst many generations here on earth to live, to be consigned to deepest solitude, than dwell with one unfitted for the close endearing kindness, that happy marriages involve.

The wisest, noblest, and happiest of thy sex, have been those women who would not throw their peace and hopes away, where confidence could not be fully placed, or warm affection yielded, with the certainty of a full reciprocated return.

Seek counsel, then, before this step for life is taken, and let not prudence throw the reins aside, least fancy, passion, or misplaced affection should consign thee to a maze of doubt, and wretchedness and sorrow.

If Providence doth open clear before thee the path of matrimony, and sends thee one in whom Christian principles, and manly generosity, with sterling sense, and unquestionable affection dwell, who seeks thy hand, then yield it, and pray God's blessing on it, and prove thyself a wife indeed, deserving of his fullest confidence and love, and peace be ever with thee! Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository.

[Conducted by B. B. EDWARDS, E. A. PARK, and M. STUART, of Andover; Dr. ROBINSON and H. B. SMITH, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism, Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illustrative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or discussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied, which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has been received in the short time which has elapsed since the union was made public, and the universal approbation of the measure which the publisher is daily receiving through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present volume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

TERMS.—If paid in advance, and sent by mail $3 00
If payment be delayed, $4 00

☞ A few complete sets of the BIBLIOTHECA SACRA, seven volumes, neatly bound in black cloth, are offered at $21 00, or in half Russia, Turkey, or Calf with marbled edges, at $25 00.

☞ Orders should be addressed to

JEWISH LIFE IN CENTRAL EUROPE.

The Sabbath.—The current of gloomy existence is regularly broken by the advent of the Sabbath. The peculiar blessing bestowed by the day of rest is most deeply felt and appreciated by the oppressed, harrassed, and careworn Jew; for the Sabbath not only brings repose to his body, but also solace to his mind; it not only erases temporarily the recollection of the melancholy past from his memory, but also instils into his bleeding soul hope for the future, and passes for a type and foretatse of that happiness which awaits the righteous in a better life. In his opinion the beneficial influence of the Sabbath extends also over the condemned in the infernal regions. who are released from their torments while the Sabbath lasts. He also thinks he receives every Sabbath an additional or a second soul, which leaves him again at the conclusion of the day. In the course of Friday, therefore, those Jews whom business has called away from their homes during the week are seen to return. The interior of the houses at the same time presents a very animated aspect; the female part of the families being engaged in scrubbing, scouring, and cleaning the rooms for the reception of the Sabbath, and in preparing the meals for that day, as no kind of labor must be performed on the day of rest. The afternoon is spent by both sexes in various operations, the object of which is personal cleanliness; the men also rid themselves of their beards. This is not so easy or simple a process as might be imagined; for in consequence of the traditional interpretation put upon Leveticus 19: 27, the use of the razor is prohibited. The beard, therefore, must be removed by some other means; and this is effected by various processes, all slow, and more or less painful. The most usual method consists in the application to the face of a kind of ointment, the ingredients of which are the mineral poison which, if I am not mistaken, is in English usually called orpiment, or the yellow sulphuret of arsenic and lime. This ointment which emits a most offensive smell, not only effectively removes the beard, but often destroys the skin if suffered to remain too long on the face, or if not washed carefully off.

An hour or so before the advent of the Sabbath, all labor ceases. The merchant leaves the counting-house, the mechanic lays aside his tools, and the shop-keeper closes his shop. Nothing will justify the violation of the day of rest except imminent danger to human life. At last some blows at the door proclaim that the Sabbath is approaching, and that it is time to go to synagogue, and off starts the whole male population. The service over, the young are seen reverentially to approach their fathers, uncles, and minister, humbly craving their blessing. These lay their hands upon the heads of each of the bending petitioners, devoutly pronouncing the words—"May God make thee as Ephraim and Manasseh!" (Gen. 48: 20.)

Free from anxiety and grief—which, according to the the teachings of the rabbis, must be dismissed with the advent of the Sabbath—they return home with countenances expressive of joy and contentment. Here they find all changed for the better. Everything is in its proper place, clean and bright, the floor scoured, the table covered with a snow-white cloth, laid for the evening meal. From the ceiling, above the table are suspended one or two lamps, the lighting of which is considered one of the principal duties of a religious housewife. The husband now cheerfully shakes his smiling wife by the hand, who, together with the daughters are generally dressed in white. The latter reverentially approach their father, even as the sons the mother, craving, their blessing, which is given to the daughters, with the words—"May God make the like Sarah and Rebecca, Rachel and Leah!" The whole family then join in singing a hymn, saluting "the angels of peace," who are supposed to hold their entrance into the house, for the purpose of staying there over Sabbath. And as if desirous to call the attention of a husband to the worth of a good wife, and thereby to increase his esteem for the partner of his life, he is enjoined to read the 31st chapter of Proverbs, descriptive of the qualities of such a woman. The sanctification of the Sabbath then takes place, which consists in the solemn recitation of a benediction, and of certain scriptural passages, over two wheaten loaves previous to breaking them. The two loaves are considered as typical of the double portion of manna vouchsafed on Fridays to the Israelites while in the wilderness. The family now sit down to the evening meal.

This being over, the form of grace prescribed for the Sabbath properly chanted, the family join in singing hymns in praise of the Sabbath. The melodies are simple and becoming, and make a cheerful impression. Some of the hymns are beautiful, and deserve to be more generally known than they are. The rest of the evening, if there be still time, is spent in a friendly visit to a neighbor, or in conversation of the members of the household among themselves. Various are the subjects started; the principal topics of discussion, however are the merits of the Baal Darshan (itinerant preacher) and of the band of singers who have arrived in the afternoon, and have received permission from the Parness (chief warden) to edify the congregation in the service of the morrow. The preacher is generally a Polish rabbi, with a long beard, immensely long curls hanging down his temples, (Lev. 19: 27,) clothed with long flowing robe, and a high fur cap, who has acquired by rote four or five clever Talmudical dissertations, with one of which he is going to dazzle his audience. The would-be sermon is neither a moral nor scientific discourse, nor does it treat of doctrinal points. It is a tissue of subtle ingenuities, such as are to be found in abstruse metaphysical treatises. The preacher generally sets out with some Talmudical passage, endeavors to show inconsistencies in it, or that it contradicts some other Talmudical statement, or that another later rabbinical authority apparently took a different view of the subject. And when he has led his audience into the most inextricable part of the maze, and made them despair of ever getting out of the labyrinth, all ot once a new text is introduced, or an unexpected turn given to those already introduced; and behold! as though it were by a magic spell, all intricacies are smoothed, and the magician walks forth on level ground over all those artificial fences which a while ago hedged him in on all sides. There is a story of a discourse by such an itinerant preacher, the object of which was to prove that Job himself agreed in opinion with a certain Talmudic authority which maintained that Job, as a person, had never existed. The conclusion of the discourse is usually an exhortation tending to enforce the stricter observance of some ceremonial rite or rabbinical institution. The band of singers generally hold a permanent engagement in some large congregation but receive leave every year to travel for some weeks. Their song is of a peculiar kind, and often exhibits a great deal of native, but of course uncultivated talent; but frequently it partakes more of the nature of vociferation than of a musical performance, and is a perfect torture to a cultivated ear. It is peculiar to those singers to hold, whilst singing, their right hand to the right cheek, and to lay the thumb on the throat. We could never ascertain if this was merely the result of habit, or intended to assist the emission of sounds.

In the morning another service is performed; this being concluded, the blessing, as in the preceding evening, imparted to the young folks, and the hearty wishes of a "happy Sabbath" exchanged every one hurries home to breakfast, to which, as they scarcely eat anything before prayer, and as the service never lasts less than two hours, they always bring a good appetite. The benediction of sanctification being said and breakfast taken, the short interval between that meal and dinner is filled up in various ways, and occasionally in examining the boys in what they have learned during the week—fortunate the lad who passes unscathed through this furnace! His will be the prediction on the part of the examining preacher of future eminence as rabbi, and the more substantial reward of an apple or pear. Sometimes, however, should the chief rabbi of the district happen to institute the examination, and be satisfied with the proficiency of the student, he will grant the scholar a diploma, by means of which he becomes a fellow (Khabar,) and must henceforth in every religious act have the epithet of Master (Rab) prefixed to his name. Dinner, grace, and the singing of hymns ended, every one is left to himself until the afternoon prayer. The elderly and the seriously disposed generally employ the interval in attending the exposition of some religious or moral work, usually the "Ethics of the Fathers;" a production of moral precepts of which can stand the test of the severest criticism, and deserves to be more generally known than it is. The young people, however, sometimes contrive, if they can obtain the permission of the local authority, to have a dance, or go out into the fields for a ramble. At last the time of the afternoon service arrives, which is followed by the evening meal, to be taken before the close of the Sabbath, it being held that every Israelite should take three meals on Sabbath. The day of rest is concluded with the night service, the first portion of which is generally said in perfect darkness, the Sabbath not being over until three stars be plainly seen, and it being unlawful for an Israelite to light a candle while it is Sabbath. The Sabbath is finally concluded by the chanting of certain hymns. And now the routine of every-day life begins, with all its monotony and accompanying toil; the souls of the wicked are driven back to the place of torture; the additional soul leaves the body of the unfortunate Jew; the protecting angels of peace depart from his dwelling, and with them his happy and cheerful countenance, and his goodly garments; the white table-cloth disappears from the table; the bright lamp from above it; and the dingy walls again frown upon the gloomy careworn tenants, as if the Sabbath had never existed.

Here we may be permitted to state some particulars with respect to the Sabbath, for which we could not before find an appropriate place. However homely the Jew may fare during the week, he will contrive to have something superior for the Sabbath. To this he is encouraged by the greatest rabbinical authorities, who recommend good cheer on that day as a religious duty; and the absence of fish or meat on Friday night would be considered by them as a serious deprivation. The strict rest enjoined for the Sabbath prevents the Jew not only from performing any servile work, but even from touching the instruments used in the performance of such labor. But as in the northern ungenial climate it would be impossible comfortably to spend the Sabbath without such labor, this is generally performed by some woman of the Christian religion engaged for that purpose. In each Ghetto, for this reason, there are established a few persons of that description who make a comfortable living through these services. From long and frequent intercourse with Jews these women are acquainted with all the rites of their employers, know all their peculiar terms, and are almost considered as members of Jewish families. They enter without ceremony the room of their employer on festivals and Friday nights, trim the lamps, snuff or put out the candles, and attend the fire. Such women have been known to be sometimes more observant of Jewish ceremonies than Jewesses themselves, and to have taught Jewish children their morning or evening prayers. Sometimes however, this friendly relation between Jew and Gentile is disturbed for a time by a mandate of some intolerant prelate. Such a measure, however, is always greatly regretted by these persons, and brings much distress upon the Jews, who, from religious motives, undergo severe hardships until the intercourse is re-established.

The necessity of preparing the Sabbath meal on Friday, and the desire so natural in cold climates of having a hot dinner, has given rise to a dish quite peculiar to the Jews, and which goes by the name of "shalit." It consists of meat, peas, beans, or rice, put into a pot, and placed on Friday afternoon into an oven heated for that purpose, and left there until Saturday noon, when, on being withdrawn, it is found still quite hot. This is a favorite mess, but in general very indigestible.

Days of Mourning.—The monotony of every-day life is further relieved by various seasons of rejoicing and mourning. The progress of the seige and destruction of Jerusalem are commemorated by public fasts. The principal among these is that of "Tishah Beab," (the 9th of the month of 'Ab—some time in the month of July,) which is the anniversary of the burning of the Temple both under Nebuchednezzar and Titus.

Twenty-one, or at least nine days previous to that diesnefastus, all public rejoicings are prohibited; no wedding takes place, no meat is eaten, bathing is avoided, and the beard suffered to grow. On the 8th of Ab, in the afternoon, the whole family sit on the ground, as though they had been bereft of a near relative, and the meal of mourning (consisting of eggs or lentils) is partaken of. In the evening the whole congregation meet in the synagogue, which at that period presents a most sombre appearance. The place of worship is but faintly lighted by bits of candles. The congregation with felt-shoes on their feet, and in the attire of deep mourning, sit on the ground, or at least not on their usual seats, and listen to the lugubrious strain in which the "Lamentations" are recited, or chant alternately heart-stirring elegies commemorative of the national calamities of Israel. Late in the evening the congregation separates. Some persons, however, spend the whole night in prayer; others sleep on the bare ground; and all, besides fasting, abstain more or less from the usual comforts of life. The morning re-assembles the faithful in the synagogue, when the same rites as in the evening are repeated. The time after the service is spent in listening to the exposition of accounts on the sufferings of Israel, and in visiting the burial grounds. The day is concluded with another solemn service.

Seasons of Rejoicing.—The principal seasons for rejoicing are—the first day of every month; the Feast of Lights; and that of Purim. To the first two our space will not permit us to advert, but of the latter a few datails may be subjoined.

It is kept on the 14th day of Adar (some time in February.) On the eve of the 13th, as well as on the morning of the 14th, the whole congregation meet in the synagogue, in order to hear the solemn chanting of the book of Esther. Purim is the festival when good cheer is especially enjoined. At the evening meal, the grave and generally very abstemious rabbi indulges in an additional glass of wine. This license he takes at the express recommendation of the Talmud, which relates strange tales of pious men, who, in consequence of over-indulgence in the treacherous liquor, made odd blunders in their intended encomiums on Mordecai. Among tne young folks frolic and fun reign paramount. They disguise themselves in a grotesque manner, and thus pay visits to their friends, reciting gay verses, and occasionally performing parts of the book of Esther, dramatized for the purpose; while at the same time, faithful to the customs of their ancestors, presents are interchanged by friends and acquaintances (Esther 9: 22.) This opportunity is also taken by many charitable persons to assist the necessitous, by affording them relief in a most delicate manner, under the appearance of a Purim present. Nor are the schoolmasters, and other scantily-salaried congregational officers, forgotten on this festive occasion.

Passover.—Another break in the current of the year is the celebration of the festivals commanded in the Pentateuch. Foremost among these ranks the Passover, which begins on the 14th of Nissan, (sometime in March,) and lasts eight days. Immediately after Purim, preparations for this festival are made. The wheat for the Passover cakes (upon which no rain, or any kind of moisture, must have fallen after being cut) is sent to the mill, in order to be ground. This operation, as well as that of baking the flour into cakes must be carried on under the superintendence of some one skilled in the law, and who is acquainted with all the contingencies through which the preparation would, according to tradition, be brought under the denomination of leaven, and thus be rendered unfit for use on the Passover.

Whilst this is passing out of the house, great activity is displayed within. The walls are whitewashed, the floor is scrubbed and scoured, the surface of every fixture is scraped, or covered over with new paper or wooden slabs, kept exclusively for Passover uses, and metal vessels are made red hot; and all this for the purpose of removing any portion of leaven that might attach to them. This is the period of the year when the scriptural behest, "And he shall rule over thee," so far as Jewish families are concerned, is actually reversed, for the lord of the creation is ruthlessly chased by the female portion of the house from room to room and corner to corner. Every piece of furniture, bedding, hangings, desks, books, and shelves, must pass under the review of their inquisitorial eye, and ultimately through the ordeal of scalding water, or any material likely to dislodge the enemy they are looking after.

The night preceding the eve of this festival is a very busy time with the whole household, for on it all the utensils and vessels employed during the year are removed to some remote chamber, as being unfit for use on Passover, and replaced by those destined for the festival, and which for that purpose have been kept locked up in a separate room during the rest of the year. At length, a short evening service having ushered in the solemn season, the younger branches having duly implored the blessings of the superiors, and the worshipers having wished each other happy holidays, the faithful hasten to their respective homes, the interior of which now presents a sight which claims particular notice.

Owing to the processes mentioned, the dwelling-room is quite metamorphosed. This change becomes still more conspicuous from the peculiar appearance which the table, with its apurtenances, presents, for besides the paraphernalia usual on Sabbath, and which have been described elsewhere, on the table are set a large covered dish, several small vessels, a large cup, and as many wine-glasses as there are individuals in the room. The table is surrounded by chairs, except on one side, which is occupied by a couch or chairs arranged in a manner of a couch, destined to serve for seats to the master and mistress of the house, and comfortably covered with pillows, especially on the left side against which the occupants are supposed to lean. The Jews who on that evening are taught to look upon themselves at least as freemen, if not as princes, indulge in this luxury, no doubt in imitation of the ancients, who as is known, feasted in a similar manner. The master on this occasion puts on a snow-white flowing robe and cap. These articles of apparel are always the gift of the wife, and are only worn on solemn occasions—such as Passover-eve, or the Day of Atonement; and lastly robed in the same apparel, he will also be one day carried to the grave.

The wine glasses are now filled, the whole company sit down, the master of the house pronounces various benedictions, and at last, uncovering the large dish, breaks one of the cakes it contains, laying a portion of it aside, of which more will be said by and by. He next removes from off the dish the bone of the lamb and the roasted egg, which were placed there in commemoration of the paschal lamb, and of another offering usually brought with it and laying hold of the dish, pronounces an appropriate prayer. The wine-glasses are now replenished, not forgetting the large cup in the middle of the table, placed there in honor of an invisible guest—the prophet Elijah. The act of the drinking of the wine, and consequently of refilling the glasses, is, according to a rabbinical institution, repeated four times. This rite is scrupulously observed, even by the poor, and in those countries where wine is expensive.

The first portion of the service being over, and the usual benedictions pronounced, the master of the house previous to the evening meal, distributes among those present the contents of the small vessels mentioned above. They consist of bitter herbs and of a clay-colored compound made of almonds, apples, and cinnamon. The former are eaten in obedience to the law commanding—"They shall eat unleavened cakes upon bitter herbs." The latter is supposed to be intended to remind the faithful, by its color and consistence, of the bricks and mortar which their ancestors were compelled to make in Egypt.

Supper now takes place, and the service is about to be recommenced, when, previous to saying grace, the father of the family makes an awful discovery, which, for the moment, puts a stop to all further proceedings; he misses the portion of the cake which he has broken at the beginning of the service, and carefully hidden under the pillow by his side. This is not a loss easily to be borne; for this portion of the cake is to be divided among those present, after the eating of which it is unlawful to partake of anything that evening. This portion, moreover, is, in popular superstition, endowed with divers singular powers—such as keeping off and even healing the ague, calming the agitated sea, &c.—for which purpose fragments of it are preserved by many from Passover to Passover. Whilst the father still fumbles about under the pillow, and the family are kept in a state of suspense, a little urchin at the table is observed furtively to smile, and to cast about portentious to glances, as much as to say—"I know where it is, but you shall not have it without a fair compensation for the trouble I had in abstracting it from its hiding-place." Immediately negotiations are set on foot with the young thief, who at last, on the promise of a new coat, cap, &c., surrenders the abstracted treasure. The ceremony now proceeds undisturbed to its conclusion.

This night is considered by the Jews as very auspicious, and no fear of accident or mishap is entertained by them; for Scripture calls it "a night of watching with the Lord" (Exodus 12: 42.) But, alas! how often has this confidence been wofully disappointed; for there is no festival on which hilarity has so frequently been changed into sadness.

Owing to the idea of sacredness attached to the Passover rites, and in order not to be compelled to eat leavened food, every Jew, when traveling, will endeavor to reach before Passover some place where co-religionists reside; for this reason also Jewish soldiers and prisoners, are if they wish for it, provided with food during that festival at the expense of the several congregations; for this reason also both private and public charity are never exerted with greater liberality than on this occasion; and there are few families but have on Passover-eve two, and sometimes as many as ten guests. Moreover, without instituting any particular inquiries, the wardens of the congregations will give to any Jew choosing to ask, a number of cakes proportionate to the number of individuals in whose behalf the request is made. Indeed, without the vigorous exercise of this charitable feeling, it were impossible for the numerous poor to keep the festival, the expense attending its celebration for eight days being very great. The following morning is celebrated by a solemn service in the synagogue, and in the evening the domestic service of the previous night is repeated. The Seventh day—the anniversary of the passage through the Red Sea—is celebrated in the synagogue by the solemn chanting of the sublime song recorded in Exodus 15. This day, however, is not the last of the festival, as might be inferred from the Scriptural command; for an eighth day is added. The addition of another day is observed with respect to every festival, except that of the Day of Atonement.

The Sephirah.—The seven weeks elapsing between the Second day of Passover and the Feast of Weeks (Deut. 16: 9, 10) is called the Sephirah (Counting.) It derives its name from the circumstance, that on every evening during that period, after the night service, each individual solemnly pronounces the following benediction:—"Blessed art thou, O Lord God, who hath sanctified us with his commandments, and commanded us concerning the counting of the Omer" (Numbers 23: 15;) adding thereto the number of days which have elapsed since the second day of Passover, on which, according to the rabbinical authorities, the Omer was offered up in the Temple. This period is now considered by the Jews as one of melancholy and mourning. It was during that period that the 40,000 disciples, or rather followers, of the high-minded Rabbi Akiba met their fatal doom under the leadership of the false Messiah Bar Kokheba, by the sword of the ruthless Romans, or, as a more improbable tradition asserts that this number of disciples was swept away by a pestilence, as a punishment for not having respected each other; and again, it was during that period that, in 1096, a portion of the Crusaders committed the greatest outrages on the unfortunate Jews residing in the places through which these enthusiasts passed. The Sabbaths of the Sephirah with melancholy elegies commemorating such calamities. No weddings are solemnized, no festivity takes place, no new dress is put on; a general mourning prevails, and the men suffer their beards to grow. The mourning is only interrupted for one day—namely, the 33d of the Sephirah. On that day tradition says the mortality ceased among the disciples of Akiba, or, what is more probable, the survivors were permitted by the conqueror to inter their dead brethren who had fallen amid the slaughter consequent upon the taking of Bether (see the history of any of the Jews' wars under Hadrian). This day is therefore kept as a kind of half-festival—all signs of mourning being suppressed.

The expiration of the Sephirah is the commencement of the "Feast of Weeks." This festival is now celebrated in commemoration of the giving of the Law on Mount Sinai, which, according to rabbinical computation, took place at that period. This is a season of great rejoicing and hilarity. The synagogues are decorated with wreaths of flowers and splendid nosegays, and the floor is strewed with Calamus aromaticus, and other oderiferous herbs; and the interior resounds with hymns in celebration of the occasion. Nor are the private houses less gayly ornamented than the places of public worship.

THE WAY TO MAKE A POOR PASTOR.

1. Be very careless and irregular in attending church. Never go, except when you can manufacture no good excuse to stay at home.

2. When at church, be either asleep, or staring about. Do not listen to the sermon.

3. When you go home, complain of the sermon as light and chaffy, or dry and uninteresting.

4. Treat your pastor with a cold and uninviting civility, and then complain of him because he does not visit you.

5. Neglect to pray for a blessing upon him and his labors, and then complain of him because the church does not prosper.

6. Be always finding fault with your pastor, and yet regret that he is not more popular with the people.

7. Be very lukewarm and worldly-minded, and yet complain of him for want of zeal.

8. Neglect to provide for his necessary wants, and then complain of him because he wants his salary.

Do all these things, and you will never fail to have a poor pastor.

Hints to Husbands.—Do not jest with your wife upon a subject in which there is danger of wounding her feelings. Remember that she treasures every word you utter, though you may never think of it again. Do not reproach your wife with a personal defect, for if she has sensibility, you inflict a wound difficult to heal. Do not treat your wife with inattention in company; it touches her pride—and she will not respect you more or love you better for it. Do not upbraid your wife in the presence of a third person. The sense of your disregard for her feelings will prevent her from acknowledging her fault. Do not often invite your friends to jaunt, and leave your wife at home. She might suspect that you esteemed others more companionable than herself. If you would have a pleasant home and cheerful wife, pass your evenings under your own roof. Do not be stern and silent in your own house, and remarkable for your sociability elsewhere. Remember that your wife has as much need of recreation as yourself, and devote a portion at least of your leisure hours to such society and amusements as she may join in. By doing so, you will secure her smiles and increase her affection.

Preaching up the Times.—It is related of Leighton, of blessed memory, that he was once publicly reprimanded in a synod, for not preaching up the times. Whereupon he asked, "Who does preach up the times?" It was answered that all the brethren did it. Then, he rejoined, if all of you preach up the times, you may surely allow one poor brother to preach up Christ and eternity.

It was the same Leighton who was wont to say, "I would rather convince a man that he has a soul to save, and induce him to live up to that belief, than to bring him over to my opinion in whatever else beside.

How often do we sigh for opportunities of doing good, whilst we neglect the openings of Providence in little things, which would frequently lead to the accomplishment of most important usefulness!

THE SWORD AND THE PLOUGH.

"They shall beat their swords into ploughshares."—Isaiah.

The sword shall rest in its scabbard old
  In an age that is dawning now;
And the world, that wept at the woes untold,
Which the sword like a flood o'er its plains had rolled,
  Shall smile in the reign of the plough.

The sword shall rust in its gory case—
  It shall rust—but not for aye;
At the stern, high call of the human race,
It shall leap once more from its resting place,
  And its scabbard be thrown away.

But it shall not fall, as of old it fell,
  Cleaving human hearts in twain;
It shall flash no more as a brand from hell;
The tall, grim shaft shall no longer tell
  Its deeds, on the battle plain;

For it decks not a worthless soldier's hand;
  It is grasped in the forger's now;
And the murderous and doubly accursed brand,
Which had reveled, in its lust, over every land,
  Shall serve in the reign of the plough.

O, the blessing of man, and of God, shall rest
  On the reign of the peaceful plough!
Old earth "shall in living green" be dressed—
Glad homes shall sleep on her motherly breast,
  And vines on her rugged brow.

THE USE OF RICHES.

Riches are a good greatly to be valued. Our Saviour expressly teaches us in the memorable parable of the unjust Steward, that men who possess them may so use them that "when they fail, these shall receive them into everlasting habitations." By steady Christian benificence, by the use of their money for the benefit of the poor, of the suffering of the despairing, for the spread of the truth, for the establishing of equity and righteousness on the earth, and for the bringing mankind to the knowledge of Christ—men give a permanent and intrinsic value to the gold which they dispense. They build it into eternal habitations, for themselves. We convert our money into the stone and the brick, the wood and the plaster, which make our houses in this world, and they will perish. We shall leave them after a little, and they will themselves decay and fall. But we give our money to the accomplishment of the works of Christian piety and charity, and we put it into fabrics that will be as permanent as the soul itself; as permanent as that system of God, amid which these good acts are done. We build for ourselves, then, Mansions in Heaven. We are daily adding new courses and layers to the celestial crystal that forms their walls. Daily, new pillars, more beautiful in their form and more perfect in their decoration, are reared before or within these dwellings. No pictures so sweet have ever sprung forth under the touch of any mortal pencil as those pictures of memory, of want relieved and sorrow soothed and blessings given, with which these walls are daily hung. Their atmosphere will be rich when we enter them, with the fragrance of all delightful sympathies, and sweet affections, cherished on earth, and now flowering into full beauty. It will be bright and sublime with the love of the highest! The angels will love to come and walk with us there. The utmost dreams of human felicity will be more than fulfilled, and fulfilled to us forever when we enter these Mansions!

We have said that riches as rightly used and generally diffused, may build these celestial and Divine homes. But let us remember what the same parable tells us, that "he that is faithful in the least is faithful also in much;" and that the little we may possess, if used in the spirit and for the ends which God loves, will be as effective toward the completion of these dwellings as the wealth of Princes. The desire of the alchemist who sought to evolve a Spirit from gold, which should in turn transmute all substances into gold, is more than realized in Christianity. Out of our gold if rightly used will come a power to touch not the present only but the Future, and to transform it all for us into Beauty and Preciousness!

The Prophetic Dew-Drop.—A delicate child, pale and prematurely wise, was complaining, on a hot morning, that the poor dew-drops had been too hastily snatched away, and not allowed to glitter on the flowers like other happier dew-drops, that live the whole night through, and sparkle in the moonlight, and through the morning onward to noonday. "The sun," said the child, "has chased them away with his heat, or swallowed them up in his wrath." Soon after came rain and a rainbow, whereupon his father pointed upward: "See," said he, "there stands the dew-drops, gloriously reset—a glittering jewelry in the heavens; and the clownish foot tramples on them no more. By this, my child, thou art taught that what withers upon earth blooms again in Heaven." Thus the father spoke, and knew not that he spoke prefiguring words; for, soon after, the delicate child, with the morning brightness of his early wisdom, was exhaled, like a dew-drop into Heaven.

Sorrows of Children.—The transient nature of the sorrows of children has been often remarked on by writers; but by none so beautifully as in the following lines by Sir Walter Scott:—

"The tear down childhood's cheek that flows,
Is like the dew-drop on the rose;
When next the summer breeze comes by,
And waves the bush, the flower is dry."

The Sheffield Independent states that the Mormons have attempted to make a great systematic attempt to convert England to Mormonism. They are at this moment adding to their churches, by adult baptism, 500 disciples every month. So confident are they that they propose to hold a great Mormon Conference in London in the month of June.

In Iceland, if a minor commits a crime, the parents are immediately arrested, and unless they can prove, to the satisfaction of the magistrate, that they have afforded to the child all needed opportunities of instruction, the penalty of the crime is visited upon them, and the child is placed under instruction.

When the heart is pure, there is hardly anything which can mislead the understanding in matters of immediate personal concernment.

MEETING OF THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Central Association held its Sixteenth Annual Meeting at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., commencing on Fourth-day morning, June 11, and closing near evening of the following Sixth-day. The delegation in attendance was quite large, particularly from the churches in Jefferson County. The Eastern and Western Associations were each represented by a delegate. As a whole, the deliberations of the session may be characterized as interesting and profitable, though the interest was somewhat abated by the want of a well-digested plan for the transaction of business, and the enjoyment was marred by the necessity of giving considerable time to the consideration of church difficulties. To prevent a recurrence of this, the Association appointed a standing Business Committee, whose duty it will be, soon after the opening of the next session, to present a written plan for the profitable use of the time, and through which all persons desiring to bring business before the Association are requested to do it—an arrangement which it would be well for each of our Associations to adopt.

Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, of Brookfield, preached the Introductory Discourse from Ephesians 5 : 21—"Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God." The design of the discourse was to illustrate and enforce the duty of concession and submission on the part of church members in the administration of discipline. If the advice it contained were generally heeded, the result would be a vast saving of time and good feeling.

The Letters from the Churches showed some increase in the number of members. To the DeRuyter Church there have been added during the past year ten; to the 2d Brookfield Church seventeen; to the Adams Church twenty-five; to the Watson Church thirty-six. Several of the churches have been slightly diminished by deaths and removals. Two or three letters stated the number of resident and non-resident members, and indicated a great neglect on the part of persons removing to distant regions in reporting themselves to the churches in which they continue to hold their memberships. In all cases persons removing from the bounds of their churches ought to report themselves as often as once a year until they join other churches, and then to give due notice, so that the fact of their joining, and the name of the church they have joined, may be properly recorded.

The Domestic Missionary Efforts of the Association, during the past year, have been principally directed to supplying with preaching the churches at Otselic and Preston. Eld. Elias Burdick has spent most of the year in missionary labors in those places. For the year to come the Preston Church have engaged him to preach for them half of the time. The Association requested him to labor half the [illegible]e within the bounds of the Otselic C[illegible]h; it also, by vote, requested Eld. Enoch Barnes to visit the Church in Richland once in two months, and the ministers in Brookfield and Verona to visit the church at Newport once a month, and report their labors at the next meeting of the Association.

In our Foreign Mission the brethren and churches of the Central Association are much interested, if one may judge of their interest from their letters and conversation. A resolution was adopted, after remarks by several individuals, "that this Association continues to regard with interest and sympathy the efforts of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society to disseminate the gospel at home and abroad, and desires especially to urge upon the Board the importance of enlarging operations in the western part of our own country."

The subject of Education was brought before the Association by a Report from one of the Standing Committees, which was adopted, and will be found below. Interesting addresses were made by several persons in support of the report, and in illustration of the truths which it sets forth.

The Report of the Committee on the State of Religion is also appended. Its allusion to the difficulties in several of the churches is just, and its suggestion as to "the most effectual means of healing our wounds," deserves serious consideration.

On the subject of Publications the Committee reported, and the Association adopted, the following Minute:—"That the publications issued by the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, and the course adopted by that Society, meet our hearty approval; and we would most earnestly recommend an extensive patronage by the churches of this Association. The Sabbath-School Visitor, which has been issued within the last year, we regard as a very neat and valuable little paper, admirably calculated to benefit the juvenile portion of our denomination, and hence worthy of a wide circulation."

At the last meeting of the Association, the question of raising funds to defray the expenses of delegates to sister Associations, was referred to the churches. Only two or three of them, however, expressed their wishes in the matter through their letters. When the subject came up for discussion, the notion that such representation is too expensive, was commented upon with just severity, and the danger of acting upon it was shown. A resolution was adopted, "that a representation in the sister Associations by delegates would be for the interest of our churches; and that it would be desirable for the churches of this Association to make provision for the expense attendant upon sending such delegates."

A letter from the Church at DeRuyter presented to the Association the question whether it is proper to encourage in the gospel ministry a man whose marriage relations are such as those of Schuyler S. Coon; in regard to which the Association passed a vote advising the churches not to encourage him.

The officers of the Association, at its present session, were—JOHN MAXSON, Moderator; H. C. HUBBARD and WM. C. WHITFORD, Clerks. For the ensuing year, Eli S. Bailey, of Brookfield, was appointed Corresponding Secretary, and Ephraim Maxson, of West Edmeston, Treasurer. The Executive Board consists of the Moderator, Secretaries, and Treasurer, in connection with Eli S. Colgrove, Barton G. Stillman, and Matthew Wells, Jr., of DeRuyter.

The next session of the Association is to be held with the 1st Church in Verona, Oneida Co., N. Y., commencing on the third day of the week before the second Sabbath in June, 1852. Russell G. Burdick is to preach the Introductory Discourse—Elias Burdick alternate. — G. B. U.

Report on Education.

The Committee on Education report, That a review of the educational operations of the denomination presents some facts of an encouraging character. The DeRuyter Institute, the only denominational institution within the bounds of the Central Association, has during the past year enjoyed about the usual amount of patronage, though that has been less by far than the interests of our churches and the young people connected with them demand. Our other institutions—especially the Academies at Alfred, N. Y., Shiloh, N. J., and Milton, Wis.—we learn, are doing a good work, in which they deserve the cordial sympathy and coöperation of all who desire the welfare of the rising generation. In connection with the DeRuyter Institute, a Fund has been created with the design of aiding meritorious applicants by loans; but this fund is yet small, and additions to it are much needed. Within the past year a Seventh-day Baptist Education Society has been organized, for the purpose of aiding young men who are engaged in study with special reference to the gospel ministry—a circumstance in which this Association, in common with all who love the cause of religion, cannot fail to rejoice.

There is now a great and growing demand for teachers and preachers, thoroughly disciplined and qualified for their responsible callings; in view of which, the duty of this Association, and of the churches composing it, to aid the cause of education, is apparent. As to the manner in which they shall do this—whether by adding to the Loan Fund of DeRuyter Institute, or by contributing to the Education Society, or by selecting promising individuals to whom aid may be extended directly—the Committee would not attempt to dictate. They think it sufficient to urge upon the churches the duty of doing what they can for the object, leaving them to choose for themselves in regard to the particular manner.

Report on the State of Religion.

In reviewing the communications made to the Association, the Committee find occasion for both joy and sorrow. A few of the churches appear to be passing through trials and afflictions, in which they are entitled to our sympathy and our prayers. We hope that their tribulations will work patience, and that when they are sufficiently tried they will come forth as gold. From the statistics of the churches we find that many of those with whom we formerly held sweet communion in the church militant, have been called from their earthly toils to the enjoyment of that rest which remains for the people of God. May we weep with and pray for those that weep.

But we also find cause of joy in the pleasing information that God has graciously revived his work and refreshed his people by his presence, and that some of the churches have received considerable accessions to their numbers. We learn with pleasure, that prayer-meetings and Sabbath-Schools are laudably sustained by a respectable number of the churches, which promises much good. Another gratifying feature in the returns is, that in some of the churches female benevolent associations are sustained, auxiliary to our missionary and other benevolent institutions. It is desirable that this good example should be imitated in all the churches of the Association.

The Committee have to add, however, that the state of religious feeling is generally too languid among us; and we would kindly urge upon our brethren and sisters the importance of prayer—secret prayer, family prayer; and prayer-meetings in all the families and churches of the Association—as the most effectual means of healing our wounds, comforting us in our afflictions, and elevating our affections.

REVISION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

An important week seems to have just been brought to a close under the auspices of the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society, which is nothing less than a revision of the English Version of the Scriptures. We have not seen the document which furnishes the information to our exchanges, but the facts, as we gather from them, are substantially as follows:—In the year 1847 the Committee on Versions was charged with the duty of collating the editions of the English Bible published by the American Society, with those issued in Great Britain. After employing three years and a half in this work, meeting as a whole, or by sub-committee, once a week or oftener, and spending several hours together at each session, their labor has been completed, and their Report submitted to the Board and adopted.

After going into a brief history of the present translation, the Committne find that it has come down to us unaltered in respect to its text; except in the changes of orthography which the English language has undergone; and excepting also some slight variations and discrepancies, which were perhaps unavoidable considering the long interval which has elapsed, and the many millions of copies printed.

The Committee then give the dates of various editions and versions down to that of Dr. Blaney at Oxford, in 1767, which has been regarded since its publication as the standard copy, to which all subsequent issues in England have been conformed. In these various editions and collations some curious errors are discerned, though most, if not all of them appear to be errors of the press.

It seems that the Committee made a comparison of the best American Bible with recent copies of the four best British editions; and every variation in punctuation, in orthography, in capital letters, or in textual reading was noted, and the judgment of the Committee passed on each point, letter and word! This careful and laborious investigation brought to light about 24,000 variations in the particulars above named, the original record of which is now deposited in the archives of the Bible Society for future reference.

The stereotype plates of the Society having been made to conform to the result of the Committee's labors, future editions of the Bible will present the most perfect copies of the English translation. It is said, however, that there are no alterations affecting the sense, and none that will be indicated by the mere cursory reading of the Scriptures.

The orthography has been so far amended, that proper names are spelled uniformly in the Old and New Testaments. Instead of Noe, Esaias, Jeremy, and the like, we have Noah, Isaiah, and Jeremiah, throughout.

"Joshua" has been substituted for "Jesus" in Acts 7 : 45, and Heb. 4 : 8.

In Acts 12 : 4, the word "Easter" is still retained, doubtless in deference to the Episcopalians, but the word "Passover" is inserted in the margin.

Some important changes are made in punctuation. The "Contents of the Chapters" have also been very materially altered.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

NUMBER FORTY.

GLASGOW, May 30th, 1851.

The two Ecclesiastical Assemblies, that of the Established Church of Scotland, and that of the Free Church, are at present in session in Edinburgh. As was to have been expected, a desire to maintain the observance of Sunday has been exhibited, with the confesssion that the Papal Aggression had necessarily precluded much the efforts which would otherwise have been directed to urging the sanctification of the day of their own adoption. In both Assemblies the subject of Education has been a prominent one. In that of the Free Church, (presided over this year by Dr. Duff,) considerable heat of debate was yesterday exhibited in a discussion as to whether in addition to their lately-built College in Edinburgh, they should not also have Colleges in Glasgow and Aberdeen. In the Church of Scotland Assembly, dread of interference with the parochial system, which binds the parochial schoolmaster into connection with the Established religion, has been openly avowed. Resolutions have been accordingly formed to do their utmost to maintain the tie unimpaired. The subject was brought before them by overture. In proposing this in the Presbytery of Glasgow, Dr. Craik said that the 25 years of the present salary of teachers would expire 5 years hence; and, if no provision was made to meet this, that the salaries of the teachers would become smaller. Accordingly, an effort is being made to obtain an increase of these salaries, which range from £25 to £40 a year, to £35 to £50, besides schoolroom and dwelling house, with other additions to the salary by fees, &c. Dr. C. says that the parochial school system of Scotland is supported at an annual expense of about £40,000. But this does not we presume include interest on outlay for buildings or expense of repairs. And, in speaking of the results of the parochial system in the education, it is to be borne in mind that there is a very large number of private schools throughout the land, the number of whose pupils in towns far outnumber those of the parish schools. But the real ground of the present contest is, not the comparative efficiency or inefficiency of the parochial system; but whether the influence which it has hitherto given to the Established Church is to be continued or withdrawn. Lord Melgund has brought into Parliament a Bill which diverts that influence out of its former channels, inasmuch as it gives the determining and supplying the educational wants of each parish, to the ministers and heritors only in connection with those who pay one-sixth of an assessment to be raised, and those who during the previous year have paid school fees for their children during four months of that time. These parties are to elect a Committee from among themselves to have the management of details, under the supervision of the Central Committee; and it is not requisite that the teacher subscribe the Church creeds. The Free Church, while it wishes the teachers' office to be open to their members, desires at the same time to restrict the privilege to such as will subscribe the Confession of Faith and Catechisms. And one of their elders, Mr. Cowan, M. P. for Edinburgh, has brought in a Bill into Parliament for the purpose of abolishing religious tests as qualifications for the secular professorships in the Scottish Universities. In fact, the existing tests do not keep out of the chairs those who disbelieve the national creed, as it is notorious that some of the existing Professors make no pretension of belonging to the Established Church, but the Bill, if passed, will allow more honest men also to enter the lists of competition. At the recent meeting of the United Presbyterian Synod, in Edinburgh, the subject of Education was in like manner discussed. One unfavorable circumstance announced in this meeting was that while during the preceding year seven ministers had died, sixteen had demitted their charges. We do not observe that it elicited any remark; but with the views they entertain, it surely well might.

Very slow progress is being made in the House of Commons in the measures proposed for repelling Papal Aggression. Night after night is absolutely wasted by the opposition of the members of the Church of Rome, more true in their allegiance to her than to the Parliament, fidelity to which they have also sworn. Obstructive amendments are offered to the Bill, which are rejected by large majorities, only to be replaced by equally fruitless efforts at melioration. But although thus occasioning great annoyance, and renewed postponement of the Bill, it is not expected that they will succeed in obtaining its modification. With singular inconsistency these men plead for unlimited opportunity for Rome's power and guilt in our land, at the very moment that that Church is displaying the utmost intolerance every where. It is confidently said that the Pope has absolutely denounced our recently erected Government Colleges in Ireland, although the Rescript has not yet been formally published. Accounts also, have just been received from Florence that Count Guicciardina, (who has become a Protestant, and was on the eve of coming to England to nttend the religious meetings,) together with six of his friends, have been arrested at Turin, for reading the Bible. They were seized in the very act, and therefore charged with attempting to overthrow the religion of the State; and although it was declared by the public prosecutor that there was not sufficient grounds for continuing the proceedings, these individuals have been condemned to six months' exile in the province of Volterra. Alas for us if Rome shall ever gain the power of compelling thus adherence to the religion, not of God and His Christ, but of Romish States!

The Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations had yesterday upwards of 70,000 visitors. Of these 51,090 paid at the door for admission, the rest having used season tickets. On Wednesday 37,183 paid for admission, the receipts having been £1859 4s. But on Monday, the first day of admission at 1s., and when provision had been made in expectation of an immense crush, the attendance was very small, from the general fear, it is presumed, that the crowd would be overwhelming. "HISTORY OF THE SABBATARIAN CHURCHES."

As there appeared in the Sabbath Recorder, under date of June 5th, a notice denouncing my History of the Sabbatarian Churches, as "a worthless production and not entitled to confidence," will the writer of that notice please to inform me through the columns of the same paper how he was betrayed into such a gross misstatement? A book teaching on every page that the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God, is declared to be a worthless production. A book teaching Sabbath doctrines, is recommended to the reading public by first-day newspapers, but in a paper designed to uphold the Sabbath, it is denounced as worthless. Will the writer of that notice give to the world his reasons for that unjust and illiberal criticism, and show from the book itself that it is a worthless production?

Will Isaac D. Titsworth, of Shiloh, likewise point out "the improper personal criticisms upon the talents and abilities of several of our ministers," as others are not able to discover them? TAMAR DAVIS.

If Mrs. D. will furnish us with a copy of her History, we will comply with her request. We do not own the work, and know not where to obtain it before our paper goes to press. As we were going up the North River a few weeks ago, we were favored with the opportunity of seeing it, one of our traveling companions having a copy in his possession. Curiosity led us to look at those places where churches and localities with which we were intimately acqainted are noticed. We discovered some important inaccuracies, and that led us to look still farther. We soon saw, as we thought, the marks of great haste in the preparation of the work, and such want of accuracy in some of the facts set forth, that we came to the conclusion that it was not worthy of being received by the public as a reliable history of our denomination. Hence our criticism, of which the authoress so loudly complains. It was not our intention to allude to the book at all, and should not have done so, but for the previous notice in the N. Y. Tribune.

The demand made by Mrs. D. upon Bro. Titsworth is prompted, no doubt, by the fact that in the Report of the doings of the Eastern Association he is represented as the proposer of a resolution censuring her History. Heis, of course, competent to defend himself.

CONVERSION OF DR. CHANNING.—The following extract is from one of the letters of this eminent man, which we find in one of our exchanges, gives pleasing evidence that he was not a stranger to experimental religion:

"I will go farther, sir, I believe that I never experienced that change of heart which is necessary to constitute a Christian, till within a few months past. The worldling would laugh at me; he would call conversion a farce. But the man who has felt the influence of the Holy Spirit can oppose the fact and experience to empty declarations and contemptuous sneers. You remember the language of the blind man whom Jesus healed—'This I know: that whereas I was blind, now I see.' Such is the language which the real Christian may truly utter. Once, and not long ago, I was blind, blind to my own condition, blind to the goodness of God, and blind to the love of my Redeemer. Now I behold with shame and confusion the depravity and rottenness of my heart. Now I behold with love and admiration the long suffering and infinite benevolence of Deity."

RHODE ISLAND CORRESPONDENCE.

NUMBER ONE.

[The facts set forth in the following communication are worthy of being placed upon record in our columns, but we could really wish that our anti-slavery correspondents would not allow themselves to be transported into such extravagancies as they sometimes do. Whether the children of the Ethiopian "evince any more mentality for being contaminated with Caucasian blood," is a question upon which we do not care to enter. But there is something very equivocal in such language. Whether intended as a thrust at the poor mulatto, or as an undervaluation of the white race, is a problem which our readers will solve for themselves. The remarks, too, upon the beauty of the Ethiopian are, in our opinion, quite out of taste. A good cause—such as we hold the anti-slavery cause to be—requires not the aid of such ultraism.]

Shelter for Colored Children, Providence.

Among the many benevolent institutions of this active and growing city, none have higher claims upon the sympathy and aid of the benevolent, than the one specified in the heading to the present article. It originated in the warm, gushing hearts of a few devoted females, at the head of whom was the lamented Mrs. Anna A. Jenkins, whose late tragical death is still painfully fresh in the memories of many. The neglected condition of colored children in the city having awakened the sympathies of several ladies, they met at the house of Mrs. Jenkins, in March, 1848, and formed an association for their benefit. During that year subscriptions and donations were received to the amount of $317, which was placed at interest. In the following year the Infant School Society donated $420 to the new association. In March a house was opened, by favor of Mrs. Jenkins, for the reception of children, on North Main-st., under the care of a Matron and Instructress. At the issuing of the Second Annual Report, thirty-two children had been received, and the well-directed efforts bestowed upon them had been blessed beyond the most sanguine expectations of the friends of the enterprise. It depended for support upon the donations of individuals and churches, which, to their highest commendation, were liberally bestowed. The number of children claiming shelter increased, while the happy effect upon their minds encouraged to more extensive exertions. A better location was needed, and in 1847 a healthful site for a building was presented to the Society by Mrs. Jenkins, together with five hundred dollars towards the erection of a house, which, in November of 1850, was dedicated to the holy mission of love. The house is in a beautiful part of the city, removed from noise, and presenting every advantage for the proper training of children. It has a commodious school room, with neat and airy sleeping rooms, parlors, and all the appurtenances of a happy home. By the beneficence of A. Duncan, Esq., Doct. Taby, and others, the house has been presented unincumbered to the Society. Such is a brief history of this mission of mercy.

At the present time it is under the immediate supervision of Miss Vandoren, Matron, and Miss Mann, Associate Matron and Teacher. Its present number of children is thirty-five, from two to fifteen years of age, taken from the very jaws of destruction. The history of some of those precious gems of immortality is enough to stir up the deep fountains of every soul uncontaminated by our unholy prejudice against the color of the Ethiopian. Few deaths have occurred among the children, and nearly all of them attributable to diseases contracted by exposure before entering the "Shelter."

Mary Ann, whose gentle spirit has gone to that rest where no negro is hated, was found shivering with cold, with her feet in the ashes to keep them from freezing. It was with the greatest difficulty that she could be rescued from the brute, who had, like a thousand other brutes, assumed the prerogative to trample on God's image. She was at length placed in the Shelter. For the first time in her life, the smile of love beamed on her stricken soul. O what a joy burst forth from that crushed spirit responsive to the gentle tone of affliction. "Only think," said she, "I had a bed to sleep in last night; why, we had clothes enough to keep us warm." What a history of wo is narrated in the heart-touching ejaculation of that warmed and comforted child. And what a thrill of joy did it send to those lovers of humanity, whose kindness had given her a "bed to sleep in" and clothes to warm her. She became a child of redemption, and went to the arms of her Redeemer.

A little boy ten years of age, found sleeping in the streets, who had no recollection of his parents, was taken to the Shelter. He knew not a letter, had never been to church or Sabbath-School, and was as hopeless as human being can be; but in four months he could read well, was kind and obedient. Time forbids to detail individual accounts.

A short extract from the Eighth Annual Report will cheer the heart of every lover of his race:—

"Around these miserable and friendless objects have been thrown the influences of a virtuous home. They have been sheltered from contact with vice—they have been watched over and instructed with unceasing fidelity and affection. The fruits of all this labor and affection have exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine. The children have ever manifested a docility of character, and a susceptibility of improvement, which have amply repaid the labors bestowed. The refractory have been readily reduced to subjection, and the example of the majority has always been in favor of obedience and good order. It may safely be affirmed that their deportment will compare favorably with that of the same number of children any where to be found, composing one family."

Before such ocular demonstrations, how puny appear all sophistical and long-spun arguments to prove the mental inferiority of the Ethiopian race. Never have I witnessed such rapid progress in mental development on the part of children of the pale faced Caucasian under like circumstances, nor is it found that any of these evince any more mentality for being contaminated with Caucasian blood.

I attended the twelfth anniversary of this association on the 30th of April. It was well attended, principally by ladies. The exercises were opened by reading the Scriptures and prayer. A hymn, prepared for the occasion, was then sung by the children, with a beauty and accuracy, which might put to shame some of our white choirs of more mature age. They seemed in ecstacy as they poured forth their growing souls in harmonious gratitude for the blessings that had fallen on them. Never did I see a handsomer group of children. I know I shall be indulged in my own fancy, and notion of beauty, though some, doating of a white skin as the sine qua non of beauty, may call me insane. So be it. But those children were handsome, nevertheless. A black horse, a black cow, or black coat, or hat, or boot, or even bonnet and cloak, and dress, all are handsome. Now pray tell us why a black face may not be handsome.

The children were addressed in a very affectionate style—and addresses were also made by the Rev. Dr. Hall and Rev. Mr. Granger, congratulating the Society, and encouraging the enterprise. How much more befitting their calling, than if they had lent their voices in defense of those God-defying enactments designed to crush the poor Ethiopian, and carry him to slavery.

The Rev. Mr. Henderson spoke eloquently of the long debt due the Ethiopian. Surely never was such a debt due to any other people—1st. Because no other people has been robbed of so much which ought to be returned; and, 2d. Because no other people ever conferred so many blessings of art and civilization, as the despised sons of Ham have conferred on the world.

The aim of the association is to give the inmates a good common education, to learn them to perform household duties, and to cultivate the heart and lead them to God.

They are in the school room six hours per day. They are assembled for reading the Scriptures and prayer twice each day. Every energy and affection of those devoted females, the Misses Vandoren and Mann, seemed to be lavished on these dear ones. Oh how befitting woman's tender nature. She was made to love. What a discord in the harmony of nature, would be a woman, engaged with tongue or pen, to cast odium upon any of God's creatures, or to apologize for institutions or laws which gall the struggling soul of man. May heaven continue to smile on the Shelter for colored orphans. D. E. M.

"EDITIO EXPURGATA."

The Tenth Section of the Methodist Book of Discipline reads as follows:

SECTION X.—OF SLAVERY.

Q. What shall be done for the extirpation of the evil of slavery?

A. We declare that we are as much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery; therefore no slaveholder shall be eligible to any official station in our Church hereafter, where the laws in which he lives will admit of emancipation, and permit the liberated slave to enjoy freedom.

2. When any traveling preacher becomes an owner of a slave or slaves, by any means, he shall forfeit his ministerial character in our church, unless he execute, if practicable, a legal emancipation of such slaves, conformably to the laws of the State in which he lives.

3. All our preachers shall prudently enforce upon our members the necessity of teaching their slaves to read the word of God; and to allow them time to attend upon the public worship of God on our regular days of divine service.

At the last General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, an unsuccessful attempt was made by the delegates of the South Carolina and some other conferences, to expunge this section, the Conference considering that it was not yet expedient to do so. But the Southern Christian Advocate has the following article announcing that the responsibility has been taken by the South Carolina Conference.

A NEW EDITION OF THE BOOK OF DISCIPLINE.—The South Carolina Conference, at the last annual session, resolved unanimously, that an edition of the Book of Discipline, amended by having the Tenth Section expunged, should be published for circulation within its bounds. We are happy to state that the committee raised for this purpose have succeeded without embarrassment in executing the resolve of the Conference. An expunged edition has been printed—a fac similie of that bearing the imprimature of John Darly, identical in all respects with the connectional edition, with the exception of the necessary alteration on the title page, and the omission of the closing section of the second part—that on Slavery. This section, the fruitful source of so much trouble to the MethodistChurch; setting forth a doctrine to which none of us in the S. C. Conference have ever subscribed; declared in the note appended to it by order of the last General Conference, to have "long since become inoperative, and ceased by common consent to set forth a practical rule or principle," is without ceremony discarded from the book as it ought to have been long since.

Ralph Waldo Emerson and Wm. H. Channing are preparing a biography of the lamented Marchioness Ossoli, better known to the literary public as Margaret Fuller.

General Intelligence.

IMPORTANT FROM CALIFORNIA.

By the arrival of the steamship Alabama, at New Orleans, we have news from California to the 15th of May.

A terrible fire occurred at San Francisco, on the night of May 3d, laying in ashes property to an amount variously estimated from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. Among the buildings destroyed are the Custom House, Union, Parkelet's, National, New World, City, Delmonico's and the Exchange Hotels, also Rose's Buildings, and the offices of the steamship company. The fire also spread to the shipping, consuming a large number of vessels which were lying at their wharves. It was first discovered in Clay street, and ran through about one dozen blocks, quickly spreading to other parts of the city. The greater part of which lies a heap of ruins. The utmost consternation prevailed during the fire, and thousands were turned out of house and home, having lost their all. Measures were about being adopted to relieve the distressed. It is feared that a number of lives have been lost—business was not thought of. San Francisco presents a sorrowing and heart sickening picture.

There was also a great fire at Stockton on the 12th of May, by which it is estimated that about $1,000,000 worth was destroyed. The fire originated in a new and beautiful house just opened under the name of the Merchant's Hotel, formerly known as the Branch, and was probably the work of an incendiary.

The auriferous quartz mines are being rapidly developed. They have been discovered in all parts of the State.

An attack had been made by Indians in the Sacramento Valley upon the miners in the neighborhood of Placerville. Three or four whites had been killed. Steam communication is about to be opened between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands.

The Indian commissioners have succeeded in making treaties with the Indians in San Joaquin district. The U. S. troops and volunteers are still in the field to protect the inhabitants.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

By the arrival of the Mail Steamer Niagara we have dates to the 7th inst. The news from the continent is of some interest and importance.

The Great Exhibition still continues the principal object of interest in England. The day before the steamer sailed the receipts at the Crystal Palace amounted to £2,500 16s., and £18 18s. for the sale of season tickets, which still continues. By the police returns 55,254 people visited the building during the day, a considerable proportion of whom were evidently from the country. In Parliament members had been conversing languidly upon several subjects, but none were of importance.

The French President's speech at Dijon, continued to be the exciting topic of universal interest. It was regarded as the overture to a blow for the Imperial crown. The most important feature in the criticisms of the press is the decided disapprobation expressed by the Debats, the organ of the most powerful supporters of Louis Napoleon in the Parliament. About 12 o'clock on the 3d of June a dreadful hurricane fell on the department of the Cote d'Or, between Dijon and Changy. The whole of that highly cultivated district was covered with hail in the twinkling of an eye. Torrents of rain fell toward 3 o'clock, causing such floods that a portion of Paris and Lyons Railroad was damaged to the extent of some leagues. The gravel was carried off the road, the sleepers were laid bare, and two trains, one from Paris and the other from Chalons, experienced a serious delay.

A telegraphic dispatch from Madrid, which reached Paris on the 4th inst., announces the outbreak of another revolutionary movement in Portugal. Three regiments of foot, three squadrons of horse, and one battalion of altillery, had on the 31st ult., at Elvas and Montemar, declared against the Duke of Saldanha. The seventh division of the army in Portuguese Estremadura has refused to obey the commands of Das Antes. They vow fidelity to the Charter and the Queen, and protest against the revolutionary faction. This intelligence has been confirmed by the Moniteur. All persons who assisted Saldanha in the revolution has been rewarded and promoted.

A riot had taken place at Florence on the 29th ult. The people were fired upon, and two killed and seven or eight wounded

Calandrilli, the colonel of artilleJy who conducted the defense of Rome against the French, and became triumvir for a few days after the resignation of Mazzinni, has been tried and condemned to death.

A young man named Ercoli has been sentenced to the gallies in Rome, for twenty years, for having, as it is alleged, prevented a companion from smoking! There is good reason to believe that Ercoli only gave his opinion upon the smoke question, that he was overheard, taken before a tribunal of five prelates, and sentenced to the galleys. It is added that he was so beaten by the sbirri that he will die in prison. At Viterbo, a party of French dragoons stole some fowls roasting for a body of Roman Dragoons, whereupon there was a fight.

MRS. JUDSON.—This lady is now in England, unless she has left there for her native land. By the last of this, or the first of the next month, she will probably be with her relatives and friends in Hamilton. The preparation of her husband's biography will no doubt claim her early attention. As the public is looking for it, and looking for something worthy of that eminent missionary, her aid will be indispensable to the person who may be selected to prepare it. Liberal extracts will be required from the public and private correspondence of the deceased, and various other documents which she alone has in her possession. To insure any proper patronage this work must be well done. No one will want a superficial affair, but every one will want a copy if prepared with fidelity, and ability, to put in his library and transmit to his posterity. The life of Mr. J. runs along the whole line of our foreign mission operations, from their earliest commencement to the present day; and Prof. Gammell is the man in the minds of brethren generally, to engage in the work. We hope he may be the choice of Mrs. J. likewise. He certainly has acquitted himself well in his history. [Ch. Chron.

THE MAINE GOLD MINES.—The Boston Traveler says that Mr. George H. Campbell, formerly a reporter in that city, who has spent several years in the gold mines of California has lately paid a visit to the gold mines in Maine. He writes to the Times from Madison, on the Kennebec River, about twenty miles above Waterville, and says that gold in small quantities is to be found betwen that place and the Canada line; but the writer is inclined to think that five cents per day per man would be more than the average result of diligent labor. The first discovery made on this side of the Canadian line, was at Carney Brook, where a Mr. Carney keeps a public house, and since that time some hundreds have tried their hands there at prospecting, and some hundreds more are expected. The writer is of opinion that gold is scattered all along over the Northern part of Maine, but probable searching for it would prove ruinous to the undertaker. The Bangor Mercury says that there is great excitement in that city in consequence of the exhibition of valuable specimens dug on the Canada side. A letter has been received in that city from a gentleman, who states that he is making from twelve to eighteen dollars per day As many as one hundred men have left Bangor within a few days, and many others are preparing to go. At the mines in Canada two or three thousand persons are already collected, and a company of English troops is guarding the line to keep the Yankees on their own side.

EXPEDITION TO THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.—The steamer St. Ange sailed from St. Louis on the 7th inst. with a heavy cargo, and about 100 voyagers bound for the Rocky Mountains. Her destination is the mouth of the Yellow Stone River, more than two thousand miles up the Missouri, and the head of steamboat navigation on that River. At that point most of her passengers will take to Mackinaw boats, and proceed to the Falls of the Missouri. Most of these are the mountain men, in the employ of the American Fur Company, and whose sphere of operations is among the tribes at the base of the Rocky Mountains. Dr. Evens, U. S. Geologist, is a passenger, and two distinguished Jesuit missionaries(Fathers De Smedt and Hæken) have taken advantage of this trip of the St. Ange to visit various wild tribes of Indians on both sides of the mountains. The missionaries will remain among the Indians from two to three years. The Captain of the St. Ange takes up with him his wife and family, and his estimable lady will be the first white female that has ever ascended the Missouri as high as the Yellow Stone.

LIQUOR LAWS.—A joint Select Committee of the Connecticut Legislature have reported a bill prohibiting the sale of wines, spirituous or malt liquors, except for medicinal, mechanical, scientific or religious uses. The civil authorities of the several towns are authorized to convene once a year, to license or not, at their discretion, persons to sell wines and liquors for these purposes. A fine of $10 is imposed upon any person violating the law on conviction for the first offense, a fine of $20 on the second conviction, and $30, or imprisonment in the county jail or workhouse for thirty days, at the discretion of the Court. If Grand Jurors neglect to prosecute upon complaint made, any elector of the town may prosecute in behalf of the town. Any person convicted of the violation of the law, who shall appeal from the decision of the Justice of the Peace, in case he shall not be successful in reversing such judgment in the County Court to which the appeal is taken, the County Court is to impose a fine of double the amount imposed by the Justice. This act is to be submitted to the people in September next.

MEETING HOUSE DESTROYED.—The Woodbury (N. J.) Constitution, states that the Friend's Meeting house at Haddonfield, one of the most venerable religious edifices in the country, was lately destroyed by one of the opposition parties into which the ancient society was divided some twenty-four years ago, during the discussions about the doctrines set forth by Elias Hicks. At the time of this great division among the Friends, the adherents of the two parties in this meeting agreed amicably to occupy different parts of this old meeting house, and accordingly the partition was let down, and for twenty-four years each party met peaceably in its own section, Lately, however, symptoms of uneasiness began to be manifested. The Constitution says that the several parties differed about a proposal to tear down the old edifice and build a more modern one, and after much controversy, no satisfactory result being arrvied at, the one party took a posse of about 30 laborers, and tore down the whole building on the 19th of last month.

DISTRESSING.—The St. Louis Union of 10th inst., states, that among the other disasters of the flood, not the least distressing and calamitous, has been the rendering of almost one thousand persons residing on the opposite side of the river, houseless and homeless. Those persons, driven away from their dwellings in Illinoistown by the influx of the water as high as the the second story, and in some cases by the the sweeping of their houses down the Missisippi, have taken refuge in this city, destitute of a roof to shelter them, and in many instances of all means to secure the most ordinary comfort in the general wreck of their personal and household effects. Great numbers of them have resorted to the Sturgeon market, where they are living for the present in the most comfortable way they can.

THE WEATHER AND CROPS IN FLORIDA.—The Tallehasse Sentinal says: We have very discouraging accounts of the crops in this vicinity. They are suffering much from drouth, and in respect to corn, we suppose a short and probably insufficient crop is now inevitable. The drouth has now (Monday morning) continued about five weeks. Five weeks ago yesterday, we had a terrible washing rain, with a violant squall and hail, and although since that time there have been a few little showers here and there, they were so light and local as to be almost inconsiderable. Without rain soon, the corn crop must be an utter failure, and it has already suffered much. The general health of this vicinity, so far as we can learn, is good.

FROM THE CHEROKEE NATION.—The Tahlequah Advocate states that the delegation which was sent to Washington City to effect a final adjustment of the Cherokee per capita, have returned, after accomplishing all that was possible in the matter. Instructions are to be soon given to the Superintendent of the Western Territory as to the manner of procedure for the payment of the moneys, and the census of both parties is to be taken very nearly in accordance with the wishes and views of the people of the nation. The "Old Settlers" and the emigrant moneys will be paid out this Summer, or early in the Fall. It is also said that the census of what are termed the North Carolina Indians will be taken immediately by the United States Government.

A CITIZEN OF NEW YORK STATE SEIZED AND THROWN INTO A MARYLAND PRISON!—The N. Y. Tribune says:—By a private letter, we learn that on the 4th or 5th of the present month, while the bark Zion, Capt. Reynolds, of this port was laying in the dock at Baltimore, the cook was seized and dragged to prison. He was charged with being a fugitive slave. Capt Reynolds and the consignee interested themselves in the colored man's behalf, and contended that he was not a fugitive. Upon examination it appeared that the cook did not answer the description of the claimants, certain brand marks named in the papers not being found upon his person. He was accordingly discharged upon condition that he would pay the costs of his false imprisonment! He is a free born citizen of Long Island, in New York State.

THE U. S. REVENUE.—The fiscal year of the United States is just closing, and the revenue promises to be much greater than was expected. The receipts from customs up to June 9 (three weeks less than a year) were $44,382,134, which is an increase of seven millions over the same time last year. The land sale receipts of the year, so far as returned, are over two millions, and will probably go up to two and a half millions. The entire revenue of the year will probably reach fifty millions, which is five millions more than the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury. Two millions of the customs revenue comes from California.

SUMMARY.

Ezekiel D. Camp, of Butler county, Ohio, who has resided on the same farm for thirty-eight years, recently invited all his descendants to dine with him. The larger part of them were present and partook of a sumptuous farmer's dinner. The old gentleman, seventy-two years of age, and his companion for more than fifty years, sat at the head of the table. Then were arranged in order fourteen children, eighty-eight grand children, twenty-eight great grand children, and thirty who had intermarried with the family—making one hundred and and sixty; thirty-nine, were dead or absent. The children of the patriarch were seventeen in number, viz: twelve sons and five daughters.

A dispatch from Washington June 19, says:—The California Indian Commissionrs report to the Indian Bureau that they concluded a treaty with the Sujante, Coconoon, Potoyante, Apangasse, Aplache, and Analache tribes of California Indians, on the 19th March last. The Indians ceded all their lands and consented to be located on four townships between Morcedo and Tomolimnee Rivers. They bind themselves to refrain from acts of hostility or aggression against our citizens and to live in friendship with all. The Indian tribes removed to their new home next day, under the superintendence of Commissioner McKee.

A Philadelphia correspondent writes under date of June 13: "It appears that M'll. Jenny Lind was swindled on Wednesday last, most outrageously. She was unable to have prepared in time a new set of tickets for her first independent concert and was compelled to use some belonging to Mr. Barnum. Well, a speculator of your city having understood that the tickets used were the same as a large number he had in his possession, sent his on and sold them. The consequence was, that the Hall was crowded to excess, and M'lle. Lind was cheated out of about $600.

Rev. William Johnson, officiating Episcopal minister at Tuscaloosa, Alabama, while on a recent visit to Lowndes county, was waylaid by two young men named Orris Rush and Judson Rush, and beaten so severely with a club that his life is despaired of. This attack was prompted it is supposed, by an old grudge that had its origin many years since, when these young men were members of a school, of which Mr. Johnson was the principal.

The slave Damon, convicted of the murder of Tilghman Hunt, his master, was lately hanged at Fayetteville, N. C. Before his execution he was permitted to address the crowd, and called on all persons present to look on him as an example. He said he had committed murder and was about to suffer justly. His remarks were principally addressed to the colored persons present.

A free colored man named Charles Wedley, was recently kidnapped from Pittsburg, and taken into Maryland where he was offered for sale. The gentleman to whom the offer was made interrogated him closely, and being convinced from his statements and his intelligent demeanor that he was a freeman, assisted him to escape from his kidnappers, and he returned to Pittsburg, after an absence of two weeks.

The celebrated Geneva watches have come out in great force at the World's Fair. There are watches for the deaf and blind—a watch which runs with one winding three hundred and seventy-four days; one smaller than a fourpenny-piece, to hang in a serpent brooch; one still smaller, in the top of a gold pencil case, tells the hour, day of week and month.

A paragraph is going the rounds of the press to the effect that shortly before the decease of John C. Calhoun, some of his friends conceived the idea of raising a fund to pay off his debts, and send him to Europe, and unknown to him had partly executed the plan when he died. They have given the money raised ($30,000) to his widow.

A few days ago, Hon. W. B. Turley, Judge of one of the courts at Memphis, Tenn., in stepping from the door of his hotel, fell and his cane, being broken, pierced his left side near the region of the heart, inflicting a terrible wound, of which he died.

The Catholic clergyman, J. J. Doherty, charged before a court in Springfield, Mass., with the seduction of Mary Monegan, has settled the affair by paying the girl's father $1600, and signing a paper setting forth that he knows nothing, so far as other parties are concerned, by which her chastity can be impeached.

The Gardiner Transcript says the northern gold mines are "a complete humbug." A company have opened a house of entertainment and in order to get custom, send letters to every part of the State, giving glowing accounts of their golden researches. The Transcript adds:—"That gold may have been found somewhere in that region is probably correct, but that it can be obtained in such quantities, that a man can realize more than sixpence a day is false."

A correspondent of the Reflector, writing from North Groton, Mass., states that on the 13th inst. a dreadful calamity occurred at at that place. A cabinet maker by the name of Annable, in reducing some varnish, left it too long on the fire. His house was immediately enveloped in flames and his wife and two daughters were burned to death. Mr. Annable and his son, alone, of his family, survive the catastrophe.

The Rochester Daily Advertiser states that not a dollar of spurious paper made by Stoddard is now held in that city; and that the amount in existence does not exceed $10,000 which is divided between a commission house in New York, and banks in Massachusetts. In February, some $40,000 was afloat, and was taken up by good paper and property. It is evident that Mr. S. intended to redeem the whole of it.

The trial of Abraham Taylor and Nicholas Murphy, implicated in the Cosden tragedy in Kent County, Md., were by motion of counsel, removed to Elkton, in Cecil County. The trial of Taylor came off last week, and resulted in his conviction, on the 19th inst., of murder in the first degree. Murphy is now on trial for the murder of Mrs. Cosden.

The property of Philadelphia is rated at $137,000,000; of Boston at $214,000,000; of New York at $286,000,000. Dividing the property by the population, each Philadelphian is worth $433, each New Yorker $556, and each Bostonian over $1500, making Boston the richest city proportionately in the United States, and probably in the world.

The Saratoga papers state that a bed of the purest quality peat has been discovered within four miles of the village of Saratoga Springs. The surface extends some sixty acres. Excavations have been made to a great depth, without finding any bottam to the strata. It is said to be much cheaper, and far superior to coal in its use in stoves or grates.

The Territoral University of Minnesota has been located at St. Anthony. This is a new town built up within the last two years, immediately around the Falls. The University building is to be erected immediately. The school money has been so husbanded as to secure every child a good common school education, free of all expense to parents.

The Albany Argus announces the death of Col. Peter Relyea, a prominent and estimable citizen; also Dr. Thomas H. Neeley, a young man of rare abilities and acquirements in his profession. The latter died of ship fever, contracted in the performance of his duty at the Alms-House

The Mayor of Augusta has published a card granting his approval of the request of many citizens of that place for a suspension of sixty days in enforcing the provisions of the Liquor law, in order that the dealers may make arrangements for getting rid of their stock.

The equestrian statue of Gen. Jackson, which is one-third larger than life, weighing 35,000 pounds, aud made of brass condemned by Government, is to be placed on the pedestal in Lafayette Square, Washington, opposite the President's House, on the 4th of July.

The Concord (Mass.) Freeman states that a large sized sewing-needle was extracted a few days since from the breast of a lady in Shirley, by Dr. E. P. Hills, which she says was accidentally thrust into one of the lower extremities near the knee, some twenty years ago.

At Harrisburgh lately, a little boy, about three years old, son of Mr. Theo. Schaeffer, of that place, fell into a tub of boiling water, and was horribly scalded. When the clothes were taken off, the skin came with them!

A New York ship builder, Webb, has received an order from an English house for a first class clipper ship. This is the first order of the kind ever received in New York. This kind of "American specimens" is rapidly beating the world.

The extensive looking glass and picture frame manufactory of Abel Shaw, New Bedford, Mass., was badly damaged by fire on the evening of the 20th inst. Loss between $4,000 and $5,000. Fully insured.

Notice.

THE Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society will hold its Quarterly Meeting at the house of Eld. W. B. Gillett, New Market, N. J., on Thursday, the 3d of July next, at 3 o'clock P. M.

G. B. UTTER, Secretary.

Notice.

A REGULAR Meeting of the Board of Managers of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society will be held pursuant to adjournment, at the house of Eld. W. B. Gillett, in New Market, N. J., on the 3d day of July next, at 11 o'clock A. M. T. B. STILLMAN, Rec. Sec.

Notice.

THE Committee of the Publishing Society on the Monthly Periodical would request ministers and others who have received the Circular of the Committee, to forward the articles solicited for the Biographical Department as soon as practicable, as the publication must be delayed until a sufficient number of articles are furnished to insure the regular issue of the work after it is commenced. It is desirable to have a memoir of every minister or other distinguished Sabbath-keeper in the denomination. It is possible some ministers may have been overlooked, or a wrong direction given to the circular intended for them; if such should be the case, they will consider this a request to furnish leading events, at least, of their own life, or that of any other person coming within the scope of the object of the Society. Eight Lithographic Portraits, drawn in the best style of the art, are now ready for the press, and others will be prepared as soon as proper materials are furnished to the Committee, that each number may have a portrait as intended.

New York, Albany, and Troy Steamers.

THE steamer EMPIRE, Capt. H. Gillespie, will leave the pier foot of Cortlandt-st., New York, on Tuesdays and Thursdays, at 6 P. M., and on Sundays at 5 P. M., for Albany and Troy.

The steamer TROY, Capt. R. H. Fury, will leave the pier foot of Cortlandt-st. on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, at 6 P. M., for Albany and Troy.

SUNDAY EVENING STEAMER.—The steamer EMPIRE will leave the pier foot of Cortlandt-st. on each Sunday evening through the season, at 5 P. M., landing at Newburgh, Poughkeepsie, Kingston, Catskill, and Hudson.

For passage or freight apply on board, or to F. Hyde, at the office on the pier. L. H. TUPPER, Agent.

The Ladies' Wreath.

PROSPECTUS OF THE SIXTH VOLUME.—The May number commenced Vol. VI. of this popular Magazine; and the Publishers confidently assert, that the forthcoming volume will rival, in the beauty and elegance of its Embellishments, and the Literary Merit of its contents, any former volume, or any Dollar Magazine in the World!—Each number will contain one or more fine Steel Engravings, and a beautifully colored Flower Plate. It will be printed on Fine White Paper, with Large, Clear-Faced Type. The best Writers in the country have been engaged to enrich its pages, and no pains will be spared to make it what it assumes to be—a Model Magazine.

The Editorial Department will be conducted by HELEN IRVING, a lady justly celebrated for her refined taste and extensive literary acquirements; besides occasional gems from the pen of Mrs. S. T. MARTYN, the late Editress, under whose control the work has secured its present high standard of literature and moral excellence, and a circulation unparalleled by any similar work. The present Editress will be sustained by a list of Contributors not excelled by any periodical in the country; many of them are among the most popular writers of the day.

The Musical Department, under the control of an eminent Professor, will be enriched by Original Pieces from some of the ablest Composers.

Particular Notice!—Postage Reduced!—On and after the 1st of July, the Postage on the "Wreath," within 500 miles of the office of publication, will be one cent per number; and any distance over 500 and within 1,500 miles, two cents—if paid quarterly in advance.

TERMS.—The subscription price of the "Ladies' Wreath" is One Dollar a year—invariably in advance. Best Terms to Clubs.—We offer to Clubs the following low terms, which are very near the cost: Four copies for one year, to be sent to one address, $3; Eight do. do. $6; Fourteen do. do $10; Twenty do. do. $14. Any person wishing to get up a Club, will be supplied with a Specimen Number by writing for it, and paying the postage. Bound Volumes are always on hand, and will be exchanged for numbers in good order, by paying the price of Binding. Back Numbers can always be supplied.

☞ One Hundred Efficient Agents Wanted, to canvass all parts of the country. To men of energy, furnishing testimonials of character, liberal encouragement will be given. Postmasters are authorized to act as Agents. Address, J. M. FLETCHER & CO.,

New Era for the "Best Youth's Magazine!"

☞ GREAT REDUCTION OF POSTAGE! ☜

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET

STILL under the editorial charge of FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, commences a new series with the issue of the number for July, 1851. This number is now ready. Now is the time to subscribe.

The great reduction in postage goes into effect on the first day of July. From and after that day, the postage on a single number of the Cabinet (paid quarterly, in advance) will be, for any distance not over 500 miles, 1 cent; over 500, and not over 1500, 2 cents—it being a reduction to all subscribers within 500 miles from 42 cents to 12 cents per annum, to all other subscribers in the Union a reduction of almost one half from the old rates. The publisher anticipates, as the result of this liberal reduction, a large and immediate addition to his subscription list from every part of the country, as the former high rates of postage have deterred many from receiving the work by mail.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet, in its reading matter, in the number, variety, and beauty of its illustrations, and in its general costume, now stands at the head of all monthly publications for the young. "It is unqualifiedly the best youth's magazine in America."—Brattleboro Democrat. "It is a model for all works of its class. We cannot too warmly commend it."—N. Y. Tribune. "It gives us pleasure to recommend it to our southern friends."—Balt. West. Continent. "Best magazine for youth we have ever seen."—Christ. Adv. & Jour. "It is a little world within itself."—N. Y. Independent. "Best publication of its class that I am acquainted with."—Rev. Dr. Adams.

Each number contains 32 pages, and some 8 or 10 beautiful engravings. The reading matter is just such as is best adapted to amuse, entertain, and instruct the young mind.

☞ Please send on your orders at once. Specimen numbers can be seen at the office of this paper, or they will be forwarded, gratis, on application, (post paid,) to the publisher. Subscribers may send money by mail, at the publisher's risk.

Terms, (invariably in advance,) $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5.

Clergymen, postmasters, editors, and school teachers, who will form clubs of four or more, and who will forward the money, shall be allowed an additional copy for their trouble; or they are authorized to retain 25 per cent. on all new subscriptions, where the full price ($1) is paid.

Bound volumes, (of which there are now 5,) $1 25 each; the whole set, $5 50.

☞ Postage Free!—Subscribers at a distance, who will remit the full price ($1 25 each) shall receive the volumes postage free. These volumes contain nearly 500 pages each.

AGENTS WANTED.

The publisher wishes to employ several gentlemen in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, Publisher.
118 Nassau-st., New York.

NOTE.—The publishers or editors of those newspapers to whom this advertisement is sent, MARKED, are requested to give it (not including this note) some half a dozen conspicuous insertions; for which they shall be entitled to receive a copy of the Cabinet, monthly, for two years, on their sending to the address of "Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet" copies of the papers containing the advertisement; or, if preferred, they shall receive one volume of the Cabinet bound in muslin, and a copy of "Woodworth's Stories about Animals," illustrated with 40 engravings. Those who prefer the latter, must signify such preference and inform us how the books are to be sent. D. A. WOODWORTH.

Miscellaneous.

THE BIRD'S SONG.

I asked a sweet robin one morning in May,
Who sung in the apple-tree over the way,
What 'twas she was singing so sweetly about,
For I 'd tried a long time, but I could not find out;
"Why I'm sure," she replied, "you cannot guess wrong,
Don't you know I am singing a Temperance Song?"

"Teetotal—O that's the first word of my lay,
And then don't you see how I rattle away?
'Tis because I've just dipped my beak in the spring,
And brushed the fair face of the lark with my wing.
Cold Water, Cold Water, yes, that is my song,
And I love to keep singing it all the day long."

"And now my sweet miss, wont you give me a crumb,
For the dear little nestlings are waiting at home?
And one thing beside, since my story you 've heard,
I hope you'll remember the lay of the bird,
And never forget, while you list to my song,
All the birds to the Cold Water Army belong.

POSTAGE UNDER THE NEW LAW.

Decisions under the new Postage Act, made by the Postmaster-General, after consulting with the Attorney-General.

Post-Office Department, June 11, 1851.

The postage on all bound books and on all other printed matter, except newspapers and periodicals published at intervals not exceeding three months, and sent from the office of publication to actual and bona fide subscribers, must be prepaid.

If the amount paid and marked on such printed matter is not sufficient to pay the whole postage due, the excess of weight beyond that paid for is to be charged with double the rate which would have been charged if prepaid; and the postage on such excess collected at the office of delivery.

If by the neglect of a postmaster such matter is sent without any prepayment, the double prepaid rate must be collected on delivery.

Postage must be charged on all letters, newspapers and other matter, according to the distance on the route by which they are forwarded; and this (unless otherwise directed by the sender,) must be by the route by which they will soonest reach their destination, although that may not be the shortest route.

On letters to and from Great Britain (and the continent of Europe when sent through England,) the rates of postage and modes of rating will be the same as heretofore, except as to letters to or from California and Oregon, in respect to which special instructions will be hereafter given.

On all letters to or from the continent of Europe, not sent through England, the United States inland and sea postage will in all cases be combined, and will be twenty cents the single rate, without the regard to the distance the same are carried within the United States. The mode of rating will be the same as heretofore.

Subscribers to periodicals, to obtain the benefit of the provision in regard to prepayment, must pay the full quarter's postage before the delivery of the first number, when there are several numbers to be delivered during the quarter. If, by reason of any increase in the size of the periodical, or otherwise, it shall appear that the whole quarter's postage was not so paid in advance, the subscriber will lose the benefit of prepayment, and the numbers received during the whole quarter will be charged with the double or unpaid rate, and the subscriber will be credited with only the amount paid in advance.

Under the provisions of the second section of the new postage act, no newspapers other than those published weekly only, are entitled to circulate free of postage in the counties where published. The office of publication is the office where the newspaper is printed.

In determining newspaper postages, the distances are to be computed from the office of publication, and not from the county in which the paper is published; and the distance is also to be computed over the route on which it is carried.

Newspapers published weekly only in a county adjoining the Canada line may be sent free to Canada, provided they do not leave the county of publication, until they cross the line into Canada.

Newspaper publishers may send and receive their exchange newspapers to and from Canada free of charge.

A newspaper is not a periodical within the meaning and intent of the provision which requires the postage on periodicals to be paid in advance, and declares that the postage thereon shall be one-half of the rates previously specified in the second section of the act. All subscribers to newspapers were and still are required by the provisions of the thirtieth section of the act of March, 1825, to pay one quarter's postage in advance; but by so doing they are not entitled to have the postage reduced below the established rates.

Payments in advance on newspapers and periodicals can only be made by the subscribers at the post-office where they are to be delivered.

The postage on newspapers, periodicals and other matter not chargeable with letter postage, when sent out of the United States, must be prepaid at the full rate. Publishers may prepay postage on their issues, but can have no deduction of postage on account of such prepayment.

When a periodical is published only quarterly, the actual and bona fide subscriber for such periodical may pay in advance, and have the benefit of the advance payment, provided he pays, to the postmaster at the office where he is to receive the periodical, before its delivery. If a periodical is published less frequently than quarterly, the postage must be prepaid, and at the full rate.

Letters mailed before the first day of July, though delivered after, will, in all cases, be charged with postage at the rates in force at the time of the mailing thereof.

N. K. HALL, Postmaster General.

A Circular of the Postmaster General concerning postage stamps, says: To facilitate the prepayment of postages upon letters and packages, postage stamps of the following denominations are provided and furnished by the Postmaster General, pursuant to the 3d section of the "act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851, viz:—

No. 1, printed in black, representing the head of Washington, of the denomination of 12 cents.

No. 2, printed in red, representing the head of Washington in profile, of the denomination of three cents.

No. 3, printed in blue, representing the head of Franklin in profile, of the denomination of one cent.

These stamps will be furnished to one or more of the principal postmasters in each county, who will be required to supply the other postmasters in their respective vicinities, upon being paid for the amounts furnished.

All other persons wishing supplies of stamps can obtain them from the postmaster at the county seat nearest their residences, or from the postmaster of any other office having them for sale.

The postage stamps may be used in the prepayment of postage on letters to foreign countries, in all cases where such prepayment can be made in money.

The 3d section of the "Act to reduce and modify the rates of postage," &c., approved 3d March, 1851, makes it a felony for any person to forge, or counterfeit, or knowingly use or sell, or have in his possession with intent to use or sell, any postage stamp provided or furnished under that or any former act, and declares that, on conviction thereof, the offender shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both fine and imprisonment. And the 4th section of said act declares that if any person shall use, or attempt to use, in prepayment of postage, any postage stamp which shall have been before used for like purposes, such person shall be subject to a penalty of fifty dollars for every such offense, to be recovered in the name of the United States, in any court of competent jurisdiction.

The present five and ten cent stamps are useless after the 30th day of June, and such Postmasters as are authorized to sell stamps are directed to redeem such as are presented.

ORIGINAL LETTER OF DR. FRANKLIN.

The following letter was brought to light by the London correspondent of the Boston Post. In communicating it to that journal he says: "It is copied verbatim, et literatim, spelling, punctuation, capitals, and all—and as near a fac simile as my writing could make it—just as it stands in the original. I have reason to suppose it has never before been published."

Philadelphia, March 1, 1755.

Sir,—I am but just returned from a long Journey, after near 6 Months Absence and find your Fav. of Sept. 20, by which I have the agreeable Advice that you expect to be able to remit me something in Smith's Affairs very soon.

As to the Thickness of Wire necessary or sufficient to conduct a large Quantity of Lightning, concerning which you desire my Sentiments, you will find something on that Head, in Pages 124, and 125, of the enclos'd Pamphlet, which please to accept. And I may add, that in my late Journey I saw an Instance of a very great Quantity of Lightning conducted by a Wire no bigger than a common knitting Needle. It was at Newbury, in New England, where the Spire of the Church Steeple being 70 foot in height above the Belfry was split all to pieces and thrown about the Street in Fragment; from the Bell down to the Clock, plac'd in the Steeple 20 foot below the Bell, there was the small Wire above mentioned which communicated the Motion of the Clock to the Hammer striking the Hour on the Bell. As far as the wire extended, no Part of the Steeple was hurt by the Lightning, nor below the Clock as far as the Pendulum Rod reached; but from the end of the Rod, downwards the Lightning rent the Steeple surprisingly. The Pendulum Rod was about the thickness of a small Tobacco Pipe Stem, and conducted the whole without damage to its own Substance, except that the End where the Lightning was all accumulated, it appeared melted as much as made a small Drop. But the Clock wire was blown all to smoke, and smutted the church wall which it passed in a broad black Track, and also the Cieling under which it was carried horizontally. No more of it was left than about an Inch and half next the Tail of the Hammer, and as much joining to the Clock. Yet this is observable that tho' it was ~~so small~~ as not to be sufficient to conduct the Quantity with Safety to its own Substance, yet it did conduct, so as to secure all that Part of the Building. Excuse this Scrawl, which I have not time to copy fair.

I am, with much Respect, Sir,
Your very humble Servant,
B. FRANKLIN.

P. S. I have just been reading a similar instance taken from the Journal des Scavans, for 1676, page 113—viz "En 1676 le tonnere "ecrasa le clocker de l'Abbage d Sains Me- "dard de Soissons; la fondre se ports a une "grande Distance le long des fils d'aschal qui "communiquoient a l'horloge; elle fondit ces "cordes metalligues, sans faire d'autres de- "sordes dans tout le trajet."

Method of Hardening objects in Plaster of Paris, and Rendering them like Marble.—The following is from the London Chemical Gazette: Take 2 parts of stearine, 2 parts Venetian soap, 1 part pearlash and 24 to 30 parts of solution of caustic potash. The stearine and the soap are cut into slices, mixed with the cold lye and boiled for about half an hour, constantly stirring. Whenever the mass rises a little cold lye is added. The pearlash, previously moistened with a little rain-water, is then added, and the whole boiled for a few minutes. The mass is then stirred until cold, when it is mixed with so much cold lye that it becomes perfectly liquid, and runs off the spoon without coagulating and contracting. Before using this composition, it should be kept for several days well covered. It may be preserved for years. Before applying it to the objects, they should be well dusted, the stains scraped away, and then coated by means of a thick brush with the wash, as long as the Plaster of Paris absorbs it, and left to dry. The coating is then dusted with leather or a soft brush. If the surface has not become shining the operation must be repeated.

The Higalander and the Crocodile.—When the brigade under Sir David Baird, was marching up the eastern bank of the Nile, towards Cairo, a number of stragglers fell behind, unable, from fatigue, to keep up with the main body. A rear-guard was consequently detached to protect the stragglers, and keep them together. One of them, a Highlander, however, became so exhausted that his comrades were obliged to leave him to his fate. He had not been long alone when he saw a large crocodile waddling towards him with a very portentous aspect. Poor Donald eyed the monster as it approached him with feelings of intense alarm, and although almost unable to walk, he mustered up his little remaining strength and abided the onslaught of the enemy. As the unwieldy brute was slewing himself round to seize him, Donald dexterously got astride on its back, and kept his seat. He at once drew his bayonet (for he had parted with his musket,) and every time the animal turned round his head to bite him, he pricked it severely behind its fore-leg, or wherever he could make the steel penetrate. How long the contest continued Donald could not well tell, but he thought it an age. When the rear-guard reached head-quarters, the general, on being informed that Donald had been left behind, immediately dispatched a corporal's guard to bring him in. On coming up to Donald, he was still astride of his Bucephalus, which was by this time nearly exhausted by the wounds inflicted by the bayonet. The musket soon accomplished what the bayonet had begun, and Donald was brought into camp little the worse for his extraordinary encounter, and was ever after known in the regiment as the "Crocodile Dragoon."

THE PENDULUM EXPERIMENT.

A great deal of popular interest is now manifested in the verification of M. Foucault's beautiful experiment illustrative, or, rather, demonstrative of the earth's rotation on its axis; and it is delightful that it is so. There is nothing better adapted to enlarge the minds of the people than a study of the laws on which the universe is built, and according to which it goes.

The great law of motion is, that matter does not move itself nor stop itself when in motion. If infinite space were empty, and a globe created and an impulse given it in that space, it would continue to move in a straight line to all eternity. If, in addition to the onward impulse, a rotatory or rolling motion were also given it, that would also continue forever. Then if another globe were created, and both be endowed with a tendency to rush together, varying inversely as the square of their distance, that is, four times as strong at half the distance, nine times as strong at one third of the distance, and so on, and this new globe be placed any where out of the line of motion of the first one, with or without any impulse of its own, the two would directly, by virtue of the laws or conditions described, begin to revolve in circular or elliptic orbits about their common center of gravity or attraction. And what is remarkable is, that the rotation around its axis of the first globe would not be at all affected by the creation of the second, either in its rapidity or direction of its axis. That is, the axis in any one position will be precisely parallel to the line which it occupied in any other position of the globe. It is on this law that the regularity of our seasons depends.

By a corollary or consequence of the same law, if a pendulum, hanging by a perfectly flexible string, be set in motion, not by impulse, but by the action of gravity, or in the precise plane of that action, it will continue to vibrate in the same mathematical plane. Supposing the earth fixed, the plane in which the vibration will always continue will be that drawn through the pendulum at its original elevation, its point of suspension, and the center, or center of gravity, of the earth. But if the earth, including the point of suspension, moves, either in a straight line or curve, the pendulum itself being free, or at least in a great measure so, as to the plane in which it will vibrate, that plane will tend to continue parallel to itself. This comparative freedom of the pendulum, together with its inertia, or tendency to persevere in its state of rest or motion, till it meets with resistance adequate to produce a change, is the reason why [illegible] plane of its vibration does not partake of the motion of the earth, but revolves in regard to it.

If the world were a disc, and revolved like a wheel about its center, and its center of gravity were at an infinite distance beneath it, then a pendulum swinging over any part of its (upper) surface would move in planes parallel to each other, and would illustrate its rotation. That is, the plane of the pendulum and the graduated disc under it, would revolve relatively to each other. Looking at the disc as stationary, which it appears to be to us on the earth, the pendulum would seem to traverse its whole circle precisely in one diurnal revolution.

But if the experiment be tried in a staircase of Bunker Hill Monument, it takes more than a diurnal rotation of the earth for the pendulum completely to traverse the circumference of the disc. How is this? This it is which seems to puzzle people. The mathematicians tell us that it depends upon the latitude of the place, how much time it takes. But how does it depend upon the latitude?

The earth is not a disc, but a globe. If a pendulum hang precisely over one of its poles, its plane of vibration will revolve over a disc in precisely 24 hours. But in any other latitude from 90° down to 0°, it will take more time. In our latitude of 42° 22′, for example, it takes nearly 36 hours. At this latitude the point over which the pendulum is suspended, in one rotation of the earth, describes on the sphere the small circle of the parallel of of 42° 22′ and the chords of the arcs of vibration tending to keep parallel constantly cut this circle at different angles, but the angular velocity, so to speak, will not be so great as if the line of suspension were perpendicular to the plane of the circle. To simplify the matter, suppose the surface on which the circle of the latitude is described is not that of the sphere or globe, but that of a cone in which the sphere is inscribed and which touches the sphere in the circle of the latitude and has its apex in the axis of the earth produced. The surface of this cone, from the line of contact with the sphere to the apex, if it be extended on a plane, will form a sector of a circle, of which the circle of the parallel of latitude will be the arc, and the slant height the radius.

This sector will always be less than a whole circle. It keeps growing less and less from the pole, where a whole circle is its limit, to the equator, where a straight line is its limit. Though in the actual experiment the pendulum is carried round this cone with its chords of vibration not exactly parallel to each other, as no two of them are in the same plane, still the angular progress of the chord of vibration in its revolution around its center in the base of the cone may be exactly represented by drawiag lines parallel to the radius across the arc of the sector. A complete revolution will not be effected in describing the arc of the sector, because it takes a whole circle to do that. But the arc of the sector, that is, the base of the cone, will be described in just 24 hours. Hence, as the arc of the sector is to a whole circle, or 360°, so is 24 hours to the time of a complete revolution of the disc. The number of degrees in this arc of the sector depends upon the latitude—to speak mathematically, it is inversely as the sine of the latitude. Therefore, if 24 be divided by the sine of the latitude of 42° 22′, it will give the length of time it takes for a revolution of the disc at Bunker Hill beneath the pendulum, or the apparent revolution of the pendulum around the circumference of the disc.

For example, let the radius of the earth be unity, sin. and cos. stand for sine and consine of the latitude, and p. for the circumference of a circle whose diameter is unity. Hence, from similarity of triangles, by the aid of a diagram, it will be seen that the sine of the latitude is to its consine, as radius or unity to the slant height of the cone. Hence $\frac{cos.}{sin.}$ will express the slant height of the cone, and $2\,\frac{cos.}{sin.}\,p.$ will express the whole circumference of a circle of which the slant height of the cone, or radius of its superficial sector, is the radius. And 2 cos. p. will express the circumference of the base of the cone, which is the arc of the base of the cone, which is the arc of the sector.

Then, if x be put for the number of degrees in this arc, it will give

$$2\,\frac{cos.}{sin.}\,p.\ :\ 2\,cos.\,p.\ ::\ 360\ :\ x.$$

which reduced gives $x = 360\ sin.$ Then, as the arc of the sector is to the whole circle, so is 24 hours to the time required; or,

$$360\ sin.\ :\ 360\ :\ :\ 24\ :\ \frac{360\text{X}24}{360\ sin.} = \frac{24}{sin.}$$

Hence, 24 hours divided by the sine of the latitude gives the time of the complete revolution of the vibrations around the disc.

MODES OF SALUTATION.

When Arabians meet in the morning, their salutation is Subaal hyat! Good morning! In the forenoon they greet with Kaaf fuss baat! in the afternoon with Kaaf un sati! and toward evening with Masaal hire!—the parties shaking hands at each other at these times, and, if not in a hurry, they kiss each other's hands. Merchants and Arabs of high grade usually offer their hands to receive a kiss from passers by, by whom they are frequently stopped. It is of rare occurrence that this condescension is refused to an Arab, even of the most inferior class. Sometimes not only the palms and back of the hands are kissed, but also both knees and the feet. I shall leave it for others to say whether the labial salutation of the Arab is more expressive of joy, reverence, and respect, than that of the Thibetian, who covers his head, puts out his tongue, and scratches his right ear; or that of the Otaheitans and Laplanders, who rub noses; that of the Ethiope, who strips the saluted naked, and wraps the removed robe about his own person; or that of the Japanese and people of Aracan, who take off their slippers in the street; or that of the New Guinean, who places leaves on the head of the saluted; or that of the Hindus, who hug and twice bow their heads from one shoulder to the other; or that of the Banian, who says, "Give me a smell!" or that of the Dutchman, who says, "How do you sail?" and "May you eat a hearty dinner;" or that of the Chinaman, who asks, "Have you eaten your rice?" or that of the inhabitant, "How do you sweat?" or that of the Spaniard, who inquires, "How do you stand?" or that of the Frenchman, who is desirous to know, "How do you carry yourself?" at the same time touching his hat, in which he is aped by the Englishman and American—or whether the fashion of either is really of superlative worth to that of the Greenlander, who has no mode of salutation, and laughs at the idea of inferiority. Slavery in Delaware.—The last annual report of the Delaware Anti-Slavery Society, says: For more than half a century slavery in Delaware has been steadily on the decline. In 1790, when the first census was taken, the number of slaves in the State was about 9,000; a sixth part of the people. Now there are but a little over 2,000, not more than one-fortieth of the people. The greater part of these are in Sussex county; Newcastle and Kent counties united having but 741; while Sussex county has 1,591. The slaves decrease faster in Newcastle county than in either of the other counties. In 1840, Sussex county had 1,637 slaves; in 1850, 1,591; a decrease of only three per cent. in ten years. Newcastle county had in 1840, 541 slaves; in 1850, 393; a decrease of twenty-five per cent. The census of 1840 developed the alarming fact that the whole population of Sussex county was rapidly declining; having then a less population by 2,025 than it had in 1830. Kent county, too, had been declining, but not so rapidly. The increase of Newcastle county alone saved the State from the disgrace of depopulation. Kent and Sussex are now, however, beginning to revive. In Kent, particularly, free labor is gradually but surely driving out slave labor, and as a natural consequence, a spirit of improvement and progress is awakening, the current of its population, heretofore backward, is reversed, and a more thriving condition of things generally betoken the commencement of a better time.

Locomotive Steam Engine.—"I love," says Elihu Burritt, "to see one of these huge creatures, with sinews of brass, and muscles of iron, strut forth from his smoky stable, and saluting the long train of cars with a dozen sonorous puffs from his iron nostrils, fall back gently into his harness. There he stands, champing and foaming upou the iron track, his great heart a furnace of glowing coals; his lymphatic blood is boiling in his veins; the strength of a thousand horses is nerveing his sinews; he pants to be gone. He would drag St. Peters across the desert of Sahara, if he could be carefully hitched to it; but there is a little sober-eyed, tobacco-chewing man in the saddle, who holds him in with one finger, and can take away his breath in a moment, should he grow restive and vicious. I am always deeply interested in this man, for, begrimmed as he may be with machinery, he is the physical mind of that huge steam horse."

No More Corns.—It seems that these painful excresences can be cured in a very simple way. Chambers' Journal discloses a secret, which it avows will relieve humanity from a load of misery not the less difficult to bear that it is unpitied or ridiculed. It says:

The cause of corns, and likewise of the torture they occasion, is simply friction; and to lesson friction you have only to use your toe as you do in like circumstances a coach wheel—lubricate it with some oily substance. The best and the cleanest thing to use, is a little sweet oil rubbed upon the affected part (after the corn is carefully pared) with the finger, which should be done on getting up in the morning, and just before stepping into bed at night. In a few days the pain will diminish, and in a few days more it will cease, when the nightly application may be discontinued.

Uses of Gutta Percha.—The public may not be aware of the progress made in the preparation and manufacture ef this singular article. By different processes it is made elastic like India Rubber, hard like marble, and fit to spread on cloth, thick or thin. A table slab has been made of it, and long used without injury, which posseses all the external qualities of poliished marble. Race horses are shod with it in England. An omnibus, we are assused, has been running in Philadelphia for a year or more, with tires on its wheels made of Gutta Percha, and those best acquainted with its properties believe, that in two years it will be adopted universally in this city for our public vehicles. If so, it will at least save our ears much noise.

Variety.

The Montgomery Journal has a letter from a gentleman of that city, who is now traveling in Egypt, dated at Cairo, in which the writer says: "The Egyptians are probably the laziest people on earth. If you pass through the bazaars, you find the merchants lying about among their wares, smoking long pipes. If you wish to purchase any thing, the owner tells you the price; if you choose to take it, well—if not, he smokes on and says nothing, seeming glad that he has escaped the exertion of taking the money."

If the following were generally known, it would be more generally used. It is an excellent pickle to be eaten with cold meat, &c. The eggs should be boiled hard—say ten minutes—and then divested of their shells. Tie the jars down tight with bladder, and keep them until they begin to change color.

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, there prevailed in parts of Europe a disease, which was called the wolf-sickness. Those affected with it imagined themselves to be wild beasts, and betook themselves to the forests. The persons thus affected were called wehr-wolves. There have arrived at New York during the month of May 477 sail of vessels, from foreign ports, bringing 38,436 emigrants. Of the vessels bringing these, 79 were British. Forty-four children have been born during the passage, and 147, mostly infants, have died on the passage. There have been 114 sail of square rigged vessels from domestic ports during the same time, making a total of 591.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Bibliotheca Sacra,

And American Biblical Repository.

[Conducted by B. B. Edwards, E. A. Park, and M. Stuart, of Andover; Dr. Robinson and H. B. Smith, New York.]

IS published at Andover, Mass., and at New York, on the first of January, April, July and October. Each number will contain at least 216 pages, making a volume of 864 pages yearly.

"The publication will embrace Theology in its widest acceptation, as comprehending the literature of the Scriptures, Biblical Criticism, Natural and Revealed Theology, Church History, with the History of the Christian Doctrines and Sacred Rhetoric. It will also include, to a limited extent, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Classical Literature and Biography. Special prominence will be given to Sacred Literature. It will be the aim to procure for every number two or three articles at least, explanatory or illus trative of the Scriptures, direct expositions of the text, or dicussions in the rich field of Biblical Criticism. Articles will be sought which will be valuable twenty or fifty years hence, in preference to those of a local, temporary, or merely popular character. In short, the great object of the conductors of this publication will be to furnish a Biblical and Theological Journal of an elevated character, which will be welcome to clergymen and enlightened laymen, which will be viewed abroad as doing honor to the scholarship of the United States, and which will directly advance the interests of sound learning and pure religion."

The union of the two Periodicals whose titles are indicated above, will, it is believed, more fully secure the great objects which are set forth in the Prospectus, and more directly advance the cause of Christian truth and sound learning in this country, than can two or more works having the same general object, but which must necessarily be less liberally supported.

The objects to be accomplished are not sectarian nor local nor temporary; and though Andover and New York are more immediately united in editing the work, its contributors, as well as patrons, are found among almost all the religious denominations of the country. Its discussions are conducted on the broad grounds of a common Christianity, for the promotion of the highest religious interests, and the elevation of the standard of American scholarship.

The united work will leave no field unoccupied, which either work has heretofore filled.

The large increase of subscriptions which has beee received in the short time which has elapsed since the union was made public, and the universal approbatiog of the measure which the publisher is daily receivin through the press and from private sources, place beyond a doubt the practicability of the plan, and fully justify the anticipated benefits of the increased strength and stability naturally resulting from such a combination.

The increased patronage secured by this union has encouraged the Publisher to enlarge the present vol ume, and will, it is hoped, justify other improvements which will materially add to the value and interest of the work, while it will continue to be furnished at a lower rate than any similar Periodical has ever been offered in this country.

Terms.—If paid in advance, and sent by mail $3 00
If payment be delayed, ... $4 00

JEWISH LIFE IN CENTRAL EUROPE.

The Days of Awe.—The next festival is that commonly called by the Jews Rosh Hashanah (the beginning of the Year,) which is celebrated sometime in the month of September. This festival is considered as the first day of the civil year, in contradistinction to the ecclesiastical year, commencing with the first of the month of Nissan (some time in April.)

The period of Rosh Hashanah is the most solemn in the whole year. Scripture and tradition unite in impressing upon it the character of profound awe. The latter designates it as the anniversary of the creation of the universe, and as the day when the Supreme Being judges mankind, and pronounces their doom for the year to come. It is therefore a period of repentance, for which a month's previous preparation is made by additional prayers, services performed before daybreak, and the blowing of the shofar. This primitive musical instrument consists of a ram's horn cleaned smooth and made bright by the known processes, having a tapering shape, and bent like a hook in the lower part, with a narrow opening at the top, and a wide one at the bottom. The shrill sounds to be produced by it have been arranged into various classes, each of which is designated by a special name; and the party appointed to blow the horn must know these names, so as to be able to sound the particular tone required. Sacred as this festival is, it is yet only prepartory to that celebrated on the tenth of the month called the Day of Atonement. The whole of the ten days are for this reason called the Ten Days of Penitence, and the holy days themselves the Days of Awe. The religious Jew looks for the advent of that period with feelings of rejoicing mingled with uncommon awe and reverence. He prepares himself for the due celebration of these festivals by a scrupulous self-examination, by the endeavor to compensate for any wrong he might have inflicted, to obtain the pardon of those he might have offended, and by the fasting and penance for the purpose of expiating the sins committed. He holds that the Day of Atonement expiates only sins committed against God, but does not affect offences committed against fellow-men, unless their pardon be previously obtained. Touching instances are recorded of individuals high in station, and eminent for learning, having at the approach of the Days of Awe humbly and repeatedly craved the pardon of persons in every respect their inferiors for the use of an opprobrious expression uttered in the heat of passion.

Before daybreak a public service is held in the synagogue, and in the afternoon, before the advent of the festival of new year, another is performed, after which the religious bathe. The evening service is not distinguished by any particular feature. At the evening meal, some rare fruit coming in season, and an apple with new honey, are always present. The eating of the former is preceded by the solemn benediction, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, who hath kept us alive, and preserved us, and allowed us to attain to this period." The eating of the latter is typical of a "sweet new year." The morning service begins at daybreak; the faithful hasten to the synagogue before tasting food. The devotion with which he implores divine mercy for forgiveness of his sins is most examplary. With his ample prayer-book before him, he turns his face towards the wall, and wraps himself up so completely in his scarf, that nothing but the fore part of his face remains uncovered. The more scrupulously religious put on the white robe mentioned above, and those officiating in the service always appear in it.

The most sacred part of the service, as mentioned before, is the blowing of the shofar. It is the duty of each adult Israelite to hear its sound, and no one in good health would venture to break his fast before his ear has caught the sounds of the shofar. An awful stillness prevails before this part of the service begins, during which every one prepares himself in silence for the act, whilst a special prayer is offered up by the party appointed to blow the horn. At last the solemn silence is interrupted by the bidding of the minister, "blow;" and the summons is obeyed. Thrice the minister bids, and thrice the horn resounds, after which a prayer is recited, when the same ceremony is twice repeated.

At length the ninth of the penitential days—that before the day of Atonement—arrives. This day must not be kept as a fast, as the other penitential days are by many strict Jews. On the contrary, it is enjoined not to abstain on it from the usual comforts of life. As soon as the afternoon meal is over, and grace said, nobody is permitted to take any further nourishment, or to indulge in any of those comforts exciting pleasurable sensations; for this is the interpretation given to the command, "Ye shall afflict your souls," (Lev. 16 : 31,) every one hastens to the synagogue, the interior of which presents a solemn and imposing aspect. There the worshipers stand in awe and reverence, wrapt in silent meditation—their feet, according to Eastern fashion, without the usual covering of boots or shoes, but protected by felt slippers—enveloped in their scarfs; the married men dressed in snow-white flowing robes, and caps to correspond, whilst numerous wax-candles shed a flickering light throughout the building. These are as many in number as there are heads of families, each sending one candle to the synagogue. At last the signal for prayers is given to the rabbi, and the minister begins to chant, in a low, scarcely audible tone, a formula, which is repeated three times, during which the plaintive, tremulous, heart-stirring tune gradually rises to a higher pitch, so as to be distinctly heard over the whole building. The service lasts to a late hour in the evening. Many of the worshipers, however, do not leave the synagogue at all, but spend there the whole night in prayer, meditation and study of the law. The morning service begins at daybreak, and extends over the day, during which time many of the religious do not leave their seat for one moment, and some stand the whole time. The prayers are divided, according to the sacrifices brought to the temple, into the morning, additional, and afternoon service, to which, towards the evening, another, termed Neiljah, (Closing,) is added. This portion of the service is remarkable for the ardor with which the faithful pour forth these concluding prayers before the throne of mercy. It seems that the reflection that the gates of heaven, through which the prayers ascend, are now being closed, the flame of devotion breaks forth with renewed vigor. Vanished has every trace of languor and faintness consequent upon the fasting and confinement to a crowded place, the air of which is tainted by the exhalation of so many individuals, and the burning of so many candles; at the recital of that portion of the service where the unity of God is acknowledged, the edifice re-echoes with the thrilling burst of hundreds of voices proclaiming "the Lord, he is God," repeated seven times, and bearing, in their deep emotion, the stamp that they proceed from souls powerfully impressed with the presence of the Supreme Being, and quailing beneath the reflection that but for his mercy there would be no hope for them.

Night at last having brought the service to a close, the worshipers hasten home to break their fast, after which friendly visits are paid and mutual inquiries exchanged respecting each other's health after the trials of the day.

Feast of Tabernacles.—On the evening of the 14th day of the same month the feast of Tabernacles commences, (Lev. 23 : 42.) The interval between the Day of Atonement and this festival is employed in preparations for this festival period. Each family fits up some room—especially built for this purpose—for a booth, or erects one in the courtyard or garden. The ungenial climate of the north, and the advanced season of the year, (generally late in September,) will not allow the Jew to make the booth his regular dwelling-place during the festival; but he at least takes his meals in it. Another peculiarity of this festival is the use of a branch of a palm-tree, of a willow, myrtle, and citron. It is these which, according to tradition, are meant by Leviticus 23 : 40. The willow branch and the myrtle are tied to the lower part of the bough of the palm-tree, but the citron is kept separate; and it is the duty of every congregation to provide these requisites for the members. There are, however, few religious Jews, who if they can afford it do not procure them for their private use. Grasping the palm branch with the right hand, and with the left the citron, and holding them close together, a benediction expressive of the occasion is pronounced and the branch slightly shaken. This ceremony is gone through every morning during the seven days of this festival, and by each individual separately. No Jew would taste food before the performance of this rite.

The eighth day should properly so conclude the festival; but rabbinical authority has added a ninth, under the title of "Rejoicing with the Law." This, as its name betokens, is a day of great merriment, in in which even the gravest rabbis—of course in their own way—take part, expressive of their delight in, and attachment to, the Law, the last section of which is publicly chanted in the synagogue; for the Pentateuch is divided into fifty-four sections, according to the number of Sabbaths contained in an intercalary year; and on each Sabbath, beginning with that festival, its respective portion is read so that the whole cycle is completed on the Sabbath before, or rather, as established by custom, on that festival. The synagogues on this occasion exhibits scenes of extraordinary bustle, and not rarely of uproarious joy. In the evening the places of worship are crowded, and the boys are seen entering with little gayly-painted banners and wax tapers in their hands. The synagogues are most sumptuously lighted; and before the ark generally glitters a veil of very costly materials, not unfrequently gorgeously bedecked with pearls and precious stones.

After a short service the veil is drawn back, the ark opened, and the scrolls of the law—covered with costly stuffs, and occasionally also with plates of precious metal—are solemnly handed by the beadle to various persons summoned by name to the ark for that purpose. This done, a portable canopy carried by several youths, is extended over the minister and wardens, who, with scrolls in their hands, head a solemn procession, which is joined by all other bearers of scrolls, the youth and the little boys, the latter holding in their hands the banners alluded to, at the tops of which lighted wax tapers are fastened, all chanting hymns in praise of the law.

The Bar Mitzvah.—The first stage of life in which our young Jew is made to act a conspicuous part may be considered that which is popularly termed Bar Mitzvah (Son of the Commandment.) It is held by the Jews that parents are morally responsible for all sins committed by their son before their thirteenth year; but that after this his sins are imputed to himself, and that henceforth he incurs the obligation of practising all religious duties, from many of which he was hitherto exempted by reason of his tender age. Henceforth the young Jew is expected to fast on every fast-day, and put on the phylacteries at the morning prayer; he counts for an adult in the prayer meetings, which cannot claim the character of public ones unless they be attended by ten adult males; is eligible to be called upon to say grace aloud after meals, and to be summoned to the reading-desk in the synagogue; in short, he is considered as an adult for every religious purpose.

Several weeks before his thirteenth birthday, he is made acquainted with all those rites the performance of which is now incumbent upon him and taught to practice them. On the first Sabbath after his thirteenth birthday, the youth is summoned for the first time in his life to the reading-desk, where he generally chants himself the lesson for the day, whilst the father pronounces the following benediction:—"Blessed be he that has freed me from the punishment [responsibility] of this." This day is kept as a domestic feast by the whole family, and is celebrated by a meal, to which the friends and teachers of the youth are invited. During the meal, if he possesses the requisite ability, he holds a Talmudical dissertation, taught to him for the purpose, after which he solemnly recites the usual grace. In the afternoon the parents receive visits of congratulation, when the various presents are displayed which the lad on that occasion generally receives from his relatives and friends.

Avocations of the Jews.—It is rarely, if ever, that the parents withdraw his son from school before his thirteenth year. After this period they look out for some occupation for him. This, however, is no easy matter. It is not that they are embarrassed in the choice by the number of pursuits now before them, but rather by their paucity. From many professions a Jew is virtually excluded by not being admitted to seminaries where the requisite education is to be obtained; from others he excludes himself, knowing, as he does, that he could never gain his livelihood by them, he being inelegible for any public appointment. The same is the case with master trades. From some he is debarred by direct legal prohibitions, or by restrictive enactments of guilds and corporations. Again; there are trades against the practice of which there is no legal impediment, and yet he is not always able to follow them, because they can only be pursued with success in certain localities where he must not establish himself. The selection, therefore, lies amongst some few. If the youth show talent and inclination for study, the parents not rarely will send him to a Talmudical academy. Golden visions of future eminence of their son as a distinguished Talmudic scholar will flit through their mind; and the hope of seeing him one day decorated with the dignity of rabbi, and of shining thus in the lustre and merit reflected by the son on the authors of his life, will impel them cheerfully to make all the sacrifices which his outfit and partial support at the yeshibah (academy) entail.

The Academy.—The new bakhur (student) resorts, in the company of his father, to some academy. In its choice the father is sometimes guided by the fame of the presiding rabbi, and at other times by its vicinity to his dwelling place, or the facilities afforded to students for maintaining themselves. Such academies are established in large congregations, either at the desire of the rabbi, or at that of his flock, who consider the establishment of a yeshibah among them as the most meritorious acts they could perform. The students are admitted to the expositions of the rabbi without any fee. The members of the congregation very often make small allowances to the best students, and invite them to their tables on all festivals and festive occasions. Those students who have no such invitation are billeted every Sabbath on the members, and it is a common practice for families to provide a free table during the whole week for seven students, every one of them partaking of the hospitality in his turn on the appointed day. But as many of the parents are not in a position to assist their sons, as the majority of the congregations are exceedingly poor, as there are no funds available for the support of the students, and as their number is very often quite out of proportion to the numerical strength of the community among whom they live, private charity, however, vigorously exerted, is not sufficient for their maintainance; and the destitution therefore which prevails among them is often frightful. It is known from the life of the celebrated Moses Mendelssohn, that when a bakhur at the yeshibah of Berlin, he for some time could only afford to buy a single loaf of bread per week, which he divided into seven equal portions; and whatever were the cravings of nature, never allowed himself to indulge in the luxury of eating two portions of the loaf on one day, knowing as he did that the plenty of to-day must be expiated by the the scarcity of to-morrow. This destitution, together with solitary habits, the want of healthful exercise, confinement in unwholesome lodging, inattention to personal decorum, joined to excessive studies, watchings, fasts, and other ascetic practices, gives these students a kind of unearthly, ghastly expression, a stern and baleful countenance, and an appearance of odd peculiarities and of ungainly manners. Among their own co-religionists, however, they enjoy the reputation of great versatility of mind, and the faculty of easily adapting themselves to circumstances; and it is a proverb among them, "out of a bakhur anything can be made." And indeed there are numerous instances on record favoring this view; for there are few pursuits accessible to Jews in which Talmudical students, when turning their attention to them, did not become eminent.

The first business of the father on arriving at the academy is to present his son to the rabbi, by whom the student is examined; and if not sufficiently far advanced, the rabbi assigns him a "repeating tutor," whose duty it is to prepare his charge for the prelections, and repeat with and explain to him the expositions of the teacher. Twice, or even more frequently, a week, generally on the mornings of Mondays and Thursdays after service, the exposition is held in the same room of the private house of the rabbi. Every student is expected to be present, and to have thoroughly studied a portion of the Talmud forming the subject of the prelection.

The subject treated is always taken from the Talmud, a treatise of which is expounded in regular order. The exposition of the last portion is generally celebrated by a meal, in which master and disciples dine together, reciting certain prayers, the object of which is to thank Providence for having been permitted to conclude so meritorious a work as to study through a Talmudical treaties, and to implore for life and strength to be able to proceed in that work.

The fate of these students in life is various. Those who become great proficients in Talmudical lore, and bear a good character, receive in due time from their masters the hatarah (permission.) This is a diploma which empowers them to decide all religious questions referred to them according to the Jewish code, and consequently make them eligible for the office of rabbi. They, moreover, have thereby conferred on them the distinguished title of Morenu, (our teacher,) by which they are henceforth summoned to the performance of religious rites. The mass of students, however, must be satisfied with subordinate offices, or to turn later in life to temporal pursuits. The figure which the latter cut in life is very often singular. Unacquainted with the practical, world, for the intercourse with which they were not trained, they are very often unfit for any other occupation save that of studying the Talmud. It is therefore upon their wives that the obligation devolves of providing for the family, and of discharging the duties generally performed by men; and ludicrous incidents arising from the strange position are related. Thus one of these students being summoned before a magistrate, in order to sign a certain document, his wife appeared in his place; and when asked why her husband did not attend, the reply was, "My husband is a scholar, who can neither read nor write." Of course she meant the language of the country.

As may be easily imagined, it is only a small fraction of the Jewish youth that repair to the yeshibah. The majority of them embrace some other occupation. There is only one avocation unencumbered and suited to the small means of the parents, and perhaps also congenial to the restless and roving disposition of the youth. He is duly provided with a few yards of tape, with knives, pins, needles, &c., and sent out to the distant and outlaying farms to sell his goods or to barter them off for other productions; in other words, the youth is duly installed as pedlar. As he advances in years and skill more valuable goods are entrusted to him, his operations increase, and his range is enlarged. On Monday he leaves the parental house, bending under the load of a heavy package which threatens to break his back, toils from village to village, from cottage to cottage, offering his goods for sale, and does not return before Friday. This mode of life is excessively irksome, and replete with misery. In the biting frost of the winter, and in the scorching heat of summer, the young Jew is seen tottering along on solitary roads and by-paths leading to lonely farms, stopping every two hundred yards, and leaning against his knotty stick, to enjoy the comfort of a moment's repose. His frame is often feeble, but his pack must always be heavy; for the larger his stock of goods, the more choice, and consequently the greater chance for selling At daybreak he generally sets out, and, however cold the day, he will never fail to tuck up the sleeves of his coat and shirt on the left hand, in order to put on the pylacteries previous to saying his morning prayers; and in the intervals of repose he will be often seen to pull out his psalter and recite psalms. As his religious scruples do not allow him to partake of unlawful food, he is confined in his diet to bread, milk, butter and eggs, and very often from Sabbath to Sabbath he does not taste warm victuals. After the toil of the day he sleeps, if the farmer permit it, in the barn or some outhouse; and if retiring to an inn, he will lie down on a bundle of straw on the bare ground, his small earnings and saving disposition not allowing him to pay for the comfort of resting himself in a bed. It is only in his own house that he indulges in that luxury.

WEEPING COMPASSION.

The Rev. Albert Barnes, in closing a discourse on revivals of religion, uses the following impressive language in illustration of the Divine compassion for the souls of ruined and perishing men:—

A heathen monarch once rose up from his throne, and covered himself with sackcloth, and was followed by his court and nobles, and by all the people, in a solemn fast for three days. Who adjudges that the bosom of the king of Ninevah in this was swayed by any improper feeling? Another heathen monarch, at the head of two millions of men, sat down and wept. In a hundred years, said he, all that mighty host will be dead. The vision of Xerxes extended no farther. He had no tear to shed over their doom beyond the grave. How different that feeling from the view which excited our Redeemer to weep! His tears fell because he saw the unending career of the never-dying soul; and knew what it was if the soul should be lost. And this multitude that we see in this city; this gay, busy, thoughtless, volatile, unthinking throng that sweep along these streets, or dwell in these palaces, or that crowd these theaters, or these assembly-rooms, where, oh where, will they be in a hundred years? Dead; all dead. Every eye will have lost its luster; every frame its vigor; every rose shall have faded from the cheek; the charms of music shall no more entrance the ear; the fingers shall have forgotten the melody of the lute and the organ. Where will they be? In yonder heaven, or in yonder hell. Part, alas! how small a part! with ears attuned to sweeter sounds, and with eyes radiant with immortal brilliancy, and with a frame braced with the vigor of never-dying youth. Part, alas! how large a part! in that world, a view of whose unutterable sufferings drew tears from the eyes of the Son of God! Each man that dares to curse Jehovah on his throne; each victim of intemperance and lust; each wretch on which the eye fastens in the lowest form of humanity, has an immortal nature that shall survive when "the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll!" The shadowy vale of death will soon be past, and the thoughtless and guilty throngs will be found amid the severe and awful scenes of eternal justice! Christian, pray, pray, oh pray for a revival of pure religion in the guilty cities of our land.

Forbearance.—If the peculiarities of our feelings and faculties be the effect of variety of excitement through a diversity of organization, it should tend to produce in us mutual forbearance and toleration. We should perceive how nearly impossible it is that persons should feel and think exactly alike upon any subject. We should not arrogantly pride ourselves upon our virtues and knowledge, nor condemn the errors and weakness of others, since they may depend upon causes which we can neither produce nor easily counteract. No one judging from his own feelings and powers, can be aware of the kind or degree of temptation or terror, or the seeming incapacity to resist them, which may induce others to deviate.

THE ARMENIANS IN TURKEY.

A missionary of the American Board, (Mr. Powers, who has been laboring among the Armenians of Turkey for sixteen years past, gives the following sketch of the creed of the Armenians of Sivas, "not as derived from their books, but as actually existing in the minds of men." We find it in the last number of the Missionary Herald:—

"The Armenians of Sivas believe that baptism cancels original sin; that partaking of the sacrament, in connection with confession to a priest and penance, cancels all actual transgression; and that being born of the Spirit is being annointed with holy oil at baptism. They believe that the efficacy of Christ's death is exhibited in two ways; for they say (1) that when he was crucified, and his body was lying in the grave, he went in his spiritual nature to hell, threw open its prison doors, and set all his inmates at liberty, till which time all the good and just, as Abraham, Moses, and David, had been confined in that world of wo; and (2) that all who partake of his body and blood in the sacrament, by which is meant his real veritable body and blood, will now be saved from hell. And yet they hold that all do not go immediately to heaven, but must needs be delivered from the world of suffering by the prayers, charities, and masses paid for by surviving friends. There is in their system no atonement, in the proper sense of that term, no praying in the name of Christ, no mention of his atoning blood. The sins which confession and penance do not atone for in one's life-time, will be canceled by the prayers and charities of survivors.

They also believe that Christ sustains to us no longer the relation of Mediator or of Intercessor, but that of a stern and inflexible Judge, whose favor must be propitiated by the intercession of all the saints in the calendar, and especially that of the Virgin Mary, "Mother of God," who is represented in many of their pictures of the Holy Trinity as sitting at the right hand of Jesus, and wearing a splendid crown.

They believe that there can be no sacrifice of the mass, or celebration of the Lord's Supper, where there is not a picture of the Virgin; that the priests act as mediators; that any man, however wicked his life may have been, who shall say, "I repent," and partake of the sacrament, will assuredly go to heaven; that a penance, consisting of reading four Psalms, and giving twenty-five cents to the priest for saying mass, cancels the sin of adultery; and that profaneness, falsehood, oaths, cursing, fraud, intemperance, and the like sins, do not forfeit Christain character, provided they are regularly confessed to a priest, and absolution is obtained. Their only idea of the great and cardinal doctrine of repentance is saying, "I repent," and, if possible, squeezing out two tears.

To take an oath in a court of justice is sin; and in several instances, since I have been here, unjust demands have been brought against individuals, which they have paid, rather than take oath that they were unjust; while in their intercourse with one another their mouths are full of oaths, lies, obscenity, cursing, and bitterness. To take interest on money loaned is sin; aud yet in their common business transactions, it would perhaps be impossible to find an honest man among them. To read the Bible is the prerogative of the priests; but it is a sin for others, especially if living in the married state, even to handle the word of God. And it is held that making the sign of the cross is the foundation of the Christian faith; and abstinence from meat on certain days renders man like unto the angels.

CHARACTER OF THE PREACHING.

As to preaching, it is not more than twelve or fifteen times in the whole year that anything under this name is attempted; and then it is so well understood that, whatever the subject, the "improvement" will be an appeal for money, that the commencement of the sermon is usually the signal for an outward movement. Still the person officiating often contrives to detain his heares by various peurilities, of which the following may serve as a specimen. On one occasion the preacher, in speaking of the scourging of Jesus, said he was tied to an olive tree, which, more compassionate than man, opened its trunk, and received the suffering Savior; while his enemies were left to lay their heavy blows upon the trunk of the tree, supposing all the time it was Jesus they were scourging.

In describing Christ's setting the prisoners in hell at liberty, another said that the last man he came to was Solomon; on seeing whom Christ remarked, "You are wise enough to deliver yourself, without my help," and passed on. Whereupon the devils finding him there alone, said to him, "What are you here for?" To which he replied that he was waiting to deliver any others who might be sent there. "Then," said the devils, be off with yourself;" and they thrust him out. Still another, speaking of Judas, said that he, foreknowing that Christ would deliver the prisoners in hell, made the greatest haste to hang himself, that he too might be set at liberty with the rest. Satan, however, prevented his dying till after Christ had risen from the dead, and consequently he did not escape.

As a specimen of exegesis, let me mention the following. Authority for the intercession of the saints is found in 2 Corinthians 5 : 20, "Now then we are ambassadors for Christ," &c., and also in Jeremiah 15 : 1, "Though Moses and Samuel stood before, yet my mind could not be toward this people." Authority for the high place assigned to the Virgin in the work of intercession is found in John 2 : 4, "Woman, what have I to do with thee;" which is made to mean, "Woman, it is all the some whether it be I or you." For auricular confession they cite Mark 1 : 44, "Go, show thyself to the priest;" for the use of pictures, Gen. 1 : 26, "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness;" for the use of relics, Psalms 34 : 20, "He keepeth all his bones;" for the absolution of the priests, of course, the ever-repeated passage, "Whatsoever ye shall bind," &c.

SCOLDING.

We will not say that any who have the scolding propensity are absoluely incurable, but we know some very obstinate cases. We also know some persons who have such a happy mental organization, that they never indulge a petulent spirit. By an anecdote we will illustrate these cases.

Two thriving farmers, A. and B. lived near neighbors, whose wives were patterns of energy, industry, frugality, neatness, etc. Each had been married about fifteen years, and the wife of A. proved to be a termagant while that of B. had not spoken petulantly since her marriage. These men were once in the midst of an interesting conversation, when the dinner horn from the house of Mr. A. was sounded, and he said to B., "I must go at once, or my wife will give me such a lecture." "I really wish," replied B., "that I could hear my wife scold as yours does, for five minutes, just to see how it would sound, for she has never uttered a crooked word since our marriage." "Oh," said A., "get your wife a load of crooked wood, and you will hear it, I warrant you, for nothing makes my wife rave equal to that."

Farmer B. kept his own counsel, and when he went to the forest to prepare his year's supply of wood, he was careful to cut each crooked stick on each side of the curve, so as to preserve it entire, and to throw all such sticks in a separate heap, subject to his order. When his old stock of wood was consumed, he collected an entire load of the crooked sticks and deposited them at his door, and said nothing. When he came to dinner the next day, he expected the verification of the prophecy, but the meal as usual was well cooked, and in good time, and his wife came to the board with her usual beneficent smile, and said nothing relative to the wood. As fast as the wood wasted away, his curiosity and anxiety increased, till his wife one day said to him, "Husband, our wood is nearly exhausted and if you have any more like the last you brought me, I wish you would get it, for it is the best I ever had, it fits round the pots and kettles so nicely."

MOVE ON.

If you are ever to be anything, you must make a beginning; and you must make it yourself. The world is getting too practical to help drones and push them along, when there is a busy hive of workers, who, if any thing, live too fast. You must lift up your own feet, and if you have a pair of clogs on, which clatter about your heels, they will soon be worn off and left behind on the dusty pathway. Mark out the line which you prefer; let truth be the object-glass, honesty the surveying-chain, and eminence the level with which to lay out your field; thus prepared, with prudence on the one arm and perseverance on the other, you need fear no obstacle. Do not be afraid to take the first step. Boldness will beget assurance, and the first step will bring you so much nearer the second. But if your first step should break down, try again. It will be surer and safer by the trial. Besides, if you never move you will never know your own power. A man standing and declaring his inability to walk, without making the effort, would be a general laughing stock, and so, morally, is the man, in our opinion, who will not test his own moral and intellectual power, and then gravely assures us that he has "no genius," or "no capacity." A man with seeing eyes keeping them shut, and complaining that he cannot see, is the trumpeter of his own inability.

Meditation.—He who has thought for himself depends not exclusively on others; and yet neither will he depend exclusively upon himself. He deals with raw materials of thought, and knows processes of preparation; but he does not manufacture for all his needs. He buys at the market of wisdom; but when he buys he judges well and carefully of worth, and can detect adulteration. He can look around the world, and discern uses in things that other men will despise. He can scheme, invent, and combine for himself. Having thoughts of his own, he will speak of truth and opinion generally, as one who has seen and examined—not merely has heard the report of other man. The reflective man will see in his very pathway, illustrations, opportunities and phenomena, for which it might once have seemed necessary to go far and search widely. It is a fault in life as great as obvious, that we see not, or heed not, how principles that we honor and profess to obey, may be, and are applied or violated in our common conduct. He who meditates will be able to see this and to show it. Accustoming himself to think, he will soon find shining within him, as center suns, certain great fixed principles. In their light will he see things of his life, and of the world. His whole being will almost unconsciously became orderly and vivified, changed and glorious, under the influence of these suns.

Energy.—The longer I live, the more certain I am that the great difference betwen men, the great and the insignificant, is energy—invincible determination—an honest purpose once fixed—and then death or victory. That quality will do any thing that can be done in the world; and no talents, no circumstances, no opportunity will make a two legged creature a man without it. [Goethe.

Persons who are always cheerful and good-humored are very useful in the world; they maintain peace and happiness, and spread a thankful temper amongst all who live around them.

THE WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Sixteenth Annual Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, was held with the 2d Church in Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the fourth, fifth, and sixth days of last week. The delegation in attendance was quite numerous—sufficiently so for all practical purposes—and included nearly every minister laboring within the bounds of the Association.

The Opening Discourse was preached by Eld. Thomas E. Babcock, of Independence, from the text Galatians 6 : 9—"Let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not." It was a very clear and forcible statement and illustration of the duty of every Christian to be occupied in well-doing, and of the consequences, to individual piety and the peace and growth of the churches, of a general compliance with the Apostle's exhortation.

The Association was organized by electing JOHN B. COTTRELL, of Richburg, Moderator, and E. A. GREEN and J. M. ALLEN, Clerks.

The Letters from the Churches gave a more complete account of their condition than is commonly obtained through such means. The reason is, probably, that the Association several years ago published a series of questions, which were distributed among the churches with a view of helping ing them to make full annual returns. Our brief pencil sketch of the facts stated in one of the letters will best illustrate this: "Regular preaching, and good attendance—few evening meetings, because the lumbering business occupies the attention of the people in the most favorable season for such meetings—one revival during the year—good degree of union—prayer meeting on Sabbath afternoon or evening at the meeting-house, also during a part of the year at a school-house in another neighborhood—Monthly Concert in connection with Sabbath prayer meeting—contributions taken monthly—an interesting Sabbath-School—18 classes, from 4 to 12 scholars in each—teachers' meeting weekly—56 copies of Sabbath-School Visitor taken—100 vols. in the library—family prayer maintained only by a minority of the church—11 additions by baptism," &c. How much better clew to the condition of the churches is given by such a statement than by any general expression of feeling on the part of the clerk or committee by whom the letter is written. It would be pleasant to say, that the church letters were as encouraging as they were complete; but facts will scarcely warrant such an assertion. Preaching seems to be pretty generally enjoyed, and harmony prevails throughout. But in most of the churches, according to the letters, there is a sad neglect of family religion—in many of them prayer meetings and the Monthly Concert are not maintained—and in only a few have there been revivals during the year.

These facts were very properly alluded to in the Report of the Committee on the State of Religion, and they furnished a theme for stirring remarks by several individuals when that Report was under consideration. The delegates, as a body, appeared to feel that they were called upon to humble themselves before God, and to pray and labor for a revival of religion in the churches. If they could carry home with them, and awaken among their brethren, the feelings which certainly existed at the Association, some good might be expected to result from these developments.

The church letters should not be dismissed without allusion to their statement of the number of resident and non-resident members. Of the latter class there is a much larger number connected with our churches than most persons suppose. Some churches have adopted a very summary method of getting rid of them, by publishing a notice, and then erasing from their lists the names of all who do not report themselves within one year. The justice of this course is quite questionable, to say nothing of its policy. It is the duty, undoubtedly, of non-residents to communicate with their churches as often as once a year. But the fact that they neglect this duty, is no reason why the churches should neglect their duty to look after members. It is to be hoped, that the custom which has been adopted in the Western Association of reporting the number of non-resident members, will suggest the importance of inquiring into the present location and condition of all whose names have a place on the church records.

Among the letters to the Association was one from the church recently organized in the vicinity of Cowlesville, Wyoming Co., N. Y. It contained a request for admission to the Association, which was granted.

In the matter of Sabbath-Schools, the brethren and churches of the Western Association appear to be awake. Such Schools are maintained in a majority of the churches, and were spoken of with much interest in several of the lettters. The subject was also brought before the Association in a lengthy Report prepared by a Committee appointed last year. This Report, which was adopted after brief addresses by several persons, will be published in the Recorder at an early day. Several Resolutions attached to the Report were the subject of remark by various members, and were adopted. One of them recommends the establishing of schools in every section of every church. Another recommends the Sabbath-School Visitor, and promises efforts to promote its extensive circulation. A third requests the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society to issue books, as well as periodicals, for the benefit of Sabbath-Schools.

At the last meeting of the Association a Committee was appointed to prepare a Report on Family Religion; but an unforeseen occurrence prevented their completing the task assigned them, and they were requested to report at the next session. The subject was brought before the meeting, however, in a series of resolutions prepared by a Standing Committee, and was extensively remarked upon. The resolutions upon this subject, as well as others, will probably appear in the Recorder.

The Domestic Missionary Operations of the Association have been mainly directed to supplying with preaching the feeble churches in Allegany County, N. Y., and Potter County, Pa. Two-thirds of a year of missionary labor has been performed—201 family visits made—93 sermons preached—26 conversions reported. The letter from the church at Persia requested assistance in the way of ministerial labor, and it is probable that during the coming year that field will be supplied to some extent.

The officers of the Association for the ensuing year are as follows:—Executive Board, Thomas E. Babcock, James Bailey, N. V. Hull, Ezekiel R. Clarke, Charles D. Langworthy. Corresponding Secretary, N. V. Hull, of Alfred Center. Treasurer, David R. Stillman. Delegate to the Eastern Association, James Bailey—T. E. Babcock alternate. To Central Association, N. V. Hull—Rowse Babcock alternate. To North-Western Association, George Maxson. To Ohio Association, Rowse Babcock.

The next meeting of the Association is to be held with the 1st Church in Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., commencing on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in June, 1852.

AFFLICTIONS.

It was announced to Adam, in the day of his transgression, not only that he should return to the ground from which he was taken, but that until that solemn event, he should obtain his bread by the sweat of his face, and eat it in sorrow. It is therefore appointed to all men once to die, and it is just as certainly decreed that they shall all labor for their bread and be subjected through life to anxious cares and vexation of spirit. This is Heaven's law; and though the rigor of it has been somewhat modified by the Atonement of Christ, it still stands unrepealed. Man will never get beyond its reach, till he enters that world where sin has no place.

No one expects to evade that portion of the law which adjudges man to death; but by skillful management he hopes to escape the afflictions of life, and innumerable are his devices for the accomplishment of this much desired object. But does he ever succeed? as well may he hope to escape death itself. It is true, there is a class of people who are "not in trouble like other men, neither are they plagued like other men." They are the "men of the world, who have their portion in this life." But even these find trouble before they die. They escape for a season only. Let us go into the sanctuary, and learn "their end." At last their troubles come heaped up, "bringing them into desolation as in a moment; they are utterly consumed with terrors." Sorrow is therefore as universal as the race of man.

He who hopes by his own good management to place himself in a state of exemption from trouble, not only overlooks the fact that afflictions are embraced in that very sentence which dooms mankind to death, (Gen. 3 : 17—19,) but shows likewise the atheism of his heart. He acts as if he thought there was no God to thwart his plans. But there is a God, though the fool hath said in his heart to the contrary. And as surely as God lives and reigns, his attributes are pledged that the original sentence against the first human pair shall go into effect against all their posterity. However wisely man may lay his plans to escape, "the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand." He may flee from affliction in one form, but it will overtake him in another. As with Moab, so with every sinner, "He that fleeth from the fear shall fall into the pit; and he that getteth up out of the pit shall be taken in the snare." Jer. 48 : 44. "As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him, or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him." Amos 5 : 19. As sinners, we are all doomed, and the ever-vigilant providence of God will bring upon each one just such an amount of trouble, and in just such form, as may be necessary to secure the great ends and purposes of his government. Let no one think to defeat the execution of this great law of Heaven.

So necessary is it that this law should be carried into execution, that when one, after years of toil and anxiety, has amassed a sufficiency of wealth to render him comfortable, and has brought all his affairs into such a state that nothing appears likely to be a source of disturbance to him any longer, it almost always happens, that then is the time for him to die. As soon as the rich man could say, "Soul, take thine ease; eat, drink, and be merry," that very night his soul was required of him. In fact, it has attracted the observation of all classes, that whenever a man gets ready really to enjoy life, he is called to leave it. It is either so, or else affliction suddenly turns up in some form wholly unexpected. Perhaps he begins to decline in health; he spends years lingering between life and death, his body a prey to a thousand distressing pains, and his mind rendered gloomy and apprehensive by the disease under which he is suffering. In short, after all his years of labor and toil to place himself in a state of comfort, he finds that all ends in vanity and vexation of spirit.

It is admitted, however, that the case would be far worse than it is were it not for the mediation of Christ. It is Christ, rather than Noah, who comforts us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed." As in him we hope not for exemption from death, but for the resurrection from the dead, so also we hope then to be delivered from all sorrow. This hope animates us to the endurance of life's troubles; for who will not endure them with greater cheerfulness, when he can look forward to the time of their certain termination? And still more cheerfully will he endure them, if he has the assurance that they will work out for him an advantage which he may then enjoy. This assurance he has; "for our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

OUR CHINA MISSION.

[By the ship Celestial, which sailed from Shanghae on the 2d of March, and arrived at New York on Sunday last, June 29, interesting letters were received from our missionaries in China. The following paragraph from a friendly epistle of Mrs. Carpenter to one of the editors is all we have time to copy this week. We shall probably give farther extracts from this letter and others soon.]

SHANGHAE, February 20, 1851.

We are all rejoicing at the reception of your late overland letters, which fairly broke up the train of our newspaper reading, so that the last file of Recorders, sent by the Channing, are not yet all read. Never mind; we can afford to suffer the pains of a surfeit once a quarter, to pay for the almost season of murmuring which a quarter's delay is apt to produce. True, there are sad as well as joyful details for us, of such various characters are our lives made up, like the mixed multitude who went up out of Egypt, but all tending, I hope, like them, to the furtherance of the Divine Scheme for our individual good, and perhaps the good of the whole. Since such is our life, it is quite proper that such should be the emblems of that life. By and by we shall doubtless look back with gratitude upon these checkered scenes, remembering with songs of praise "all the way our God hath led us."

* * * * *

I must tell you about a little image of Boodh, which I have on hand for you, and which I hope will go soon. It is the free-will offering of a widow—her household god, as it was that of her fathers. She is a sister of Nemay's mother, at whose house I had repeatedly seen her. She had also called once or twice here. But I had never had much conversation with her, until the time of their annual festival for their ancestors, which takes place on the shortest day of the year, and which happened at this time to fall on the Sabbath. She was passing the day with her sister, who had prepared a great feast for her dead; and I too was there, not for the purpose of witnessing the ceremony, but to read and converse with Nemay, as my custom was. The aunt, Nga-ee, became much interested in our conversation, and by her own frankness, and her earnest inquiries, led me to speak with unusual warmth and freedom upon the folly of their customs, and the superior excellence of the religion of Jesus. We had talked a good while, when her son-in-law came to accompany her home; but she excused herself, saying she would go to-morrow, and so we talked on, until quite dark, when Mr. C. came for me, and I left them, promising to visit Nga-ee at her own home during the week. Earlier than I expected, however, Nemay sent for me to meet her at her aunt's, and I accompanied the little messenger most joyfully to "the flower garden," the residence of Nga-ee. Almost the first object that met my eye on entering, was this self-same Boodh, (by the way, an unusually fine specimen of his kind,) seated in his solitary grandeur upon the family altar; and I could not help speaking of him, alluding at the same time to our long discussion of the few days previous, at her sister's. She answered me kindly, and then entered freely into conversation on the same subject, and we passed a pleasant hour or two in discussing the ever-prominent theme of our holy religion. Nemay was bold and earnest as ever, although there were several strangers present. Her fearlessness very naturally elicited much spirited discussion, but she sustained her part as usual, and the whole visit was a most comforting one. On rising to depart, Nemay took the household god from his shelf, and handed him to me, saying that Nga-ee wished to present him to me, to send to my friends in America. I was greatly surprised, knowing the extreme tenacity with which the Chinese cling to their household divinities. No case of giving them away had I ever know, except from professed believers, who, upon a renunciation of idolatry, and I had supposed from no other cause, would renounce the objects of their worship. I begged Nemay to ask her again if she were sincere, and turning to her, myself said, "Is it really so, that you wish to give away your Boodh?" "Yes," she said; "send it to your friends in America." There was evidently a deep struggle of some kind going on in her own breast, for her face was deeply flushed, and her whole countenance indicative of strong emotion. My surprise was still greater when I learned that this was not only her own, but her father's god, for she assured me, in answer to my inquiry how long he had been worshiped, that "he had always been." And yet, this ancient object of family devotion, she could now renounce, as if in her heart she knew he were no god; for you must know, that this was a sacrilegious act, of no trifling character, and I felt that for no trifling cause would she have done it.

In a subsequent visit, I was pleased to find the altar still vacant; and although, since the holidays, she has perched an old image of Confucius upon it, as she says for ornament, still the well-known fact that none but men, and those too of the literary class, pay homage to Confucius, leaves me still the hope, that she is truly enlightened on that subject. Indeed, I was most agreeably surprised, during my last call there, to find her entering upon the discussion of the subject, with another lady present, answering her inquiries, and even enlarging upon them, with a zeal and a knowledge quite beyond my expectation. Still, she said but little of her own state of mind, except to refer me to the known fact, that the image of Confucius could not be her idol. Women have in fact no more claim to his patronage than had the children and slaves of the ancients to the privileges of their famed Elysium. She was evidently familiar with the precepts of the first and second commandments, for I heard her soon after engaged in a most spirited discussion on their teachings, with the lady present, advocating as well as explaining them; and I could not but have much hope for her, although I have long since learned not to be too sanguine in my expectation in such cases.

I know events like these will encourage your heart, as they do our own, and therefore I take pleasure in mentioning them. The deposed god will bring with him the marks of his longevity; and although you may not quite assent to Nga-ee's assertion that "he has] always been worshiped," you will readily believe that she, although now fifty years of age, cannot remember when he was young. I know it will be to you, as to us, a "token for good," and you will receive it with feelings of gratitude to God for all his benefits to us, and an increased sympathy for the poor heathen, who are, as we trust, already beginning to awake to "the morning light that is breaking" upon them. Its dawn may be slow; but blessed are our eyes for they see, and our ears for they hear, some of the wonders of its enlivening power upon those who sit in the region and shadow of death.

The aged blind woman, Annah, about whom I have often written, seems still rooted and grounded in hope. I find it pleasant to talk with her, although conversation with her is somewhat difficult during the cold months, as she is obliged constantly to keep her bed, the Chinese, as you are aware, keeping no fires in their rooms. I look forward to the coming warm weather with the pleasing hope, that she will come out again from her long confinement, strong as ever in her desires to know and worship the Lord her Maker, and Jesus her Savior.

MORE ZEAL FOR SUNDAY.

What would become of the "sacred stillness" of Sunday, if there were no laws to guard it, and no justices of the peace to enforce the laws? Some people seem to think it would soon be unknown, and that even Religion would step out with it. If any of our readers are troubled with such fears, we have now the means of quieting them. In the Revised Statutes of the State of New-York there is an article on Sunday which winds up as follows:—

> "Nor shall there be any servile labor or working on that day, excepting works of necessity and charity, unless done by some person who uniformly keeps the last day of the week, called Saturday, as holy time, and does not labor or work on that day, and whose labor or work does not disturb other persons in their observance of the first day of the week as holy time.
> "Every person, being of the age of fourteen years, offending against the provisions of this section, shall forfeit one dollar for each offense.

So much for the law; and no one will question its adequacy, when strictly enforced, to keep people quiet on Sunday. Now there is out in Allegany Co., town of Friendship, a justice of the peace, whose zeal for the Sunday—or for the law—or for the one-dollar fine—or for business—or for all these combined—or for something else—prompts him to take a good deal of trouble to ensure the execution of this law. A few weeks ago, three of his neighbors, forgetting the State Statute, or not supposing that the pursuance of their business on Sunday, in a community of which a respectable portion keep the seventh day, could reasonably be construed into a violation of it, laid themselves open, as it was supposed, to prosecution. Straightway the Justice sent them written notice of their liability, and invited them to walk up to his office and settle by paying the one dollar fine. For this, however, they were not quite ready, especially as, on inquiring of parties residing near the scene, they could not learn that any body had been disturbed—much less had entered a complaint. Hereupon the guardian of the law issued the necessary papers, had the men before him, and, without taking any testimony on the question whether disturbance had been created, proceeded to pass sentence upon the accused, to the effect that they should each pay the before-mentioned one-dollar fine, together with costs accruing to the amount of nearly two dollars.

In this state the business remained when we last heard from the neighborhood. Should we hereafter learn that progress has been made in it, we shall duly notify our readers; and in that connection, or some other, we may have occasion to remark somewhat upon the Sunday and week-day habits of certain individuals who have made themselves quite prominent in this matter.

ROMANISM IN 1851.

The following extract from an official document of the Tuscan Government, furnishes matter for serious and practical reflection. By Protestant editors and preachers generally, it is commented upon severely, and represented as significant of the course of Romanism wherever it shall obtain authority. And still it appears to us very like what is transpiring in our own country, and among those who call themselves Protestants. Not many months ago, several peaceable and religious citizens of the enlightened State of Pennsylvania were arrested and fined for working on Sunday, contrary to the civil statute, though in conformity to the law of God; and only a few days since, in the heart of the Empire State, three men were arrested, fined, and threatened with imprisonment for the same "offense"—and all at the instigation of Protestant Christians, so called. Pray tell us what is the difference, in principle, between defying the statutes of Tuscany against reading the Bible, and defying the statutes of Pennsylvania and New York against working on Sunday? Here is the extract:—

> EXTRACT from the Register of the deliberations of the Council of the Prefecture of the Department of Florence. Sitting of the 16th May, 1851:—
>
> Whereas, It is proven that on the evening of the 7th day of this present month, Fidèle Zetti, the Count of Guicciardini, Cæsar Magrini, Angiolo Guarducci, Charles Solaini, Sabatino Borsiero, and Joseph Guerra were seated around a table in the house of the said Fidèle, and
>
> Whereas, It appears from the confession of the accused themselves, that at the same moment the Count Guicciardina was reading and commenting upon a chapter of the Gospel of St John, in the Italian translation attributed to Jean Diodati, and
>
> Whereas, There are sufficient proofs that this reading and commentary had no other intent than to inspire sentiments and religious principles contrary to those of the Apostolic Roman Catholic faith,
>
> Therefore, In consideration of the second article of the decree of the 25th of April, 1851, the Council adjudges imprisonment for six months, to the Count Guicciardini at Volterra, Cæsar Magrini at Montieri, Angiolo Guarducci at Guincarico, Fidèle Betti at Orbitello, Chas. Solaini at Cininquiano, Sabatino Borsieri at Rocca Strada, and Joseph Guerra at Piombino.

THE HIGHER LAW.—The General Association of Connecticut, at their last meeting in Bridgeport, with but four or five dissenting votes, expressed their judgment on this question as follows:

> Whereas, recent events have directed the attention of our fellow-citizens to the relation of divine to human laws, and the duties of Christians in cases where conflicts arise between them—therefore,
>
> Resolved, 1. That to God, as the Supreme Lawgiver, our unconditional obedience is due; and that no law contrary to His will is binding upon us.
>
> 2. That human goverment is ordained of God, and is desiged to be the expression of His will, and therefore, as a general rule, binds the conscience of the citizen to obedience.
>
> 3. That, in those cases, where, through human ignorance or wickedness, the law of man conflicts with the law of God, the latter is to be obeyed; and that each individual must decide for himself whether or not there is such a conflict, his own conscience being the supreme and final arbiter.

EXAMINING AND ORDAINING MINISTERS.—The following resolutions, recently adopted by the General Association of Connecticut, we commend to the consideration of our brethren who may have occasion to call councils for the responsible purpose of examining and ordaining candidates for the ministry:—

> 1. Resolved, That in the belief of this General Association, it is of high importance that the arrangements of Churches and Societies for solemnizing Ordinations and Installations be always so made as to give ample time for the deliberate and thorough examination of candidates for the sacred office. To this end,
>
> 2. Resolved, That it be recommended to our Churches and Societies, that in calling, ordaining and installing bodies, they adhere to the time-honored and wise custom of convening such bodies on the day previous to that proposed for the public solemnities.

PREMIUMS FOR RELIGIOUS ESSAYS.—The Independent says that the conductor of the "Theological and Literary Journal" offers three premiums of $400, $200, and $100, for the first, second, and third best essays on "The characteristics and laws of prophetic symbols," showing their nature and office, marks, classification, laws, principles on which they are employed, results, and claims to consideration and study by Christians. Manuscripts to be sent to Franklin Knight, 140 Nassau street, before Feb. 1, 1852.

METHODIST MISSION AT SHANGHAI.—The Methodist Church, South, which has a mission at Shanghai, China, commenced originally under the auspices of Rev. Charles Taylor, has recently set apart, at Nashville, a reinforcement of five missionaries, three ordained clergymen, one lady and one physician.

THE CHRISTIAN CITIZEN.—Elihu Burritt's paper, the Christian Citizen, has been discontinued, and its subscription list transferred to The Independent, published in New York. This course was rendered necessary by Mr. Burritt's continued absence in Europe.

RISE AND PROGRESS OF MORMONISM IN ENGLAND.—The following history of the propagation of the Mormon doctrines in England was contained in a speech of Mr. John Hyde, Jr., at a recent Convention of Mormons in London. We quote from the London Sun of June 3d:—

> "The speaker then adverted to the progress of 'the Church,' observing that in 1837, one year before the saints reached Nauvoo, Elders K. C. Kimball and Orson Hyde, together with several others, landed at Liverpool, friendless and destitute. They separated and went forth preaching into the towns on either side. Preston first heard and obeyed the principles of truth. In eight months, seven hundred members met in conference in that town, rejoicing in the power and privilege of the Gospel. In a very short time several counties, among which were Yorkshire, Cheshire, Lancashire, Stafford, Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, had heard and received the servants of God. Thus the Church increased; so that in 1840, after three years' labor, the general conference reported 3,626 members, and 383 in the priesthood, making in all 4,019 saints."

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW UNCONSTITUTIONAL.—We are permitted, says the Toledo (O.) Republican, to make the following extract from a letter of Chief Justice Hornblower to Senator Chase, dated Newark, N. J., April 9, 1851:

> "Somewhere about the year 1836, a fugitive slave came here upon a Habeas Corpus, allowed by me, and (as it was a few days before our regular term) made returnable at bar. On that occasion (when no such excitement existed as now prevails,) I wrote an opinion to the effect that, 1st, Congress had no authority to legislate on the subject; secondly, whether Congress had such power or not, no man could be deprived of a trial by Jury, when his personal identity, his age, his ownership of himself, and his obligation to serve another as his slave, were in issue. The opinion was not read by me from the bench (though the amount of it was orally stated by me,) because it became unnecessary, my associate Justices uniting with me in opinion, that the Magistrate had no right to 'commit' the man claimed as a slave, as he had done, to the custody of the Sheriff, for safe keeping until his master came for him, our jails not being built for the safe keeping of any man's slaves, but for criminals only."

'FREDERICK DOUGLASS'S PAPER.'—Frederick Douglass, the well-known Fugitive Slave, has commenced the publication at Rochester, of a large and handsomely printed weekly paper with the above title. The new paper is the result of a union between the North Star, lately published by Mr. D., and the Syracuse Liberty Party Paper. John Thomas, who formerly conducted the latter, is the assistant of Mr. Douglass in the new journal. Mr. Douglass was formerly a Disunionist, believing that the United States Constitution involved the North in support of Slavery. He is now a convert to the doctrine of Lysander Spooner, that the Constitution, rightly interpreted, is not pro-slavery at all, and that the United States Government has full power to abolish Slavery in every part of the land. That he is a man of marked ability, no one who knows him will deny. So says the N. Y. Tribune.

THE WORKMEN OF PARIS.—The Paris Correspondent of The New York Observer, in a letter upon Workmen in French Cities, gives the following picture of their situation:—

> "Their physical condition is sadly painful, and is one more reason why they go astray. Their wages generally are below their necessities. The majority of workmen, especially since the introduction of the steam engine, gain hardly enough for a bare subsistence. The Revolution of February, by diminishing the public wealth and sales of merchandize, has further increased their distress. They have little work and less pay. What can they do in such circumstances? And how shall they escape the sad temptations of [illegible]verty?"

THE VERMONT CONGREGATIONAL CONVENTION.—This body held its annual meeting at Bradford, week before last. A hundred clergymen were present. A resolution was presented, to dissolve all connection with the Old School General Assembly, as a pro-slavery body, and after earnest discussion, was rejected by a vote of 32 to 4. Delegates were appointed to attend the next meeting of the Assembly in Charleston S. C. After this decision, one of the minority took his hat and left, saying, "I withdraw from this Convention for ever, for I can no longer hold fellowship with a body in league with Daniel Webster and the Devil."

CHURCH ACTION ON LAND REFORM.—At the meeting of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference of Illinois, at Batavia, Kane Co., in May, the following was adopted:—

> Resolved. That Land Monopoly is one of the greatest sources of human misery that ever cursed our race, and we deem it our duty, as Christians, to keep Land Reform in the foreground among our other reformatory principles, and co-work with God in the fulfillment of that prophecy, which declares every man shall sit under his own vine and figtree.

NEW YORK STATE TEACHER'S ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this Association will take place at Buffalo, on the 6th of August next. The following are to be the subjects for lecture and speaking:—School Statistics of the United States—O. B. Pierce, Rome. The Analytic and Synthetic Systems of Instruction—Kellogg of New York, Benedict of Rochester, G. D. Abbott and J. N. McElligott of New York, and C. H. Anthony of Albany. Respiration—(Mrs. J. Willard's Theory)—Professor Twiss of Troy, Sedgewick of New York, and Fellows of Albany. Punctuality and Truancy—J. Griscom LL.D., of Burlington, N. J. —— Rev. Mr. Hosmer of Buffalo. Discipline—Prof. Benedict of Rochester. Thought and its Characteristic Language, relatively considered—Prof. Geo. Spencer of Utica. Inciting Motives to Study and Good Conduct—N. Hedges of Newark, N. J. Geology—Dr. Antisell of New York. Punishment and Chastisement—C. H. Anthony of Albany. The Unity of Common Schools, Academies and Colleges—Prof. Upson of Hamilton College. The Free School System, and New School Law—S. S. Randall, Deputy State Superintendent of Schools, Albany. A Poem—Miss Radley of Buffalo.

General Intelligence.

Items of Foreign News.

The European steamers which have arrived since our last bring no news of special importance. The following items embrace all that is worth copying:—

Beyond the question of voting £300,000 to defray the expenses of the Kaffir war, nothing of importance has transpired in Parliament since its reässembling. The Lord Chancellor, in moving for this vote, expressed his satisfaction that the war did not appear likely to prove so serious as had been at first apprehended.

Great preparations are being made for the London Peace Congress.

The Great Exhibition continues to attract immense numbers of visitors daily, but the working classes have not, as yet, so generally attended as was anticipated.

The excursion trains begin to pour into London. The Eastern Counties Railway brought 8,000 and the North-Western 10,000 in one day. The latter ran 10 excursion trains with 138 carriages.

Up to Thursday, June 12th, the receipts at the Great Exhibition were £221,689. The liabilities £186,000, and therefore the surplus up to that time was £36,689.

In the Brazilian consignment to the Exhibition is a collection of pictures and vases of flowers, delineated with perfect truth of coloring in feathers, plucked from the beautiful birds of the South American forests. This rare art, which was formerly practiced in Mexico, was supposed to have been lost with the destruction of the Aztecs, but it seems to have only migrated across the Isthmus, and is now extensively practiced at Rio.

Ninety Hungarian Refugees had arrived at Southampton from Constantinople. The British Government were to defray the expense of their passage to New York.

Mr. Whitney, the projector of the Pacific Railway, laid an interesting paper on the subject of his enterprise before the London Geographical Society on the 10th ult.

Lady Franklin is said to be gradually sinking under her long and melancholy trial.

The Irish people have drank, in the ten years from 1841 to 1851, inclusive, 66,822,720 gallons of spirits.

It appears, from an official account, that the number of troops serving in Ireland has in consequence of the quiet and improved condition of that country, been reduced from about 26,000 to the present strength of 18,000 men.

At a recent meeting of the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland, no fewer than eight ministers were deposed from their office for gross immorality.

Affairs in France are tranquil. Trade and commerce continue to improve. The war in Algiers had been brought to an end by the suppression of the rebellion.

M. Chavoix, a representative in the French Assembly, has been condemned by the tribunal of Perigueux to pay a fine of 30,000 francs to the family of M. Dupont, whom he killed in a duel.

At Charente, in France, on a recent Sunday, no fewer than thirty-two adult Roman Catholics, of both sexes, in the presence of a numerous congregation in the French Protestant Church at Rochefort, publicly abjured Popery, and embraced the Protestant faith.

A discovery has just been made at Hermiones, in the Peloponnesus, of a certain spring of water which, when mixed with oil, becomes at once a kind of soap. A sample has been submitted to chemical analysis.

The Neapolitan correspondent of the Daily News states that during the late sham-fight at Capua, a company of Swiss, either from accident or design, fired with ball upon the footguards, and wounded many of them.

The Journal de St. Petersburg gives an account of a recent affair in the Caucasus. 600 mountaineers made an attack on some Russian troops, but were driven back with a loss of 40 men killed, and a great number wounded, among whom was their chief himself, Hadji-Mourat. The Russians had 32 men killed, among whom were a lieutenant and an ensign, and 30 wounded, including 1 captain and 2 lieutenants.

Outlaws in Illinois.

The Shawneetown (Ill.) Advocate of the 6th ult., contains an account of the breaking up of a gang of freebooters, and the arrest of several, whose combination was but little less than that one which lately created so much excitement in Michigan. Their head-quarters were on Wolfe's Island, Ky., near the corner of the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois and Missouri. The band was discovered, not long since, through the failure of an attempt by one of the ringleaders to murder Dr. Swayne, who had recovered a judgment of $10,000 against Newton E. Wright, another prominent member of the gang. In May, 1850, Wright gave Abe Thomas, a man of desperate character, $150 to kill Dr. S. Accordingly Thomas, pretending to wish the Doctor to visit his sick father, enticed him from home and attempted to murder him; but the Doctor, after being shot in the arm, gave the alarm and the desperado escaped. Notwithstanding every exertion was made to ferret out the villain, so deeply was the plot laid that he was only accidentally discovered a short time ago; and his discovery led to the disclosure of the whole affairs of the company. They seem to have made a regular business of stealing slaves in one State running them off into another, and there selling them. Another of their methods of speculating in negroes seems to have been as follows: Some of their emissaries would make a tour through some of the neighboring Slave States, enticing slaves to run away, and providing their victims with means to get into Southern Illinois. Arrived there, the fugitives were arrested by others of the gang on the the lookout for runaways; fictitious claims to them were then set up and maintained by false testimony and perjury. The slaves were then taken into one of the Slave States and sold. They carried on another species of swindling upon an extensive scale, by means of fictitious claims against the estates of deceased persons. Having forged notes for large amounts against such estates, they would prove the validity of the claim by some of their gang. In some cases they had gone so far as to take depositions, and were provided with County seals and everything requisite to give their proofs the semblance of legality.

Wool.—Prices at Various Places.—At Rochester, it is said that the bulk of the wool has passed into second hands. A good share of the clip in that region was purchased in that city, but a still greater proportion bought up in the country.

At Lockport, on the 21st, wool came in quite freely and the market was brisk. Prices remain about the same, although there is a downward tendency in the market; 40 cents is the highest price paid that day. It is estimated by individuals operating in wool, that 75,000 pounds have been purchased in that market this spring.

The Milwaukie Gazette of the 21st ult. says: The receipts are constantly increasing, and the crop bids fair to be a heavy one, a fortunate thing for our farmers, as dealers stand ready to take all that comes, at ruling rates. Sales are making at 25 to 40 cents, as in quality.

The Detroit Advertiser of the 22d ult. says: Wool has been coming in steadily during the week, and we note sales at figures as high as 42 cents. There has been a concerted effort to depress this article by buyers, but without material effect. Its range is high, and the demand is good.

Balloon Ascension.—The Philadelphia Ledger of the 24th says:—Mad'lle. Delon made a very successful ascension yesterday afternoon at 5 o'clock, from the open lot at the corner of Seventh and Callowhill sts., in the presence of a large number of spectators. A basket was attached to the balloon which the lady confidently entered, and made a most beautiful aerial voyage. The termination of her adventures was not, however, quite as agreeable as it might have been. When immediately over a large lot in the burough of Bridesburg, she attempted to descend by the usual method, when the affair got out of order, and the lady was unable to accomplish her purpose. She finally succeeded in effecting a descent, but in so doing managed to come down in Lackawana Creek, about forty rods only from the river. Fortunately the water was not more than shoulder deep, and after very little delay, she was extricated from her disagreeable situation, and together with her apparatus, which was uninjured, brought safely to the city before 8 o'clock. The time occupied by the ascension was just half an hour.

The Sandwich Islands.—An Agent of the Government of the Sandwich Islands is now at Washington, with full power to negotiate important changes in the relations between the Islands and the United States. He is the bearer of two propositions—one for the establishment of an American Protectorate over the Islands, their Government and internal organization remaining the same as now; the other, for the abdication of the King, the complete resignation of the authority into the hands of the people under suitable Republican forms, and the definite annexation of the Islands to this Republic. These propositions are submitted to our Government for its choice and acceptance, with an earnest request from the King and all his Ministers, that one or the other of them may be promptly embraced and acted upon. [Tribune.

Grain Crops in the West.—The Cincinnati Gazette of June 20th says: We have, within the past ten days conversed with several individuals connected with our mercantile houses, who have been traveling on business through the States of Illinois, Michigan, Indiana and Kentucky, as well as through our own State; and the accounts they give of the crops, all seem to agree that the Grain Crops, such as Barley Oats and Wheat, present a most promising appearance, and that the yield from these crops, will be in all probablity, very large. Corn likewise looked very well, and the weather continues to be exceedingly favorable for the full development of not only this but all other kinds of cereal crops. Wheat, Barley and Rye is almost if not quite out of danger, so that we may pretty safely, we think, come to the conclusion that the crops of the present year will be uncommonly large in the Western States.

Imposition upon Travelers.—Great complaint is made of imposition practiced at New York, Boston, Albany, and other places, in selling tickets to persons traveling West. These tickets are often sold at exorbitant prices, while they are either entirely worthless, or only entitle the holder to a passage by some slow, circuitous, and uncomfortable line. There is one way to escape all trouble of this kind, and that is to purchase tickets over each part of the way as far as each constituted authority has power to sell them, and no farther—e. g. from Boston to Albany, thence to Buffalo, thence to Milwaukie, &c. Doing thus, the traveler deals only with the agents of the regular lines, and they are generally honorable men, or at least they deal uniformly, and a ticket from them is as good as it purports to be.

Melancholy Deaths by Drowning at Clinton.—A party of four, consisting of Mr. Thomas Gallihan, his sister, Miss Selina Cobb, and a young gentleman, started from Clinton Ct., on Friday, for a sailing excursion in the harbor. The wind blew fresh at the time, and a sudden change in its direction capsized the boat, throwing them all into the water. Mr. G. and the two ladies gained the boat, which was now bottom upward, while the young man swam to the shore, some distance, for assistance. During the interval the persons on the boat were swept off by a heavy sea. Mr. G. managed to regain the boat, and was compelled to listen to the cries, and witness the last struggles of the young ladies without being able to render them any aid. Search was made for the bodies on Saturday, but without success up to the time our informants left. [Palladium.

A California Fortune.—The Custom House at San Francisco, which was destroyed by the recent fire, was owned by Mr. H. Davis, who rented it to the Government for $3,000 per month. Davis, who is now, or was previous to the fire in the receipt of over $20,000 per month, went to California as a cabin boy five years ago, and was induced to purchase for thirteen dollars, the lot of ground, upon part of which the Custom House stood, but thought so little of his purchase that he would not pay two dollars to have the deed recorded, until the property was producing him $3,000 per month. Davis had an American farther, and a Kanaka, or Sandwich Island mother. [Boston Journal.

SUMMARY.

On a recent Sunday, Bishop Timon, of Missouri, caused a pastoral letter to be read in all the Churches of his diocese, formally excommunicating St. Louis Church and congregation. The Church has been deprived of its priests for two or three months past, because it would not surrender its temporalities into the hands of the Bishop, and this extreme step has been taken as a farther punishment of the "refractory" Trustees, who insist that the control of the Church property shall remain where it was placed by the donor, the late Louis Lecouteux.

Ephraim Jerrett, a negro, at Marshpee, Mass., is one of the oldest persons in the United States. There is no record of his birth, but from the best date that can be obtained he is 116 years of age. He was a slave and a caulker by trade. He has always said that his mistress told him that he was 21 years of age the first year of the French war, in 1756. He is a native of New York State, and has resided in Marshpee about 60 years, and was sometime a servant in the family of Chief Justice Shaw. He is now blind, and has been unable to perform much labor for the last 40 years.

The Jacksonville (Florida) Republican of the 12th inst., records the death of Dolly, a negress, aged one hundred and sixteen years. She was the slave of H. D. Holmead, of that place. She was remarkable for her tenacious memory of events of the American Revolution, having acted in the capacity of cook and servant with several officers of the Southern army during the war. She retained her skill as cook almost to her end—was venerable and rather stately in appearance, with a bright eye, fine teeth, and hair perfectly white.

A sad spectacle was witnessed in a Moyamensing watch-house recently. It was the incarceration of a young and yet beautiful female, a member of one of the first families of the chief commercial city of a Southern State. Her story is not novel in its character. At sixteen years of age she was lured from a boarding-school by a naval officer, and ruined. She became degraded, step by step, until, when arrested, she was a wretched inmate of one of the lowest allies.

We learn from the Hudson Gazette, that several laborers on the Hudson River Railroad, near that place, were seriously, and one or two probably fatally injured on Saturday, June 21. They were returning from dinner on a car, such as is used in construction of roads, by which, by the use of a brake the load can be thrown out at pleasure. The pin which held the brake back, either came out or was left out—hence the cause of the accident; the men being suddenly thrown out while the car was under full headway.

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, June 26, says that the cholera has appeared in Princeton, Ky., several cases and two deaths having occurred. The town was nearly deserted. A few cases also appeared at Memphis. At Lexington, Missouri, there were eleven deaths in five days. Several deaths are reported to have occurred on the canal, near Petersburgh, Indiana, from the same disease.

A brig from Hayti, which arrived at New York last week, reports that an engagement had taken place on the 7th June, near the frontier, between the Haytien and Dominican troops. The Haytiens were defeated, and lost about 40 soldiers; the other party lost but very few men. The Haytien Government was about to offer another treaty to the Dominicans.

The Albany Evening Journal, noticing the fact that the Hutchinson Family were not allowed to give a concert at St. Louis on account of their anti-slavery sentiments, says: "Northern singers, to do business at the South, therefore, will have to get up a song in favor of the Compromise for one latitude, in favor of Secession for another, and in favor of the 'peculiar institution' for all."

The workmen at Powers' Summit, upon the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad, recently found a petrified snake, the size of which would seem to indicate that in this region at least, this species of reptile has greatly degenerated. His snakeship was found imbedded in the solid limestone rock, some sixty feet below the surface. Its size is enormous—sixteen feet in length, and in the middle at least four inches in diameter.

A public meeting has taken place in London in support of the principles of extended suffrage, vote by ballot, triennial parliaments, equal electoral districts, and the abolition of the property qualification for members of Parliament. Rev. F. Burns, D. D., presided at the meeting, and expressed his full concurrence in the objects sought to be attained.

The schooner J. G. White, which arrived at this port one day last week, from Baracoa, brought 12,298 Pine Apples, nearly 12,000 Plantains, 9,000 Cocoa-nuts, about 100,000 Bananas, and over 1,500 boxes of Oranges. The Martha Ailen, from Patmus, arrived at this port also with nearly 4,000 boxes of Oranges and Lemons.

Advices from San Antonio, Texas, to the 12th ult., says that Captain Hardee's expedition into the Indian country had so far proved very successful. The seventeen Americans and Mexicans, who were delivered up by the Indians, had been brought to San Antonio by Judge Rollins.

The Boston Journal states that a subscription has been opened to defray the expense of erecting a monument to the memory of Joseph Antonio and Joseph Wilson, who perished by the destruction of Minot Light-House. The body of the former has been recovered, and is buried in a rough coffin at Cohasset, without a stone to mark the spot.

A bill is now before the Legislature of New York authorizing the building of a suspension bridge over the Niagara River. It is the intention to build the bridge from ninety-five to one hundred feet above the water, so that there is no possibility of its interfering with the navigation of the river.

A colored man named Wm. Johnson, worth about $30,000, was shot dead near Natchez on the 16th ult., while riding along the road. His son was also shot and badly wounded. A man named Bailey Winn has been arrested on suspicion. The affair created great excitement.

The extensive stables of Cornell & Turnure, near the intersection of Thirty-ninth street and Broadway, New York, were totally destroyed by fire on Tuesday afternoon. The main building was of brick, two stories in hight, and measured 75 by 100 feet. The workmen employed in the workshop, in the second story, escaped only with their lives, from the windows. One was slightly injured by his descent to the ground. About 150 horses, which occupied the ground floor, were rescued but 40 or 50 others, in the second story, were consumed—the passage for their retreat having been cut off by the fire. About 75 tons of hay, 20 set of harness, a large quantity of grain, four omnibuses, &c., were destroyed.

A grisly boar, or wild hog, with tusks that would do credit to an elephant, was shot near Blue Hill, in Strafford, N. H., a few days since. A small army of hunters from the country went in search of him and his comrade, who had been committing great depredations in their fields. The dogs chased him, but he leaped over precipices as easily and as swiftly as an antelope, where they could not follow. A rifle, however, brought him down. He weighed 400 lbs., and the lads and lasses in the neighborhood had a great feast out of him.

One of the members of the New York Legislature has given a notice of a bill providing that any officer of any Railroad Company in the State of New York who should issue a free ticket to any person, other than its officers and laborers, should be liable, on conviction of such misdemeanor, to six months' imprisonment in a county jail, and a fine of $1,000. It subjects any Judge, Senator, or member of Assembly, who accepts a free ticket, to the same fine and term of imprisonment.

Capt. Stephen Smith, a soldier of the Revolution, died in Northford, Ct., on the 23d inst., at the advanced age of 100 years and 6 weeks. At the close of the one hundredth year of his age, many of his friends met with him—on which occasion a sermon was preached, and religious services performed, and the day closed by the party partaking supper with the venerable old gentleman.

To make water cold for summer, let the jar, pitcher, or vessel used for water, be surrounded with one or more folds of coarse cotton to be constantly wet. The evaporation of the water will carry off the heat from the inside, and reduce it to a freezing point. In India, and other tropical regions, where ice cannot be procured, this is common.

Two men in Greene county, Ill., after visiting a returned Californian, who was ill, died of the cholera last week. One death has been reported in Springfield, Ill. At Mount Pleasant, Iowa, there have been eleven deaths. The Princeton (Ky.) Republican says that the cholera has disappeared from that town. Nine persons died of it in that place. More than half the citizens left the town during its prevalence.

The Bangor Whig says that one of the citizens of that place started some time since for the Maine gold regions, with provisions for one month, has returned, and declared upon his honor, that after laborious digging and faithful search, he found no gold, and that the numerous companys that for several weeks have been operating there, have not realized ten cents a day each.

The dwelling of Mr. Hartshorn, in Hamilton, Madison county, was entered some nights since, and $900 taken from a wallet in the pocket of his pantaloons, which were in his sleeping room. The thief went through the house without arousing the inmates, and pursued his designs deliberately to the end, carrying off pantaloons and money both.

Major Benjamin Abbott, formerly of Andover, Mass., was found dead in his bed, at the house of Jeremiah P. Davis, in Nashville, N. H. a few days since. Major Abbott was a Major Drummer in the Revolution, and played the death march at the execution of Andre, and served his country faithfully through the war. He died at the advanced age of 92 years.

Notice.

THE Committee of the Publishing Society on the Monthly Periodical would request ministers and others who have received the Circular of the Commitiee, to forward the articles solicited for the Biographical Department as soon as practicable, as the publication must be delayed until a sufficient number of articles are furnished to insure the regular issue of the work after it is commenced. It is desirable to have a memoir of every minister or other distinguished Sabbath-keeper in the denomination. It is possible some ministers may have been overlooked, or a wrong direction given to the circular intended for them; if such should be the case, they will consider this a request to furnish leading events, at least, of their own life, or that of any other person coming within the scope of the object of the Society. Eight Lithographic Portraits, drawn in the best style of the art, are now ready for the press, and others will be prepared as soon as proper materials are furnished to the Committee, that each number may have a portrait as intended.

New York, Albany, and Troy Steamers.

THE steamer EMPIRE, Capt. H. Gillespie, will leave the pier foot of Cortlandt-st., New York, on Tuesdays and Thursdays, at 6 P. M., and on Sundays at 5 P. M., for Albany and Troy.

The steamer TROY, Capt. R. H. Fury, will leave the pier foot of Cortlandt-st. on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, at 6 P. M., for Albany and Troy.

Sunday Evening Steamer.—The steamer EMPIRE will leave the pier foot of Cortlandt-st. on each Sunday evening through the season, at 5 P. M., landing at Newburgh, Poughkeepsie, Kingston, Catskill, and Hudson.

For passage or freight apply on board, or to F. Hyde, at the office on the pier. L. H. TUPPER, Agent.

The Ladies' Wreath.

PROSPECTUS OF THE SIXTH VOLUME.—The May number commenced Vol. VI. of this popular Magazine; and the Publishers confidently assert, that the forthcoming volume will rival, in the beauty and elegance of its Embellishments, and the Literary Merit of its contents, any former volume, or any Dollar Magazine in the World! Each number will contain one or more fine Steel Engravings, and a beautifully colored Flower Plate. It will be printed on Fine White Paper, with Large, Clear-Faced Type. The best Writers in the country have been engaged to enrich its pages, and no pains will be spared to make it what it assumes to be—a Model Magazine.

The Editorial Department will be conducted by Helen Irving, a lady justly celebrated for her refined taste and extensive literary acquirements; besides occasional gems from the pen of Mrs. S. T. Martyn, the late Editress, under whose control the work has secured its present high standard of literature and moral excellence, and a circulation unparalleled by any similar work. The present Editress will be sustained by a list of Contributors not excelled by any periodical in the country; many of them are among the most popular writers of the day.

The Musical Department, under the control of an eminent Professor, will be enriched by Original Pieces from some of the ablest Composers.

Particular Notice!—Postage Reduced!—On and after the 1st of July, the Postage on the "Wreath," within 500 miles of the office of publication, will be one cent per number; and any distance over 500 and within 1,500 miles, two cents—if paid quarterly in advance.

Terms.—The subscription price of the "Ladies' Wreath" is One Dollar a year—invariably in advance. Best Terms to Clubs.—We offer to Clubs the following low terms, which are very near the cost: Four copies for one year, to be sent to one address, $3; Eight do. do. $6; Fourteen do. do $10; Twenty do. do. $14. Any person wishing to get up a Club, will be supplied with a Specimen Number by writing for it, and paying the postage. Bound Volumes are always on hand, and will be exchanged for numbers in good order, by paying the price of Binding. Back Numbers can always be supplied.

☞ One Hundred Efficient Agents Wanted, to canvass all parts of the country. To men of energy, furnishing testimonials of character, liberal encouragement will be given. Postmasters are authorized to act as Agents. Address, J. M. FLETCHER & CO.,

Miscellaneous.

MY BOY.

[There is a singular combination of seriousness, tenderness, and playfulness in the following lines from the Knickerbocker—the first gush of a father's heart over his first-born.]

"There is even a happiness
That makes the heart afraid."—Hood.

One more new claimant for Human fraternity,
Swelling the flood that sweeps
On to eternity.
I who have filled the cup,
Tremble to think of it;
For be it what it may,
I must yet drink of it.

Room for him into the Ranks of humanity;
Give him a place in your Kingdom of vanity;
Welcome the stranger with Kindly affection,
Hopefully, trustfully,
Not with dejection.

See, in his waywardness,
How his fist doubles;
Thus pugilistical
Daring life's troubles.
Strange that the Neophyte
Enters existence
In such an attitude,
Feigning resistance.

Could he but have a glimpse
Into futurity,
Well might he fight against
Farther maturity;
Yet does it seem to me
As if his purity
Were against sinfulness
Ample security.

Incomprehensible,
Budding immortal,
Thrust all amazedly
Under life's portal;
Born to a destiny
Clouded in mystery,
Wisdom itself cannot Guess at his history.

Something too much of this
Timon-like croaking,
See his face wrinkle now,
Laughter-provoking.
Now he cries lustily—
Bravo, my hearty one!
Lungs like an orator
Cheering his party on.

Look how his merry eyes
Turn to me pleadingly!
Can we help loving him—
Loving exceedingly!
Partly with hopefulness,
Partly with fears,
Mine, as I look at him,
Moisten with tears.

Now then to find a name;
Where shall we search for it?
Turn to his ancestry,
Or to the Church for it?
Shall we endow him with Title heroic,
After some Warrior,
Poet, or Stoic?

One Aunty says he will Soon "Lisp in numbers,"
Turning his thoughts to rhyme,
E'en in his slumbers;
Watts rhymed in his babyhood,
No blemish spots his fame—
Christen him even so,
Young Mr. Watts his name.

THE FIRST NEWSPAPER.

It is somewhat remarkable, that the newspaper press, powerful element as it is in modern civilization, is scarcely two centuries old. It is equally remarkable, that a means of instruction and amusement so apparent should not have been established until nearly two hundred years after the discovery of printing. The common belief that the first English newspaper was published in 1588, to announce the defeat of the Spanish Armada, is known to be a popular error, the printed sheet in the British Museum, called the "English Mercurie," and dated in that year, having been proved a forgery of a century later in the date. The originator of the mistake was Mr. Chalmers, who, in a life of Ruddiman, entered into the history of newspapers. He had seen the broad sheet in the Museum, and accepting it for what it pretended to be, had announced it as the first English Newspaper. Nichols, D'Israeli, and other writers, followed Chalmers, without inquiry, and from these authors the error crept into the encyclopædias and all the books of the day in which newspapers were discussed. Few assertions are now perhaps so generally believed as that "The English Mercurie," was the first English Newspaper. The detection of the first error we owe to the bibliographer, Mr. Watts, of the British Museum, who, having occasion to examine the "Mercuries," saw at once that the types and paper were of comparatively modern origin, an opinion which has been confirmed by every subsequent examination, and it has been scrutinized by capable judges since.

The first paper was issued towards the close of the reign of James the First, and was published by a man named Butter. This individual had been a hired letter-writer, in the pay of numerous country gentlemen, his business being to pick up the news of London, and send a written sheet of it weekly to his employers. The thought finally struck him that he might serve his customers more quickly, and enlarge his business indefinitely, by printing instead of writing his sheets. At first, however, the enterprise met little encouragement. The English are not a people fond of innovations, and the old manuscript letter sheets were generally preferred. Butter's paper was laughed at by the wits, and ill-supported by the public. Ben Johnson, in his comedy, "The Staple of News," made the new journal the butt of ridicule. Finally, however, the invention became better appreciated, and newspapers increased in size, merit, and numbers; but so late as the beginning of the last century, the written news-letter was still in existence, the delight of antiquated country gentlemen, who worshiped it as a relic of "the good old times." In 1709 the first morning paper appeared in London, and now discussion was combined with news, for heretofore the journals had confined themselves entirely to the mere narration of events, and those chiefly foreign. Indeed, more than one editor had been severely punished for printing news about the government; and so late as 1710 a lad was hung for publishing an article against hereditary right.

Prior to the issue of Butter's journal there had been various gazettes, as they were called, published in different countries in Europe; and there is a popular impression that these were newspapers. But such is not the fact. The gazettes were merely occasional broad sheets, or pamphlets, published after some important event, as a proclamation is now published. They were not at all permanent, much less periodical in their nature, two important qualities requisite for the real newspaper. Nor was it until the age of Addison, Steele, and Swift—as we said—that journals began to assume their present influential position. When these great writers, however, entered the lists as regular contributors to the newspapers, and were followed by Bolingbroke, and, in a latter age, by Junius; the public press at once took a lofty position, and one which it has since maintained, and even increased. In England, however, to this day the newspaper press has less influence than in either France or the United States. In this free country it is really the great parliament of the nation, where all important subjects are discussed and virtually decided. Congress is, in fact, but the formal mouth-piece of the press, or to speak more definitely, of the people controlled by the press. The day will come when to be a member of this fraternity will be a higher honor than to be a legislator, and it is even now a much more influential position. Long live the press!

DEATHS OF LITTLE CHILDREN.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

A Grecian philosopher, being asked why he wept for the death of his son, since the sorrow was in vain, replied, "I weep on that account." And his answer became his wisdom. It is only for sophists to contend, that we, whose eyes contain the fountains of tears, need never give way to them. It would be unwise not to do so on some occasions. Sorrow unlocks them in her balmy moods. The first bursts may be bitter and overwhelming; but the soil on which they pour would be worse without them. They refresh the fever of the soul—the dry misery which parches the countenance into furrows, and renders us liable to our most terrible "flesh quakes."

There are sorrows, it is true, so great that to give them some of the ordinary vents is to run a hazard of being overthrown. These, we must rather strengthen ourselves to resist, or bow quietly and drily down, in order to let them pass over us, as the traveler does the wind of the desert. But where we feel that tears would relieve us, it is false philosophy to deny ourselves at least that first refreshment; and it is always false consolation to tell people that because they cannot help a thing, they are not to mind it. The true way is to let them grapple with the unavoidable sorrow, and try to win it into gentleness by a reasonable yielding. There are griefs so gentle in their very nature, that it would be worse than false heroism to refuse them a tear. Of this kind are the deaths of infants. Particular circumstances may render it more or less advisable to indulge in grief for the loss of a little child; but, in general, parents should be no more advised to repress their first tears on such an occasion, than to repress their smiles towards a child surviving, or to indulge in any other sympathy. It is an appeal to the same gentle tenderness; and such appeals are never made in vain. The end of them is an acquittal from the harsher bonds of affliction—from the tying down of the spirit to one melancholy idea.

It is the nature of tears of this kind, however strongly they may gush forth, to run into quiet waters at last. We cannot easily, for the whole course of our lives, think with pain of any good and kind person whom we have lost. It is the divine nature of their qualities to conquer pain and death itself; to turn the memory of them into pleasure; to survive with a placid aspect in our imaginations. We are writing at this moment just opposite a spot which contains the grave of one inexpressibly dear to us. We see from our window the trees about it, and the church spire. The green fields lie around. The clouds are traveling over head, alternately taking away the sunshine and restoring it. The vernal winds, piping of the flowery summer-time, are, nevertheless, calling to mind the far distant and dangerous ocean, which the heart that lies in that grave had many reasons to think of. And yet, the sight of this spot does not give us pain. So far from it, it is the existence of that grave which doubles every charm of the spot; which links the pleasures of our childhood and manhood together; which puts a hushing tenderness in the winds, and a patient joy upon the landscape; which seems to unite heaven and earth, mortality and immortality, the grass of the tomb and the grass of the green field; and gives a more maternal aspect to the whole kindness of nature. It does not hinder gaiety itself. Happiness was what its tenant, through all her troubles, would have diffused. To diffuse happiness and to enjoy it, is not only carrying on her wishes, but realizing her hopes; and gaiety, freed from its only pollutions, malignity, and want of sympathy, is but a child playing about the knees of its mother.

The remembered innocence and endearments of a child stand us instead of virtues that have died older. Children have not exercised the voluntary offices of friendship; they have not chosen to be kind and good to us; nor stood by us, from conscious will, in the hour of adversity. But they have shared their pleasures and pains with us as well as they could; the interchange of good offices between us has, of necessity, been less mingled with the troubles of the world; the sorrow arising from their death is the only one which we can associate with their memories. These are happy thoughts that cannot die. Our loss may always render them pensive; but they will not always be painful. It is a part of the benignity of Nature that pain does not survive like pleasure, at any time, much less where the cause of it is an innocent one. The smile will remain reflected by memory, as the moon reflects the light upon us when the sun has gone into heaven.

When writers like ourselves quarrel with earthly pain, (we mean writers of the same intentions, without implying, of course, any thing about abilities or otherwise,) they are misunderstood, if they are supposed to quarrel with pains of every sort. This would be idle and effeminate. They do not pretend, indeed, that humanity might not wish, if it could, to be entirely free from pain; for it endeavors, at all times, to turn pain into pleasure, or at least to set off the one with the other, to make the former a zest and the latter a refreshment. The most unaffected dignity of suffering does this, and, if wise, acknowledges it. The greatest benevolence towards others, the most unselfish relish of their pleasures, even at its own expense, does but look to increasing the general stock of happiness, though content, if it could, to have its identity swallowed up in that splendid contemplation. We are far from meaning that this is to be called selfishness. We are far, indeed, from thinking so, or of so confounding words. But neither is it to be called pain when most unselfish, if disinterestedness be truly understood. The pain that is in it softens into pleasure, as the darker hue of the rainbow melts into the brighter. Yet even if a harsher line is to be drawn between the pain and pleasure of the most unselfish mind, (and ill-health, for instance, may draw it,) we should not quarrel with it if it contributed to the general mass of comfort, and were of a nature which general kindliness could not avoid. Made as we are, there are certain pains without which it would be difficult to conceive certain great and overbalancing pleasures. We may conceive it possible for beings to be made entirely happy; but in our composition something of pain seems to be a necessary ingredient, in order that the materials may turn to as fine account as possible, though our clay, in the course of ages and experience, may be refined more and more. We may get rid of the worst earth, though not of earth itself.

Now the liability to the loss of children—or rather what renders us sensible of it, the occasional loss itself—seems to be one of these necessary bitters thrown into the cup of humanity. We do not mean that every one must lose one of his children in order to enjoy the rest; or that every individual loss afflicts us in the same proportion. We allude to the deaths of infants in general. These might be as few as we could render them. But if none at all ever took place, we should regard every little child as a man or woman secured; and it will easily be conceived what a world of endearing cares and hopes this security would endanger. The very idea of infancy would lose its continuity with us. Girls and boys would be future men and women, not present children. They would have attained their full growth in our imaginations, and might as well have been men and women at once. On the other hand, those who have lost an infant, are never, as it were, without an infant child. They are the only persons who, in one sense, retain it always, and they furnish their neighbors with the same idea. The other children grow up to manhood and womanhood, and suffer all the changes of mortality. This one alone is rendered an immortal child. Death has arrested it with his kindly harshness, and blessed it into an eternal image of youth and innocence.

Of such as these are the pleasantest shapes that visit our fancy and hopes. They are the ever-smiling emblems of joy; the prettiest pages that wait upon imagination. Lastly, "Of these are the kingdom of heaven." Wherever there is a province of that benevolent and all-accessible empire, whether on earth or elsewhere, such are the gentle spirits that must inhabit it. To such simplicity, or the resemblance of it must they come. Such must be the ready confidence of their hearts and creativeness of their fancy. And so ignorant must they be of the "knowledge of good and evil," losing their discernment of that self-created trouble, by enjoying the garden before them, and not being ashamed of what is kindly and innocent.

AIDS TO MEMORY.

The common-placing, in the opinion of Johnson, consumed time without assisting memory. He held that what is twice read is better remembered than what is transcribed, and he therefore thought it folly to copy from books which a reference enables us to consult at will. Gibbon agreed with Johnson. He tried the plan according to the method of Locke, and laid it aside from experience of its disadvantages. Whenever the particulars are scattered and multitudinous, it seems convenient to collect the fragments into a single heap; and yet Southey's conclusions were nearly coincident with those of Johnson and Gibbon. It was a lesson, he said, he had learnt at no little price, that the time it took to make extracts from a borrowed book was worth more than the cost of the work. What was worse, he discovered too late that the system he pursued was ruinous to memory. There is no faculty of the mind more sharpened by use, or more blunted by inaction. Henderson, the actor, repeated to Dugald Stewart, after a single reading, such a portion of a newspaper, that the metaphysician thought it marvellous. "If, like me," said Henderson modestly, in reply to the exclamations of surprise, "you had trusted for your bread to getting words by heart, you would not be astonished that habit should produce facility."

What Henderson would have committed to memory Southey committed to his manuscript volumes, and trusted to them so exclusively, that at last he retained nothing beyond general impressions. Want of practice was not alone the cause of the defect. His appetite for knowledge exceeded his or any other man's digestion, and he would have recollected more had he read less. A light and rapid pressure of the seal is not sufficient to indent the understanding with a permanent image. Our rough forefathers were sensible of the truth, and sometimes stamped the body to assist the mind. There were parts of France where it was customary to whip the children at an execution, that they might never forget it. Marmontel, in his boyhood, was summoned suddenly to see a salamander in the fire. While he was watching it with wonder, his father gave him a tremendous box on the ear. "Now," said he, "you will always remember that you have seen a salamander." If the salamander was in the fire, young Marmontel might be said, without a violent figure, to be in the frying-pan.

The Seven Mile Tunnel Through the Alps.—To give some idea of the boldness of this great undertaking, (says the London Weekly Times,) we may, in the first place, state that in its progress the tunnel must pass under some of the most elevated crests of Mount Cenis—one, in particular, where there will be 4,850 feet of mountain, capped with eternal glaciers overhead, at the middle of the tunnel, so that not only will the workmen and machinery in construction, and the trains in transit, be buried to that depth in the heart of the mountain, but all idea of shafts, either to facilitate excavation, or to promote ventilation, must be out of the question. The breath of life itself must be respired, from either extremity, with artificial aid, in shape of currents of fresh air transmitted and foul withdrawn, by mechanical apparatus ever at work, at least during excavation, which is also itself to be effected by machinery of a new and simple nature, worked by water power of mountain streams, whereby the trains are also to be run through the tunnel, which ascends, from the northern or Savoy side, at Modane, all the way to its exit at Bardenneche, with a gradient equal to 19 in 1000. The machine, once presented to the rock, projects into it simultaneously four horizontal series of sixteen scalpels, working backwards and forwards by means of springs cased in, and put in motion by the same water power. While these are at work, one vertical series on each side works simultaneously up and down, so that together they cut out four blocks, or rather insulate four blocks on all sides, except on the rock behind, from which they are afterwards detached by hand. It has been already ascertained that each of the two machines, at the opposite ends of the tunnel, will excavate to the extent of twenty-two feet a day, and it is estimated that the whole excavation will be completed in four years. The gallery to be perforated by the machines will be thirteen feet wide by seven feet high, and this once cut through, the bore will be enlarged by ordinary means to twenty-five feet in width and nineteen in height, and a double line of rails laid. The estimated cost of this great tunnel is only 13,804,942f., ((£652,196.) It is to be immediately commenced at the north entrance.

KING SOLOMON'S BLACKSMITH.

And it came to pass when Solomon, the son of David, had finished the Temple of Jerusalem, that he called unto him the chief architects, the head artificers, and cunning workers in silver and gold, and in wood and ivory, and said unto them—"Sit ye down at my table, I have prepared a feast for all my chief workers and cunning artificers. Stretch forth your hands, therefore, and eat and drink and be merry. Is not the laborer worthy of his hire? Is not the skillful artificer worthy of honor? Muzzle not the ox that treadeth out the corn."

And when Solomon and the chief workmen were seated, and the fatness of the land and the oil thereof were set upon the table, there came one who knocked loudly at the door, and forced himself into the festal chamber. Then Solomon the King was wroth, and said:

"What manner of man art thou?"

And the man answered and said—"When men wish to honor me they call me Son of the Forge! but when they desire to mock me, they call me the blacksmith; and seeing that the toil of working in fire covers me with sweat and smut, the latter name, O King, is not inapt; and in truth thy servant desireth no better."

"But," said Solomon, "why came ye thus so rudely and unbidden to the feast, where none save the chief workmen of the Temple are invited?"

"Please ye, my Lord, I came rudely," replied the man, "because thy servant obliged me to force my way; but I came not unbidden. Was it not proclaimed that the chief workman of the Temple was invited to dine with the King of Israel?"

Then he who carved the cherubim said: "This fellow is no sculptor," and he who inlaid the roof with pure gold, said, "Neither is he a workman in fine metals."

And he who raised the wall said, "He is not a cutter of stone."

And he who made the roof, cried out, "He is not cunning in cedar wood; neither knoweth he the mystery of uniting pieces of strange timber together."

Than said Solomon, "What hast thou to say, Son of the Forge, why I should not order thee to be plucked by the beard, scourged with a scourged, and stoned to death with stones?"

And when the Son of the Forge heard this, he was in no sort dismayed, but advanced to the table, snatched up and swallowed a cup of wine, and said, "O King, live forever! The chief men of the workers in wood, and gold, and stone, have said that I am not one of them, and they have said truly. I am their superior; before they lived, was I created. I am their master, and they are all my servants." And he turned him round, and said to the chief of the carvers in stone, "Who made the tools with which you carve?"

And he said, "The blacksmith."

And he said to the chief of the masons, "Who made the chisels with which the stones of the Temple were squared?"

And he said, "The blacksmith."

And he said to the chief of the workers in wood, "Who made the tools with which you hewed the trees on Lebanon, and formed them into the pillars and roof of the Temple?"

And he said "The blacksmith."

Then said he to the artificer in gold and in ivory, "Who makes your instruments, by which you work beautiful things for my Lord the King?"

And he said, "The blacksmith."

"Enough, enough, good fellow," said Solomon, "thou hast proved that I invited thee, and thou art all men's father in art. Go wash the smut of the forge from thy face, and come and sit at my right hand. The chiefs of my workmen are but men—thou art more." So it happened at the feast of Solomon, and blacksmiths have been honored ever since. [London Mag.

BON-MOTS OF CURRAN.

If he was hard pressed, there was no peculiarity of person, no singularity of name, no eccentricity of profession at which he would not grasp, trying to confound the self-possession of the witness by the, no matter how, excited ridicule of the audience. To a witness of the name of Halfpenny he once began, "Halfpenny, I see you're a cap, and for that reason you shall be nailed to the counter." "Halfpenny is sterling," exclaimed the opposite counsel. "No, no," said he, "he's exactly like his own conscience—only copper washed." This phrase alluded to an expression previously used on the trial.

Having one day a violent argument with a country schoolmastor on some classical subject, the pedagogue, who had the worst of it, said in a towering passion, that he would lose no more time, and must go back to his scholars—"Do, my dear doctor," said Curran, "but don't endorse my sins upon theis backs."

A very stupid foreman once asked a judge how they were to ignore a bill? "Why sir," said Curran, "when you mean to find a true one, just write Ignoramus for self and fellows on the face of it."

Examining a country squire who disputed a collier's bill—"Did he not give you the coals, friend?" "He did, sir, but—." "But what?—on your oath, wasn't your payment slack?"

It was thus that in some way or other he contrived to throw the witnesses off their center, and he took care they seldom should recover it—"My lard, my lard? I can't answer yon little gentleman; he's putting me in such a' doldrum." "A doldrum! Mr. Curran, what does he mean by a doldrum?" exclaimed Lord Avonmore. "Oh! my lord, it's a very common complaint with persons of this description; it's merely confusion of the head arising from a corruption of the heart!"

RAILROAD FROM SALT LAKE TO CALIFORNIA.

What Mr. Whitney and the General Government have not accomplished, an obscure religious sect is likely to do—i. e. open an iron passage from the Mississippi to the California valleys. The Mormons at Salt Lake propose to construct a railroad from that city to San Francisco, and such is the prosperity of that people that the general impression at the West is that they will succeed in doing it if they undertake it. Indeed the Chicago Tribune intimates that they have already accumulated wealth enough to accomplish it without assistance from any person out of their own community, or at any rate with such help as they would get from California itself, if the enterprise would be carried out. This Mormon settlement, which, according to the speculations of that print, was commenced under the most unfavorable auspices, many of the first colonists having been obliged to flee for their lives from Missouri and Illinois, has become a most important community in several respects.

"The whole history of new religions furnishes no parrallel to the rapid and peaceful progress which has been made by the Mormons, in this their last refuge, in population, social improvement, wealth and development of the general resources of the country. They have a large and flourishing city, the inhabitants of which enjoy a greater degree of temporal prosperity, with fewer of the drawbacks upon urban life, than is to be found in any other city in the world. Every man has a lot and comfortable tenement, with a lot of ground attached sufficient for a large garden. They have good schools, a University very liberally endowed, various social and benevolent associations, and have been for some time engaged in building a magnificent temple. Meantime an uninterrupted stream of population is setting in upon them from all parts of the world. What may not such a people accomplish?"

The Salt Lake Valley, as all are aware, has become a very important point of connection with the emigration to California. There is the depot for all sorts of supples for the relief of the worn-out, half-famished travelers across the plains, and thousands of them retain a grateful recollection of the kindness and hospitality with which they were treated while recruiting from the hardships of their journey.

A GOOD SCHOOLMASTER.

The following excellent story is told of a New York schoolmaster:

I heard one of your committees interfering with a vengeance, and turning out a schoolmaster for committing enormities in the way of illustrating lessons. It appears that he had enlisted the feelings of his pupils in Natural Philosophy, but was told to do the teaching and leave the nonsense. But nothing daunted, he got some apparatus himself, and told the boys if they would bring him a mouse or two the next day, he would show them the effects of nitrogen gas upon them. The next day came the committee to reprove him, because, forsooth, the boys in the eagerness to learn had been up all night trying to catch mice for their master, and disturbed the house! He promised to do better, but when he came to Astronomy, he committed a more atrocious crime, for, being deficient of an orrory, he took a boy in the school and placing him in the sun, told him how to turn slowly upon his axis as the sun did; then he placed a little fellow for Mercury next to him, a girl for Venus; then a representation of the Earth, then a fiery little fellow for Mars, and so on, till he got all the planetary system arranged, and explained to each one how fast he was to turn on his heel as it went round the orbit.

Then giving the signal, the Sun commenced revolving, and away went the whole team of planets round him, each boy keeping in his proper distance from the centre, trotting with proper velocity in his orbit and whirling round in due proportion as he performed his revolution. It must have been a rare sight, and a lesson which the boys retained; for do you think, my dear sir, that John, who represented Mercury, would ever forget that he had an easy time walking round the lubber in the center, while Will, who personated Herschel, must have been much out of breath in scampering round his orbit.

But if the boys did not forget the lesson, neither did the master; they danced but he paid the piper; for horrified, the committee then dismissed him at once—he had been teaching, for ought they knew, the dance of the Turkish dervishes.

Conjugation of the Compound Verb, to be being. Dialogue between a young lady from the country who writes for the magazines, and an old gentleman who thinks he can speak English.

Old Gent. Are there any houses building in your village?

Young Lady. No sir. There is a new house being built for Mr. Smith, but it is the carpenters who are building.

O. G. True; I sit corrected. To be building is certainly a different thing from to be being built; and how long has Mr. Smith's house been being built?

Y. L. (Looks puzzled a moment, and then answers rather abruptly,) Nearly a year.

O. G. How much longer do you think it will be being built?

Y. L. (Explosively,) I don't know.

O. G. I should think Mr. Smith would be annoyed by its being so long being built; for the house he now occupies being sold, he must leave it; and the new one being only being built, instead of being built, as he expected, he cannot—

An official return of the number of foreigners of all nations domiciled in France and her dependencies, shows it to be more than 1,000,000; the total population being 36,000,000, of whom 800,000 are in the colonies. The number of English domiciled in France is only 75,000; before the revolution of 1848 it exceeded 150,000.

The stately dames of Edward the Fourth's court rose with the lark, dispatched their dinner at eleven o'clock, and shortly after eight were wrapped in slumber. In "The Northumberland-house Book for 1512," we were told that the family rose at six, breakfasted at seven, dined at ten, and supped at four.

New Era for the "Best Youth's Magazine!"

☞ GREAT REDUCTION OF POSTAGE! ☜

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET

STILL under the editorial charge of Francis C. Woodworth, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, commences a new series with the issue of the number for July, 1851. This number is now ready. Now is the time to subscribe.

The great reduction in postage goes into effect on the first day of July. From and after that day, the postage on a single number of the Cabinet (paid quarterly, in advance) will be, for any distance not over 500 miles, 1 cent; over 500, and not over 1500, 2 cents—it being a reduction to all subscribers within 500 miles from 42 cents to 12 cents per annum, to all other subscribers in the Union a reduction of almost one half from the old rates. The publisher anticipates, as the result of this liberal reduction, a large and immediate addition to his subscription list from every part of the country, as the former high rates of postage have deterred many from receiving the work by mail.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet, in its reading matter, in the number, variety, and beauty of its illustrations, and in its general costume, now stands at the head of all monthly publications for the young. "It is unqualifiedly the best youth's magazine in America."—Brattleboro Democrat. "It is a model for all works of its class. We cannot too warmly commend it."—N. Y. Tribune. "It gives us pleasure to recommend it to our southern friends."—Balt. West. Continent. "Best magazine for youth we have ever seen."—Christ. Adv. & Jour. "It is a little world within itself."—N. Y. Independent. "Best publication of its class that I am acquainted with."—Rev. Dr. Adams.

Each number contains 32 pages, and some 8 or 10 beautiful engravings. The reading matter is just such as is best adapted to amuse, entertain, and instruct the young mind.

☞ Please send on your orders at once. Specimen numbers can be seen at the office of this paper, or they will be forwarded, gratis, on application, (post paid,) to the publisher. Subscribers may send money by mail, at the publisher's risk.

Clergymen, postmasters, editors, and school teachers, who will form clubs of four or more, and who will forward the money, shall be allowed an additional copy for their trouble; or they are authorized to retain 25 per cent. on all new subscriptions, where the full price ($1) is paid.

Bound volumes, (of which there are now 5,) $1 25 each; the whole set, $5 50.

☞ Postage Free!—Subscribers at a distance, who will remit the full price ($1 25 each) shall receive the volumes postage free. These volumes contain nearly 500 pages each.

AGENTS WANTED.

The publisher wishes to employ several gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

JEWISH LIFE IN CENTRAL EUROPE.

A JEWISH MARRIAGE.

At length, after several years of toil, severe privations, and self-denial, the pedlar has succeeded in saving some little money, and begins to maintain matrimonial ideas. In these he is strengthened by the dislike which the Jews as a body have for celibacy, and by the injunctions of rabbinical authorities, who represent marriage as a direct command of God, (Genesis 1: 28;) and fix for a man the eighteenth year as that on which he might contract a marriage. This, however, is not so easy a matter. There are obstacles in the way, the removal of which requires considerable means, long perseverance, and the interference of a third party. The intercourse among the sexes of that denomination not being so free as among their Christian neighbors, the young people have not frequent opportunities of knowing each other sufficiently, or of forming lasting intimacies; and as, moreover, the Jewish population is in some districts only thinly scattered, there are not rarely disparities among the few marriageable individuals which render an alliance among them ineligible. These circumstances have given rise to a class of persons who have received the name of Shadkhanim. They make it their business to become acquainted with all those particulars which people like to know, before making or responding to any overtures in matrimonial affairs. And when such an individual has assorted a couple, and arranged matters in his mind, he sets about it in right earnest. He begins with canvassing the parents of one of the parties. For this purpose he sometimes travels fifty or sixty miles. As his business is not lucrative enough to allow him to go by the stage or any other conveyance, he travels on foot. This mode of locomotion, however, has the advantage of affording him an opportunity of stopping in every place through which he passes wherein Jews dwell. He does so for the double purpose of refreshing himself, of completing his register, and entering new items concerning the new discoveries which he is making on the journey. His well-known avocation is a passport for him which insures him a friendly reception in every family he chooses to favor with his presence, and even procures him urgent invitations from such families as wish to insinuate themselves into his good graces, or bring before his notice the budding beauties under their roof. There is a great deal of talk and fluttering at the expected visit of the important personage, as it is well known how much depends upon the first impression to be produced upon the Shadkhan. Aware of the importance of the moment, the family council sit in secret conclave, in order to devise means for drawing the attention of the critical man from the pimple in the face of the daughter, and direct it to those charms and accomplishments which, in the eyes of the council, she really possesses. That the daughter is set off to the greatest advantage by the affectionate family will be understood as a matter of course. How affectionately the eyes of the family rest on her; and how, after her retirement, the mouth of the mother overflows with her praise! There never was such a darling child; she understands cookery thoroughly, could dress any meal at five minutes' notice; and as to needlework, why there is no one to equal her in the whole neighborhood. Sewing, stitching, hemming, mending, marking, knitting, and netting—in all these branches she is equally proficient. For the last five years not a bit of linen has been given out of the house; she has cut it all out, and made up all the materials. The mother has not the slightest occasion to look after anything in the household; and everything is so satisfactorily done, as though she had been a housekeeper of at least a score of years' standing. At parting, a piece of money occasionally glides from the hands of the host into that of the guest. From this it will be seen how important the avocation of the matrimonial broker is; and that traveling, far from being a source of expense to him, rather serves to replenish his exhausted purse than otherwise. At length he arrives at the place of his destination, canvasses the party in view; and, having received encouragement, sets out for the residence of the other party. The preliminaries being settled, the two fathers meet; and, all matters being arranged, the young man is introduced to his future helpmate; and as the Jewish youth are generally obedient to their parents, and as, moreover, the ground is but rarely preoccupied, it is seldom that the projected union meets with any objection on their part. So an evening is fixed for the betrothal. This is a solemn act, at which all the relations and friends of the young couple living within a reasonable distance are present. The audible sign of the betrothal and signal for the consequent congratulations is the beaking of a cup, which is always done by some near relative. The fragments of the cup are sent round to those persons to whom it is thought desirable to notify the engagement in a formal manner. The breaking of the cup on this joyful occasion seems to be an imitation of a similar incident narrated in the Talmud. There it is related of a certain rabbi, that in the midst of the rejoicings occasioned by a betrothal, he purposely broke a very valuable cup, in order to damp the excessive joy of those concerned; for he was of opinion, that since the destruction of Jerusalem, it does not become a Jew to abandon himself to joy unmingled with an alloy of grief.

But although the betrothal has taken place, years may elapse, before the marriage can be solemnized. This delay entirely arises from the difficulty with which the permission of government to this act is obtained. Various are the restrictions put upon Jewish marriages in different districts. A common one is to fix the number of Jewish families by law, which number must not be exceeded. The right of marrying and thus forming a new family is in such cases transmitted to the eldest son. The younger sons have only a chance of marrying in case death should have carried off an individual of that privileged class who has no male heir. In this case the lord of the estate to which the deceased belonged, or some other authority, has the right to bestow that privilege upon some other Jew. The consequence is that no Jew is allowed to conclude a matrimonial alliance without the special leave of government, which previous to granting it, makes necessary inquiries as to the right of the petitioner. The cruelty of this regulation, and the extortion connected with it, form no small part of the system of persecution still kept up against the Hebrew people in many parts of Christendom.

Let us suppose that the leave of government is obtained, and the day for the wedding fixed. On the previous Sabbath the bridegroom is summoned up with great solemnity to the reading-desk, where a portion of the law is chanted. The wedding-day itself is a season of extraordinary merriment for the whole family and all acquaintances; for besides the natural occasion for it, the rejoicing of the bride and bridegroom is recommended as a most meritorious act by the rabbis. For that reason the gravest matrons, upon whose lips a smile has not been seen to play for the last dozen years, and whose feet have disdained for scores of years to exercise themselves in the profane amusement of a dance, are now observed to brush up the gold-embroidered caps which were in fashion half a century ago, and to smooth out the famous dress in which they, in their own days, no doubt, as effectively charmed their lords and masters as the brides of the present generation enchant the bridegrooms of their own time. These old dames, in compliance with the rabbinical precept, enter into all kinds of fun, and even antics, whereby they may excite the couple to laughter. This achievement, the reader might think, could not be so difficult with young people on the point of having their dearest hopes realized. In this, however, he is mistaken; for the couple the day is far from being one of exclusive merriment. They are taught that on that day their doom is being fixed, and that therefore repentance for the past and good resolutions for the future are required of them. The briedgroom fasts a portion of the day, and offers up penitential prayers.

In the morning, after breakfast, the first part of the marriage ceremony is performed. This consists in the minister's covering and tying round the head of the bride a handkerchief of a peculiar shape, and making it reach down to the face, and nearly hiding it. Thenceforth the betrothed, soon to be changed into the wife, is never to show her own hair before strangers, and is for the future to conceal it carefully under a cap, and even to have her curls cut off, which operation is generally performed by some matron. Whilst the bride is undergoing this metamorphosis, an individual makes his appearance whose functions are a nondescript of which it is hard to convey an idea. The official title by which he goes is "the fool." This appellation, however, is quite inadequate and inappropriate to give a concepton of his office. He is the master of ceremonies, the merry-Andrew, the wit as well as the spirit-damper of the company. At one moment he is the most amusing creature in the world, whose quick repartee and ready flow of broad wit elicit peals of laughter; at one moment his grave countenance, serious observations, and heart-stirring appeals, forcibly remind the couple and company of the solemnity of the occasion, and draw forth from their eyes abundance of tears; again, he is seen standing before the bride in an attitude of an orator with a grave look, chanting in a monotonous, rather doleful, but not unpleasant strain, a long speech in rhymes, generally extempore, reminding her of the importance of the day, and the new duties she will have to perform, interspersing the song with occasional advice and hints for a prudent conduct in the various positions of a married life. Meanwhile the ketubah (marriage-deed) is being executed elsewhere, and signed by the respective parties. It is written in the Chaldee language, and the contents are to the effect, that "the bridegroom, A B, doth agree to take the bride C D, as his lawful wife, according to the law of Moses and Israel; and that he will keep, maintain, honor and cherish her, according to the manner of all the Jews, who honor, keep, maintain and cherish their wives, and keep her in clothing decently, according to the manner and customs of the world." It likewise specifies what sum he settles on her in case of his death. This done the last act—that of the kidushin (sanctifications)—takes place, which makes the couple husband and wife. It is performed under a canopy, generally erected in in the yard of the synagogue, whither the parties concerned repair early in the afternoon. The bridal procession is usually opened by a band of musicians, who play lively airs, and are followed by matrons and other volunteers, cutting odd capers and performing divers antics for the amusement and edification of the serious couple. Next comes the couple, each led separately by two of the nearest relatives, attended by the "fool," who likewise exerts himself to cheer up the bridal pair. The family and other friends bring up the rear.

Having arrived at the place of destination, the couple with their attendants (who are never less than ten males) repair under the canopy, where they meet the minister, who, holding a glass of wine in his right hand, pronounces the following prayer:—"Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hath sanctified us with thy commandments, and hath forbidden unchastity, enjoining modesty on the betrothed, and hath instituted marriage for us by means of the canopy and sanctification. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the sanctifier of thy people Israel by means of the canopy and wedlock." After this ceremony the couple drink of the wine, when the bridegroom places a ring on the forefinger of the bride, pronouncing the following words—"Behold thou art in holiness mine, according to the law of Moses and Israel;" and the fact of her accepting the ring is considered as the token of her consent. The aforesaid marriage-deed is then read, when the minister takes another glass of wine, offering up another prayer. The couple then drink the wine, the empty glass is then laid on the ground, and is broken by the bridegroom. Congratulations, offered to the couple by the exclamations of those present, Masol Tob, (a good star, or good-luck,) conclude the ceremony.

On returning home to the house of the bride's parents, the guests sit down to a banquet, in the arrangement of which the "fool" makes himself very useful, and to which his wit adds a very agreeable relish. At the conclusion of the meal, and before grace is said, the exhibition of the presents made to the young couple takes place; it being customary for the relations and friends of the newly-married pair to make them presents. These consist of ready money, or articles for domestic use. They are all placed on a side-board behind the "fool," who mounts a chair, so as to be seen by the whole company, takes up one present after the other, proclaims the name of the donor, as well as the name and use of the article, interspersing the whole with such witty remarks and puns as the occasion suggests, and all is done extempore, in a kind of doggerel rhyme and a chanting tone. If the presents be numerous, the "fool" ready-witted and in good spirits, the exhibition is, to the entertainment of the guests, protracted to a late hour at night.

MARRIED LIFE.

Life has now begun in right earnest for the couple, and faithfully and unitedly toil they on. The wife is retiring, chaste and affectionate, and by education and religion alike taught as much to endear herself to her husband as to discourage any mark of attention which her charms might win from any other but the partner of her life. The husband is generally sober, industrious, frugal, and attentive to his wife. His leisure hours are spent with and among his family. If misery be their lot, he never uses or rather abuses, the opportunity of a husband of withdrawing himself from the sight of wretchedness. There is the consolation that they may pine and starve together. If affluence be his share it is enjoyed in the midst of those who have become the partners of his fate He is therefore never seen in a public-house. To the vice of drunkenness, with its concomitant evils, he is an utter stranger. There is only one weak point in the character of the Jewish women which tends to retard the prosperity of their husbands, and has not rarely excited the envy of their Christian neighbors. This is their over-fondness for dress and finery. However saving and frugal, yet on holidays, or on grand occasions, such as weddings, &c., they delight in displaying large gold pendants in the ears, reaching down to the shoulders; or at least a string to which some large gold pieces are fastened, round the neck; several gold rings on the fingers; and of strutting about in silk and satin. In countries where capital is scarce, and therefore money dear, such finery absorbs a large proportion of the small means at the disposal of the husband. A considerable sum, therefore, which might fructify in the hands of the husband, is locked up, barren and dead, in the drawer of the wife. And this very finery, which cripples the means of the family in one way, injures them also in another; for their Christian fellow-citizens of the same walk in life, free from this weakness, and unaccustomed to such glitter, form an extravagant notion of the wealth of the Jews, and look at them with that envy and malignity with which the poor often regard the rich, and which so frequently suggest excuses for the injuries inflicted and the depredations committed on the property of the envied.

PILGRIMAGE TO THE GRAVE OF THE FATHERS.

Besides the mournful and festive occasions mentioned which relieve the monotony of Jewish life, there is one which turns up at no settled period, and is regulated by the feelings, opportunities and means of the party concerned. This is a kind of pious pilgrimage, undertaken especially by women, who have married into a family residing far away from that of their parents, to the graves of their ancestors. She does not wish more ardently to visit her brothers and sisters than she desires to prostrate herself over the place which shelters the dust of her departed family. Accordingly, she sets out for her birth-place, hastens to the "House of Life," as the burial-place is called, is shown the graves of those she seeks, and whose dust is never disturbed for the purpose of giving way to the bones of a new-comer. Deeply impressed by the melancholy sight of the graves harboring the remains of those nearest and dearest to her, by the profound stillness pervading all around—the Jewish burial-places are generally far from the abodes of the living, and in solitary places—by the picture of the absolute nothingness of human pride, by the recollections of, and associations with, the past spent in the society of those now crumbled into dust, convinced as the pilgrim is that the spirit of the departed delights to hover round the tenement of his body, and is here nearer to her than any other place, she is overpowered by her emotions, and down she sinks upon the turf, drawing its vital sap from the source from which she derived existence; embraces the cold clay, as if she felt for it a kind of sisterly affection; addresses the departed with all-endearing terms, as if still alive, and standing before her; discloses to it the innermost of her soul, as she was wont to do in former years, before distance and death had placed between them an impassible gulf; relieves her heart by giving vent to the anguish of her mind; begs pardon for former offenses, and entreats for further guidance and counsel—and all that with an earnestness, with fervor and devotion, which defy description. She generally returns bathed in tears; a distribution of alms, according to the means of the pilgrim, concludes the pious proceedings.

The couple having now established a home of their own, we have an opportunity of considering their domestic arrangements, in the principal features of which all Jewish houses closely resemble each other.

DOMESTIC ARRANGEMENTS.

The outside of a Jewish house is not remarkable for any distinctive characteristic; but the moment you enter its threshold, you perceive at once that it is tenanted by a Hebrew for the first object noticed on the door-post is a small case in, which there is a diminutive aperture, covered by a piece of glass, through which the Hebrew word "Shaddi"—signifying Almighty—is visible. This word is inscribed on a small parchment scroll, on the inside of which are written a certain portion of the Pentateuch. The religious Jew never forgets when setting out on a journey or returning reverentially to touch the glass cover with his fingers, and then devoutly to kiss them. Similar encased parchment scrolls, called Mesusoth, (door-posts,) are fastened on the door-post of every room. This practice is founded upon Duteronomy 6: 9; 11: 20. The dwelling-room itself is remarkable for the the absence of any sculpture; and although the strict Jew would not object to decorate his house with a painting, he would not tolerate anything in relief. This aversion he carries sometimes so far as to mutilate the figures with which the stoves are occasionally adorned. These iconoclastic practices he bases upon the Second Commandment, which the Jew of this class, in his zeal against idolatry, does not confine to such sculpture as might form objects of worship, but gives it the extension alluded to. There is, however, an ornamental piece of furniture which is scarcely ever missed in the dwelling-room of the Jew; this is a sheet of white paper, in the centre of which is written in Hebrew, "Rising of the Sun," and which is suspended in a frame in the east side of the room.

Leaving the dwelling-room, let us now ascend the higher regions of the house. Here we notice an attic, over which a portion of the roof is seen to have the shape of a slanting trap-door, which can be opened or shut at pleasure. This attic serves as a temporary booth during the Feast of Tabernacles, as before described, when the roof door is opened, and the sky becomes visible.

Arrived in the kitchen, we notice an extraordinary peculiarity. There is a double set of every cooking utensil and eating instrument, and of some there is even a third set. The first set serves for dressing and eating victuals of which any quadruped production (save that of milk and butter) forms a part; the second is employed in preparing and eating food in which milk or anything made of it, is used; and the third is taken whenever it is desired not to make eatables either "fleshy" or "milky." This distinction is carried so far, that two different places are assigned for warming the two kinds of food, and that "fleshy" and "milky" victuals are not only not eaten at the same time, but that if either of them be partaken of, the immediate enjoyment of the other is prohibited. Thus, for instance, if the food eaten be "milky," an hour must elapse before anything "fleshy" may be eaten; but if the reverse be the case, an abstinence of five hours from "milky" food is prescribed; however, it is lawful at any time to partake of what is called "neutral." These observances are based by tradition, upon the scriptural prohibition, "Thou shalt not seethe a kid in the milk of its mother," repeated three times in the Law, and expounded and enlarged by the rabbis in the manner explained. Further on may be observed a wooden tub, in which meat is steeped in water, and a kind of sieve, over which meat lies thickly strewn with salt. Every piece of meat, before cooking, is subjected by the Jews to the processes of first steeping in water, then strewing it with salt, and next carefully washing it. This is done in compliance with a rabbinical injunction, as a means of removing from the meat any particle of blood which may be contained in it: the eating of blood, it will be remembered by the student of the Bible, being strictly prohibited to the Jews. They therefore do not rest satisfied with the peculiar manner after which they kill beasts, and which is calculated effectually te draw all the blood from the muscles, but moreover, resort to the further precautions just mentioned. In order to be lawfully eaten by the Jews, it is not enough that the beast should be killed by a properly-taught and moral person in the prescribed manner, but also that the cavity of the chest should be examined for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of its organs. When these are free from the marks of disease—which the killer has been carefully taught to know—he pronounces the meat fit to be eaten (kasher); in the contrary event, he declares it unfit (trephah). Butchers, therefore, that kill for Jews are subject to occasional losses; and as the killer (shohet) must be salaried, and as, moreover, the hind-quarter (containing "the sinew that shrank," Genesis 32: 32,) is generally not eaten by the Jews, meat for them is always considerably above the market price. However, few of these observances apply to poultry, and none to fish; these latter may be killed and eaten in any way—nay, their very blood may be lawfully consumed.

[Conclusion next week.

AN EXAMPLE WORTH IMITATING.

A shoemaker is mentioned in an Episcopal periodical at Burlington, New Jersey, whose benevolence is known to be large for one of his circumstances. Being asked how he contrived to give so much, he replied that it was easily done by obeying St. Paul's precept in 1 Cor. 16: 2, "Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in store as the Lord hath prospered him." "I earn," said he, "on an average, about one dollar a day, and I can without any inconvenience to myself or family, lay by five cents out of this sum for charitable purposes; the amount is thirty cents a week.

"My wife takes in sewing and washing, and earns something like two dollars a week, she lays by ten cents of that. My children, each of them, earn a shilling or two, and are glad to contribute their penny; so that altogether, we lay by us in store forty cents a week. and if we have been unusually prospered, we contribute something more. The weekly amount is deposited every Sunday morning, in a box kept for that purpose and reserved for future use. Thus, by these small earnings, we have learned that it is more blessed to give than to receive. The yearly amount saved in this way is about twenty-five dollars, and I distribute this among the various benevolent societies, according to the best of my judgment."

"I AM WEARY."

"I am weary, I long to go and be with Christ."—Mekheil, about to die.—Miss. Herald, Dec., 1850, p. 410.

"I am weary" of my sin,
O, I long for full release:
Saviour, come and take me in
With thyself to dwell in peace.

"I am weary" of my pains,
Bring me, Lord, with thee to rest;
Change my groans to joyful strains
'Mid the concert of the blest.

"I am weary" of the earth
Where the wicked spurn thy love;
With thy sons of heavenly birth,
Let me worship thee above.

"I am weary of the hate,
Thousands pour upon thy name,
Call'd to enter mercy's gate
Ere they sink to endless shame.

"I am weary" while away
From the home where dwells my heart;
Take my panting soul, I pray,
Never more from thee to part.

JAMES HERVEY.

Near Northampton stands the little parish church of Weston Favel. Its young minister was one of Doddridge's dearest friends. He was a tall and spectral-looking man, dying daily, and like so many in that district, was a debtor to his distinguished neighbor. After he became minister of his parish, and when he was preaching with more earnestness than light, he was one day acting on a favorite medical prescription of that period, and accompanying a plowman along the furrow in order to smell the fresh earth. The plowman was a pious man, and attended the Castle Hill Meeting; and the young parish minister asked him: "What do you think the hardest thing in religion?" The plowman respectfully returned the question, excusing himself as an ignorant man; and the minister said: "I think the hardest thing in religion is to deny sinful self;" and expatiating some time on its difficulties, asked if anything could be harder? "No, sir, except it be to deny righteous self." At the moment, the minister thought his parishioner a strange fellow or a fool; but he never forgot the answer, and was soon a convert to the plowman's creed. James Hervey had a mind of uncommon gorgeousness. His thoughts all marched to stately music, and were arranged in the richest superlatives. Nor was it affectation. It was the necessity of his ideal nature, and was a merciful compensation for his scanty powers of outward enjowment. As he sat in his little parlor, watching the saucepan in which his dinner or gruel was simmering, and filled up the moments with his microscope, or a page of the Astro-Theology, in his tour of the universe, he soon forgot the pains and miseries of his corporeal residence. To him "Nature was Christian;" and after his own soul had drunk in all the joy of the Gospel, it became his favorite employment to read it in the fields and the firmament. One product of these researches was his famous "Meditations." They were, in fact, a sort of Astro and Physico-Evangelism, and, as their popularity was amazing, they must have contributed extensively to the cause of Christianity. They were followed by "Theron and Aspasia," a series of Dialogues and Letters on the most important points of personal religion, in which, after the example of Cicero, solid instruction is conveyed amidst the charms of landscape, and the amenities of friendly intercourse.

This latter work is memorable as one of the first attempts to popularize systematic divinity; and it should undeceive those who deem dullness the test of truth; when they find the theology of Vitringa and Witsius enshrined in one of our finest prose poems. It was hailed with especial rapture by the Seceders of Scotland, who recognized "the Morrow" in this lordly dish, and were justly proud of their unexpected apostle. Many of them, that is, many of the few who achieved the feat of a London journey, arranged to take Weston on their way, and eschewing the Ram Inn and the adjacent Academy, they turned into Aspasio's lowly parsonage. Here they found a "reed shaken in the wind;" a panting invalid nursed by his tender mother and sister: and when the Sabbath came, James Erskine or Dr. Pattison, or whoever the pilgrim might be, saw a great contrast to his own teeming meeting-house in the little flock that assembled in the little church of Weston Favel. But that flock hung with uplooking affection on the moveless attitude and faint accents of their emaciated pastor, and with Scotch-like alacrity, turned up and marked in their bibles every text which he quoted; and though they could not report the usual accessories of clerical fame, the melodious voice and graceful elocution, and gazing throng, the visitors carried away "a thread of the mantle," and long cherished as a sacred remembrance, the hours spent with this Elijah before he went over Jordan. Others paid him the compliment of copying his style; and both among the Evangelical prachers of the Scotch Establishment and its Secession, the "Meditations" became a frequent model. A few imitators were very successful, for their spirit and genius were kindred; but the tendency of most of them was to make the world despise themselves and weary of their unoffending idol. Little children prefer red sugar plums to white, and always think it the best "content," which is drunk from a painted cup; but when the dispensation of content and sugar plums has yielded to maturer age, the man takes his coffee and his cracknel without observing the pattern of the pottery. And, unfortunately, it was to this that the Herveyites directed their chief attention, and hungry people have long since tired of their flowery truisms and mellifluous inanities; and partly from impatience of the copyists, the reading republic has nearly ostracized the glowing and gifted original. African Badge of Manhood.—Among the Labayan people, a tribe of West Africa, the wearing of arms seems to be a badge of gentility or manhood. Every morning the capital presents a most warlike appearance, all the men from the youth to the veteran going out in all directions fully equipped with musket and ammunition bag, or else with swords and scabbards of various sizes. Farther in the interior, a man does not pay a visit to his nearest friend or relative, even in the same street, without carrying either musket or bow and arrow slung over his shoulder.

WORDSWORTH'S VISIT TO LONDON.

Here is Wordsworth's own description of one of his latest visits to London, and of his appearance at court, in a letter to an American correspondent:—

"My absence from home lately was not of more than three weeks. I took the journey to London solely to pay my respects to the Queen, upon my appointment to the Laureatship upon the decease of my friend, Mr. Southey. The weather was very cold, and I caught an inflammation in one of my eyes, which rendered my stay in the south very uncomfortable. I nevertheless did, in respect to the object of my journey, all that was required. The reception given me by the Queen at her ball was most gracious. Mrs. Everett, the wife of your minister, among many others, was a witness to it, without knowing who I was. It moved her to the shedding of tears. This effect was in part produced, I suppose, by American habits of feeling, as pertaining to a republican government. To see a gray-haired man of 75 years of age, kneeling down in a large assembly to kiss the hand of a young woman, is a sight for which institutions essentially democratic do not prepare a spectator of either sex, and must naturally place the opinions upon which a republic is founded, and the sentiments which support it, in strong contrast with a government based and upheld as ours is. I am not, therefore, surprised that Mrs. Everett was moved as she herself described to persons of my acquaintance, among others, to Mr. Rogers the poet.

By-the-by, of this gentleman, now I believe in his eighty-third year, I saw more than of any other person, except my host, Mr. Moxon, while I was in London. He is singularly fresh and strong for his years, and his mental faculties (with the exception of his memory a little) not at all impaired. It is remarkable that he and the Rev. W. Bowles were both distinguished as poets when I was a schoolboy, and they have survived almost all their eminent cotemporaries, several who came into notice long after them. Since they became known, Burns, Cowper, Mason, the author of 'Caractacus,' and friend of Gray, have died. Thomas Warton, Laureate, then Byron, Shelley, Keats, and a good deal later, Scott, Coleridge, Crabbe, Southey, Lamb, the Ettrick Shepherd, Cary the translator of Dante, Crowe the author of 'Lewesdon Hill,' and others of mcre or less distinction, have disappeared. And now of English poets, advanced in life, I cannot recall any but James Montgomery, Thomas Moore, and myself, who are living, except the octogenarian with whom I began.

I saw Tennyson, when I was in London, several times. He is decidedly the first of our living poets, and I hope will live to give the world still better things. You will be pleased to hear that he expressed, in the strongest terms, his gratitude to my writings. To this I was far from indifferent, though persuaded that he is not much in sympathy with what I should myself most value in my attempts, viz., the spirituality with which I have endeavored to invest the material universe, and the moral relations under which I have wished to exhibit its most ordinary appearances."

The Crystal Palace Beaten.—Dr. Duff, in his speech at the anniversary meeting of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society in London, thus described one of the heathen temples of India: "In Seringham you have the hugest heathen temple that can probably be found from the north to the south pole. It is square, each side being a mile in length, so that it is four miles round. Talk of your Crystal Palace. Why, as a man would put a penny into his pocket, you might put your Crystal Palace into the pocket of this huge pagoda. The walls are 25 feet high and 4 or 5 feet thick, and in the center of each wall rises a lofty tower. Entering the first square you come to another, with a wall as high, and with four more towers. Within that square there is another, and within that again another—and you find seven squares, one within another, crowded by thousands of Brahmins. The great hall of pilgrims is supported by a thousand pillars, each, cut out of a single block of stone."

The Mangrove Tree.—The trunk of the mangrove tree, found in such quantities in Africa, does not come nearer to the ground than ten or fifteen feet, being supported by innumerable roots which put out in every direction from the bottom of the trunk, and from each other. There are, besides, long rope-like hangers, which begin from the upper limbs, and grow downward till they reach the ground, where they also take root. These hangers and roots together make a mass so dense that it is impossible for an animal of the size of a dog to go through it. The wood of the seasoned mangrove is so hard that it is extremely difficult to drive a nail into it.

Dakota Utensils.—One branch of the Dakota Indians, who inhabited the country extending from the mouth of the Minnesota on the south to the most western point of Lake Superior on the north, manufactured their axes and knives of stone. Their arrows and spears were headed with the solid points of the horn of the deer, stones, and the white ligament from the neck of the buffalo, which, when properly prepared, is said to be nearly as hard as iron. The tough skin from the neck of the tortoise afforded them material for bow-strings. The stomach of the deer was used for carrying water, fish-bones for combs, and the small bone from the fore arm of the deer for awls.

SOLEMN REVIEW.

Three of our Associations having just closed their annual sessions, an opportunity is given to learn something of the state of our denomination in general. From the reports of the Committees on the State of Religion, submitted to the several bodies respectively, it would appear that our churches are not in a flourishing condition. Piety languishes. A few of the churches only have received any increase of members. Many of them have suffered diminution. In some of them the "root of bitterness has sprung up and troubled them." These things call for solemn humiliation before Him "who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire." May we not ask, Why are these things so?

1. Is it for want of faithfulness in the ministry? Those who watch for souls, expecting to give account, would do well to examine themselves on this point. Where pastors are become brutish and have not sought the Lord, their flocks are scattered. It may be that we have prayerless ministers among us. Do they think, because the frequency and fervor of their devotions are a matter of secrecy between them and God, that the people are not particularly affected thereby? Do they imagine that their outward behavior is all that influences the people of their charge? If they do, they are awfully mistaken. No pastor ever yet had a prosperous flock, who did not himself live in close converse with the Father of All. It may be that our pastors are negligent in other respects also. Neglecting prayer, and so failing to keep up the life of God in their own souls, they have no heart for the other great duties of their calling. When in company with their people, they have no heart for religious conversation, no heart for direct personal appeals to those who are living without God, no heart for any of the high and holy duties which are indispensable to their success as spiritual guides to a company of immortal souls. But there is a day of reckoning to come. Where then will be the place of those who shall cry, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name?"

2. Is it because of a refusal on the part of the people to obey pastoral instruction? "Obey them that have to rule over you, and submit yourselves." Heb. 13: 17. "Know (or acknowledge) them which labor among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you." 1 Thess. 5: 12. Sometimes the watchman cries, but the people heed not the warning. It was so in ancient times. We believe that it is not unfrequently so now. But God will have a controversy with those who grieve the hearts of his faithful ministers. It is too often the case that a minister is regarded merely as a speaking brother, whose duty is to harangue the people doctrinally, and upon such matters of practice as nobody cares to dispute, on stated occasions; while, if he touch their darling sins, or their worldliness as manifested in their daily avocations, he is considered as meddling with what is none of his business. But truly if church members cannot submit to be reproved, and that too with as much faithfulness as Nathan reproved David, they would do well not to employ a pastor. If they are determined to set themselves above all his instructions, then let them not practice the mockery of calling him their teacher.

3. Is it because of guilty negligence in supporting the ministry? We have in our small denomination, some dozen or more churches that are destitute of pastors. Why has God permitted this state of things? Is it because those who have heretofore labored in the work have not been half supported? Some of them would gladly have devoted all their time to the ministerial calling. They would have preached the word, not only on the Sabbath, but through the week, and visited from house to house, or when not thus employed would have occupied their time in prayer and study, that they might afterwards come before the people richly laden with divine truth. But the worldliness of their people opposed an obstacle. They were forced to toil in common business from the end of one Sabbath to the beginning of another, that they might obtain wherewith to keep soul and body together. And what wonder if God refuses to raise up ministers for such churches? Whether those churches that are now famishing for the word have been the most guilty on this head, we pretend not to say, or know; but it would be well for our people generally to take the matter into serious consideration.

4. Is it because of looseness in our manner of keeping the Sabbath? This may be our crying sin—the sin for which God is sending a blast upon us. What damnable hypocrisy it is to proclaim to all creation, as with the sound of a trumpet, the vast importance of a divine institution, and yet continually dishonor it by our own practices! Can the Almighty bless the labors of such hypocrites? Verily, he has no attribute that can side with such mockery. But is it not a truth that we have those among us whose obedience to the law of the Sabbath is guaged by dollars and cents? Is it not a truth that there are those who will travel on the Sabbath-day, whenever convenience or worldly interest prompts them? Is it not a truth that such transgressors often pass unrebuked in the churches where they belong? Now it is our deliberate conviction, that God can much more consistently bless first-day churches in their ignorance, than such transgressors against light and knowledge. All the machinery of Tract Societies, Publishing Societies, Missionary Societies, and all the labors of colporteurs and preachers will be ineffectual, as long as such inconsistencies are justified among us.

5. Is it because of unfaithfulness in family religion? O what a Heaven-provoking sin is this! The family! The first society ever established on earth, and designed to be a school of piety to all composing it! That such a society should live, be sustained by the bounty of God, blessed from his fullness, guarded day by day by his power, watched over in sickness, and by his blessing healed of disease, and enjoy in ten thousand various ways the tokens of his regard, and yet never in social capacity acknowledge him, is of all heathenish spectacles the most heathenish. Yet this heathenism, (and we blush to write it,) obtains in the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination of these United States of America! Tell us, ye that belong to other persuasions, have you such heathenism among you?

But let the cause of religious declension among us be what it may, the fact itself cannot be disguised. Shall it continue? Must we "ever live at this poor dying rate?" We are persuaded that there is no other necessity for it than what is found in the depravity of our own hearts. If we are straitened, it is not in God, but in our own bowels. In the mean time, the enemy sleeps not. Who knows what another year may bring forth? God grant that it be not our shame.

ALFRED ACADEMY—CORNER STONE.

On the 24th of June was laid the Corner-Stone of a New Chapel for the Seminary at Alfred Center, Allegany Co., N. Y. The exercises were conducted principally by Rev. N. V. Hull, President of the Board of Trustees, in the presence of a large concourse of students and citizens, who had assembled to witness the ceremony. The address of Eld. Hull, which was well adapted to the occasion, was delivered with animation, and listened to with great interest. The following sketch of it, though very imperfect, may interest our readers, and promote the cause of education.

1. The speaker presented a brief history of the settlement of the town of Alfred. It was commenced by the late Nathan Green in 1806, and he was soon joined by Judge C. Crandall, and others, many of whom survive, and many more have gone to their reward. A hasty sketch was then given of the hardships, discouragements, and afflictions, endured by the early settlers from 1806 to 1825—a narration which drew tears from the eyes of many who well remembered those times. The religious and social character of the people were alluded to in terms of high commendation. The intellectual condition and moral character of their children, were not neglected. Their common schools were taught in rude log structures, such as their axes could prepare, but yet they had usually good schools for those times, such as would compare favorably with schools in the older and more favored portions of the State.

2. The history of the Seminary came next under review. The first select school in the place, was commenced late in the fall of 1838, by Mr. Bethuel C. Church. He was a successful teacher, and his school added much to the educational interest already existing in the community. In the spring of 1837, a few individuals put up a small house for the accommodation of a school, and in the fall employed Mr. James R. Irish to teach four months. He had an interesting school of very enterprising scholars, mostly young men and young ladies. After an intermission of a few months, Mr. Irish commenced his second term in the fall of 1838, and taught six months. He then accepted a call to take the pastoral charge of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in the vicinity of the school; and Wm. C. Kenyon was employed to take charge of the school. Mr. K. entered upon the duties of teacher on the first day of May, 1839. The first term numbered about twenty-five scholars. In the spring of 1841, an addition was put on to the old building, giving chapel and recitation rooms sufficient to accommodate about one hundred students. In the summer of 1842, the Institution, having complied with the requisition of the Regents of the University of the State of New York, was incorporated by them, and admitted to a distributive share of the Literature fund of the State. Miss Caroline B. Maxson was at the same time associated with Mr. K. as the first Preceptress of the institution. Miss M. held her position for four years, and was one of the most accomplished, industrious, and successful female teachers in the State. In the spring of 1845, Ira Sayles became associated with Mr. K. in the management of the school, and soon after they commenced on their own responsibility improvements for school purposes that would require nearly twenty thousand dollars to complete. The boldness of the enterprise, and the spirit with which it was conducted, rejoiced the hearts of a few, but staggered the faith of many more. Their buildings were, however, finished in 1846, and soon filled with students. In 1849, there were associated with them as permanent teachers in the Seminary, Jonathan M. Allen, Daniel D. Pickett, James Marvin, Darwin E. Maxson, and Darius Ford. The average attendance for the past five years has been something over two hundred students—young men and young women from all parts of New York State, and a good patronage from several other States. The average number of teachers employed for the same period has been from ten to fourteen. The boarding department gives employment to a steward, a matron, and some ten male and female laborers.

3. Then followed an allusion to the present prosperous condition of the seminary, which made an urgent demand for additional room and facilities. The building about to be erected would be one hundred feet long by fifty-two feet wide, and three stories high. This would be finished off with a chapel and upwards of twenty Lecture, Recitation, and Society Rooms, sufficiently large to accommodate five hundred students at one time.

4. The relations of the Seminary to the community in which it is located, to surrounding communities, and to the world, were dwelt upon with much force. It was urged, that the school had awakened and sustained an educational interest within the sphere of its influence, that ought to cheer the hearts of all its friends. It had sent forth a much larger army of well-disciplined teachers than had gone forth from any other school in the State for the same time. These had gone not only into the surrounding communities, but great numbers had gone to the West and South—some to California and Oregon—and were doing a good work in the various places of their location. Many others are in the ministry, and are blessing the churches over which they have the watch-care. Even the distant shores of China had been cheered by the news of salvation proclaimed by those who had gone out from this Seminary. It was a rare thing that an institution so young had sent out such a multitude of able scholars to fill so many responsible stations. Surely the Lord had greatly blessed the educational efforts that had been made at that place.

5. The relations of the community to the school, and the consequent duties and responsibilities, were set forth in a convincing manner. In view of what the Seminary had done for the cause of education, for the church, and for the world, it ought to be tenderly and carefully cherished by the people. Their good wishes, their donations, and their prayers, should not fail to be given to an organization so full of promise.

6. The speaker closed with an appeal to the Students, the Teachers, and the Trustees. In this appeal, the necessity of a thorough practical education, founded upon an extensive knowledge of literature, science, and mathematics, was clearly shown. It was evident that the arrangements of the Seminary were made with reference to securing the highest grade of scholarship, and the highest grade of mental discipline, at the same time that the value of moral discipline is not overlooked.

—This is but a meager outline of an address full of good sense, wise counsels and pathetic appeals. It was delivered in the present Seminary Chapel; and at its conclusion the audience marched to the ground prepared for the New Chapel, a few rods distant, when the formalities of laying the corner stone took place. A box had been prepared, to be deposited in the solid mason-work of the corner; and after prayer, the President proceeded to deposit the articles provided for that purpose. First was placed a Bible as emblematical of confidence in God, of the superiority of the blessed truths of the Bible, and of its being the Magna Charta of the Seminary. Next was deposited a Greek and Latin New Testament, emblematical of the object of the Seminary to bestow liberal attention upon the Greek and Latin Classics, and to fit young men to become able interpreters of God's Word. Then the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitutions of all the States except California, as emblematical of a peace-loving and law-abiding people. Finally, copies of the newspapers of the county, and several adjacent counties, were deposited also a copy of the Sabbath Recorder, the New York Evangelist, the Northern Christian Advocate, and the New York Baptist Register, several Catalogues and Circulars of the Institution, and a brief outline of its history from its humble origin to the present time. The box was then deposited in its place, and the capstone of the corner, fifteen inches in thickness, and weighing about one ton, was laid.

—It may be well to observe in this connection that the prospects of the Seminary are very flattering—the most so that they have ever been. True, its indebtedness is heavy, but it is in such a form as not materially to embarrass its operations, nor likely to endanger its future prosperity. The funds for building the New Chapel are raised partly by voluntary contributions, and partly by selling scholarships.

ORIGIN OF NO-SABBATHISM.

The question often arises to the mind of the observer, How do Christians come to believe in the no-Sabbath doctrine, especially as it is so inconsistent with the spirit of their profession? The following circumstance will illustrate one method by which this result is effected.

A few hours since, an intelligent gentleman, who was an entire stranger to Sabbatarians, came into our village, and soon commenced a conversation with the writer upon the Sabbath question—not so much, however, as to which day should be observed, but whether there was any Sabbath at all under the present dispensation. He stated that he long ago became dissatisfied with the arguments in favor of the popular doctrine of the change. "They were," said he, "illogical and unscriptural," and "therefore I was inclined to believe there was no Sabbath at all."

How many there are who, taking it for granted, without investigation, that the seventh-day Sabbath is abolished, and becoming dissatisfied with the popular views, are precipitated into the anti-Sabbath sentiment!

LAW RELIGION IN BUFFALO.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

You will see, by a copy of the Buffalo Christian Advocate, which I send you, that there is considerable excitement in that city, with regard to the Sunday Laws. Whether this was caused by a goodly number of Sabbath Tracts, which one of our brethren distributed through the city a few weeks ago, or whether there is some other cause for the excitement, I am not certain. It seems that some late acts of the Common Council, on the License and Sunday questions—(these two questions are put together, in order, I suppose, to make the Sunday law go off the better)—have called out petitions signed by two thousand four hundred and twelve names, for their repeal or modification, which was followed by another petition of some eleven or twelve hundred names in favor of said new acts. In order to show "where the shoe pinches," as the saying is, I will here present you an extract from the Report of the Committee of the Common Council, to whom was referred the first-named petition:—

"Your Committee had an interview with many of our German citizens, in the Council Chamber, on Friday last, and found that they complained of the re enactment of the ordinance in relation to the closing of all places of business on Sunday. They also appealed to this Council to allow them the privilege of opening their places of business up to 9 o'clock A. M., and at 4 o'clock P. M., on Sunday, and also called the attention of your Committee to the habits and customs of the German population in their fatherland, and that many reside in the rear part of their stores, and have but one entrance, which is through their place of business. In answer to these complaints, your Committee would reply, that the law does not contemplate the shutting of a citizen in or out of his dwelling on Sunday. Its object is to prohibit all kinds of traffic. It is also expected, that our adopted citizens will conform to the customs and manners of the American people to a reasonable extent. Your Committee would also remind their German fellow citizens, that the Sabbath is a Divine institution, recognized as such by the Government and people of these United States and all other Christian nations; and from the well known fact that the Germans are, and always have been, law-abiding citizens, the Committee think that on due reflection they will not ask this Council to grant them any special privileges, or the repeal of any existing ordinances that will have a tendency to render the Sabbath less sacred. Your committee, therefore, submit their views to the Council and recommend their adoption. Adopted."

Now I would respectfully say to the worthy citizens of Buffalo, that if one part of the people of Buffalo should put a saddle and bridle on an ox, and should march it up and down the street and call it a horse, and then make a law that every man that encouraged drunkenness, or that refused to call that ox a horse, should be fined or imprisoned, or both, as the case might require, in so doing they would act quite as wisely, and about as ridiculously, as in the case under consideration. The first day of the week is no more the "divine" Sabbath than an ox is a horse. The law of God says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath," thus making the seventh day and the Sabbath one and the same thing, which cannot be divided or separated—cannot be changed or abrogated. So long, then, as there is "the seventh day," so long this "seventh-day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God."

What we call law religion is where one man, or any number of men, undertake to compel others to be religious according to their views of religion, whether it be to bow down to a "great image," like that of the king of Babylon, or whether it be, like the above named committee, to teach for doctrine the commandments of men.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE—EXHIBITION.

The Annual Exhibition of De Ruyter Institute was held on the 24th of June in the Seventh-day Baptist Church. The occasion was one of great interest to the institution and the community. The weather was fine, and the air was cool and breezy, admirably fitted to the comfort of a crowded assembly. The house was tastefully decorated, without displaying a profusion of ornament; and the attendance was marked by superior intelligence and good order. The school was favored and cheered by the smiling faces of many old students, some of whom as teachers of the young and plastic mind, others as hardy laborers in the field, and a few from the region of perpetual summer and gold, had returned to the classic ground of fond recollections, to exchange their mutual greetings as friends, and participate in the benefit and amusement of the occasion.

"The Christian Student" was the theme of the Annual Address, which was delivered by Rev. J. Fulton, of Woodstock, in a forcible and eloquent manner. He spoke of the character and responsibilities of a student, whose mind was being thoroughly disciplined by study and religion, and alluded to the leading relations which he sustained to the well-being of his race and the glory of God. He urged active and patient toil, connected with deep investigation, by several examples of eminent and worthy men, known for their attainments in knowledge and holiness. He encouraged the scholar to engage more arduously in his labors of love, and in disseminating truth; and enumerated the glorious triumphs of Christianity over Paganism, both of which were illustrated by the merits of their literature and philosophy, and their influences, at the different periods of the world, on the happiness and morals of mankind. Our civil and social improvements were styled the offspring of Christianity, which elevates as well as enlightens the human mind; and he referred to the various efforts of civilized society in alleviating sorrow and wretchedness, in uniting opposing parties and doctrines, and in elevating and perfecting man, by dispelling the darkness of ignorance and heathenism, and spreading the principles of true philosophy and religion. He closed with an earnest appeal to every student to educate his heart in the love of God, as well as his mind by strong intellectual exertion.

The singing, conducted by Prof. J. W. Morton, was not only very good but very appropriate, and so far elicited the applause of all present, that the singers were called upon at the close of the evening exercises, even at a late hour, by a crowded audience, to repeat several of their songs.

The productions of the students were arranged to give variety. They were generally spirited and eloquent, full of bold and vigorous thought and correct and comprehensive sentiments, presented in a chaste and eloquent style, and delivered with a natural and impressive elocution. Most of them were too long; and often students as well as professional men, could learn a valuable lesson in the science of brevity. One feature could not fail to interest all, and that was the high morality and just religious views which were embodied in the Orations and Compositions. It is a pleasure to follow the manly and upright course of those who have left these halls of learning, and gone out upon the broad arena of life, to see the indications of bold and original thought, ennobling opinions of religion, and the practical workings of intellect thoroughly trained by arduous study. It should be the glory of every institution so to discipline every mind under its care that the lineaments of the entire man—the thinking, reasoning, social, moral, and practical man—should be stamped upon the soul, and there remain to mould and form the character.

The friends of the school are greatly encouraged to go forward in their endeavors. A salutary influence is being diffused over the surrounding community; a permanent faculty, in whom the patrons of the school can repose implicit trust, is now secured; and an increased support of the institution is confidently expected.

THE CHINESE LANGUAGE.

An experiment is making at Amoy, says the Journal of Missions, to see whether the Bible and other books may not be given to the Chinese by means chiefly of the English alphabet. It is found that by means of seventeen of these letters, every consonant and vowel sound of the Amoy dialect may be represented, and by the use of a few additional marks, all the tones can be designated. Thus it will require a very short time to master the letters and tonal marks, and all the sounds represented by them in every variety of combination which the language requires. The experiment thus far seems to demonstrate that a boy at all apt in receiving instruction may be prepared in less than three months for reading the Bible with understanding. As it is now, a bright boy is occupied from three to five years in simply acquiring the names of the classics and school books, and then two or three years more are occupied in his learning to translate them into the colloquial language. As a consequence, not more than one-tenth of the men in all the region can read intelligently. If this experiment shall succeed, it will be of the most auspicious character for China.

ELIHU BURRITT'S EFFORTS.

The announcement that Elihu Burritt's Christian Citizen has been discontinued on account of his absence in Europe, will naturally raise the inquiry what he is doing there. The Independent of last week contains a letter from him, dated at London, June 6th, which answers this question very satisfactorily. After stating that he is engaged in two enterprises which are assuming new interest and importance, he says:—

"The first is termed 'The Olive Leaf Mission,' on the continent of Europe, and consists in the monthly insertion in the leading journals of France, Germany, and other countries, of a tract called 'Olive Leaf for the People,' which occupies one or two columns of an ordinary newspaper. This Olive Leaf contains several articles, embracing short Christian and moral arguments to prove the sinfulness, inhumanity, waste and folly of war; statistics, carefully collated, showing the bearings of the war system upon the people of different countries; and the testimiones of statesmen, and of great and good men, to the manifold evils of the system. Arrangements have been made with fifteen of the most influential journals on the Continent for the monthly insertion of these Olive Leaves, viz: Paris 1, Berlin 3, Hamburgh 1, Vienna 1, Leipsic 1, Bremen 1, Cologne 1, Frankfort 1, Stuttgart 1, Augsburgh 1, St. Petersburgh 1, Copenhagen 2. Through these journals we are now reaching nearly a million of minds, scattered over the continent of Europe. Thus a vast and permanent circle of readers is secured, upon whose attention we may press the great truths and principles of peace, precept upon precept, line upon line, from month to month, and from year to year."

The expense of this "mission," amounting to about $125 per month, is defrayed by some sixty "Olive Leaf Societies," which have been formed and are kept up by ladies in England, Scotland, Germany, and the United States. Mr. Burritt continues:—

"The other enterprise which we are prosecuting with renewed vigor, is 'an Ocean Penny Postage, to make home everywhere, and all nations neighbors.' For the last four years we have been gently pressing this idea upon the public mind in Great Britain, and slowly it has taken hold of it, with the conviction that this boon and blessing to the world must and will be realized. It has already acquired a strong force of public opinion in its favor. No political or religious antagonisms or prejudices are raised against it, and there is a good prospect of the union of all parties and interests in carrying it through to a speedy and full realization. As some readers may not understand what is embraced in this proposition, I will merely say, that by the term 'Ocean Penny Postage,' we mean simply this—that the single service of transporting a letter, weighing under half an ounce, from any port of Great Britain to any port beyond the sea, at which the British mail-packets stop, shall be performed by the British Government for one penny; or one penny for its mere conveyance from Folkestone to Boulogne, Liverpool to Boston, London to St. Petersburg, Hong-Kong, &c. We are now organizing an agitation for this measure. Petitions in its behalf are being signed all over the United Kingdom, and many in the Colonies. A very influential member of Parliament is to bring a motion before the House of Commons the present session in favor of the scheme."

The New Postage Law.—On our fourth page will be found an official statement of the rates of postage under the new law which went into operation on the 1st of July. It will be seen that the principal reduction is in letter postage. On newspapers, however, there is a slight reduction, and the postage is regulated by distance more than formerly. Subscribers for the Recorder, who live in the New England States, in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and in those parts of New York State not three hundred miles from the city, will receive their papers for less than heretofore. Those in the State of New York more than three hundred miles from the city, will have to pay two cents a quarter or eight cents a year more. In other sections the rates will not vary much from those of previous years. On the Sabbath-School Visitor the postage is greatly reduced, and will range from 2½ to 5 cents per annum.

Reördaining.—We learn from the New York Recorder, that "Rev. James Lillie, M. D.," who "has lately embraced Baptist views, having been for many years a minister of high standing in the Presbyterian Church," was re-ordained at the 1st Baptist Church in this city on the 23d ult. If the man had left the Baptists and joined the Episcopalians, or even the Presbyterians, we should not have wondered at his re-ordination. But for Baptists, who so strenuously deny the "apostolic succession" and kindred doctrines, to re-ordain a Presbyterian minister of long standing, strikes us as a work of supererogation.

Comparative Contributions of Catholics and Protestants for Missions.—In 1847, the Roman Catholic Church collected for its great institution, the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, £155,843. That same year the Established Church of England and Ireland collected for missions, £190,291; the Dissenters of England for the same object, £199,490; and the Protestants of other countries, £159,174. That is to say, Protestants paid more than three times as much for missionary purposes as Catholics.

West Africa Missions.—This year completes a century since the first English missionary was sent to Western Africa. It was Rev. Andrew Thompson, and previous to his going to Cape Coast Castle, he had labored five years for the conversion of the Indians in New Jersey. A native who was sent by him to England for his education, was his successor, and maintained a school for the education of his countrymen, the greater part of the time till his death, in 1816.

General Intelligence.

European News.

The steamer Canada arrived at Halifax on the 6th inst., bringing Liverpool dates to June 28.

The great exhibition is daily crowded to the utmost capacity of the building. On the 17th there were 67,000 visitors. On the 18th the receipts were near $15,000. One or two pieces of sculpture were broken in the press. Sales and orders to an enormous amount have already taken place in every department of the exhibition.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Cobden has made a long speech, followed by a debate, in which Lord Palmerston and Mr Roebuck participated, in favor of having the Government negotiate with France for a mutual reduction of national armaments. No vote was taken.

A bill to prevent Sunday trading has been defeated in the Commons.

A Mr. and Mrs. Graham, who tried to go up in a balloon at London, got badly hurt by dragging against one of Col. North's chimnies.

According to a Parliamentary paper just published, as many as 580,347 persons emigrated from the United Kingdom in the years 1849 and 1850. The number that went from Great Britain, including 328,090 from Liverpool, was 459,017, and 121,330 from Ireland.

From Italy we hear of continued troubles at Rome. Two Roman soldiers have been executed for badly wounding French soldiers, though the latter are said to have provoked the quarrel.

At Leghorn, three sons of Lord Aldborough, an English nobleman, have been arrested for being connected with the revolutionary propaganda, and for having a private printing press ready to print an incendiary and dangerous publication.

Germany is once more agitated. The Austrian troops at Hamburg went into a quarter where they had no business, provoked a riot, and finally killed several persons and wounded several more in putting it down.

In Belgium the Bocarmé trial has ended by the conviction and sentence to death of the husband, and the acquittal of the wife. The husband has appealed, and may perhaps obtain a new trial on the ground of some informality.

From Australia we hear of a decided and almost revolutionary movement to resist the landing of convicts hereafter in Van Dieman's Land.

We have a further arrival from India. The barbarians on the north-western frontier are vigilantly watched, and a strong force will remain in that quarter to repress any marauding acts. The news from China is that the war in the southern provinces still continues adverse to the reigning dynasty, which some persons anticipate will be speedily overthrown. At Canton they are on the edge of a volcano, as the rebellion spreads toward that city, but the accounts are desultory and confused.

Two Weeks later News from California.

The steamship Prometheus, with two weeks later news from California, arrived in New York on the 2d instant.

The steamer Tennessee arrived at Panama on the morning of the 20th June, with 250 passengers had $2,500,000 in gold dust and specie.

San Francisco seems to have almost entirely recovered from the shock of the late conflagration; the burnt district was being restored with a rapidity surpassing all previous examples of Californian energy, and business, far from being prostrated by so terrible a blow, and resumed its former activity.

From the interior, the accounts are no less cheering. Stockton keeps pace with San Francisco in the work of restoration, and the mining communities, having given up their nomadic and precarious habits, are being rewarded by a steady and substantial return for their labor.

The accounts from the quartz vein on Carson's Creek, (the scene of the $300,000 blast,) continue to be of the same marvelous character, and yet their authenticity can hardly be questioned.

The Stockton Journal learns that the quartz veins at Carson's Creek are yielding immense returns. It says:—

"In one place the workers took out 90 lbs. of pure gold in one day. In three days the same party took out 150 lbs. of unalloyed ore. To those who are skeptical as to the value of the quartz veins with which the whole section of the San Joaquin District is diversified, this account may appear somewhat exaggerated; but from the authority on which we give this extraordinary news, we can fully assure all doubters that there is not more truth in the most ordinary and well attested every day occurrence, than there is in our statement."

LARGE INCREASE OF LABORERS.—Within a few months, thirty-one individuals have been ordained, or are to be ordained, as Priests or Deacons for missionary labor under the auspices of the English Church Missionary Society; at Calcutta, 5; at Bombay, 3; in Ceylon, 5; in Tinnevelly, 7; in North-west America, 2; in China, 1; in London, 8. Of these eleven are native Christians.

MORAVIAN MISSIONS IN JAMAICA.—The Moravians have thirteen stations on the west end of this Island, so situated that the congregation connected with each lives within a circle the diameter of which, in most cases, is about twenty miles. The number of negroes and colored persons in connection with their churches is 13,388.

BAPTIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY.—The committee of this Society have issued an appeal to the ladies to find 1000 persons who will subscribe $10 each as a publishing fund, and proposing special prayer and contribution in each congregation on a Sunday in June.

JEWS PREACHING THE GOSPEL.—Three hundred converted Jews are now engaged in various parts of the world in preaching that Jesus Christ is "he that was to come."

At the session of the Indian Presbytery among the Choctaws, Pliny Fisk was ordained an evangelist. Mr. Fisk is the first Choctaw that has been ordained by the Indian Presbytery.

Obstinate Voluntary Starvation.

From the Springfield Republican, July 2.

On the 10th of June, Cornelius Regan was committed to jail, on a charge of drunkenness and riotous conduct at the depot, to remain 20 days, or till a fine of five dollars and costs were paid. For the first few days of his confinement he was very sullen and obstinate, but otherwise there was nothing remarkable in his conduct. He was twice confined in the solitary cell, ate some of his meals, and, when ordered, did some work, though he soon stopped. On the Friday after his confinement he refused to eat or drink, declared that he would have his liberty or starve, and in every way exhibited the most dogged obstinacy and determination in his purpose.

He was put into the solitary cell, but as far as could be seen did not even touch the food which was left at his door through Friday, Saturday, Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, but often reapeated his cry of "liberty or death." On Tuesday night, Dr. Gray was sent for and succeeded in persuading Regan to take about a gill of water and some bread. On Wednesday, however, he again refused to eat, and on Thursday he was, in spite of the most violen resistance, thrown upon the floor, and a little milk gruel was forced in through the nostrils. His resistance was so great that it was not deemed advisable to pursue this course.

From this time he went six days without eating or drinking, and his determination was such that, though he two or three times rinsed his mouth, he refused to swallow ordinarily, though it is possible he did swallow a few drops on one or two occasions. He was finally told that his brother was ready to pay his fine, and that he should be liberated. He expressed his satisfaction, but did not seem to rally much, and though after this he endeavored to eat, he was so weak that he could retain little or nothing. He stood or walked about his cell as long as his strength lasted, but for four or five days preceding his death, he was obliged to lie down most of the time. On Monday, for the first time, did his obstinacy appear in the least subdued, but during the following night he died.

Dr. Gray and the attendants endeavored in every way to ascertain if Regan exhibited any signs of insanity, but they all agreed that he appeared to be perfectly sane, displaying only the most systematic obstinacy and wilfulness. He complained of his wife a good deal, and when she came to see him, manifesting great sympathy for him, he returned it by throwing his milk in her face. He frequently threatened violence if he should be released, and destroyed every thing destructible which came within his reach. Dr. Gray gave it as his opinion that the cause of death was his voluntary abstinence from food and drink, though it is probable that his previous habits of intemperance hastened the crisis. His age was 31, and he is said to have belonged to Richmond, in this State. It should be added that every means were pursued to persuade or force him to take some sustenance, but, as will be seen, unsuccessfully.

FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE.—A fugitive slave case occurred recently in West Chester, Pa., of an extraordinary character, which is not calculated to add much to the popularity of or the confidence in the Fugitive Slave Law. The facts are these: A young colored woman, named Elizabeth Williams, who had been convicted at last January Court of the larceny of some money, and sentenced to five months imprisonment in the County jail, was discharged on Saturday morning at 4 o'clock —the usual hour at which prisoners are discharged. She was immediately arrested at the prison door, by Milton Layman, acting as Deputy U. S. Marshal, and taken before James L. Jones, Esq., U. S. Commissioner, charged with being a fugitive from labor, from New Castle County, in the State of Delaware. Here, without friends, without Counsel, with no one present but the Commissioner, the Marshal, the claimant or his agent, and his Counsel, F. Pennington, Esq., at an hour when, perhaps, there are as few people stirring in the street, as any in the whole twenty-four, in an almost incredibly short space of time, she was delivered to the claimant or his agent, who put her into a close wagon and drove rapidly from the State.

CAUTION TO BALL PLAYERS.—The Pittsfield Sun states that in a recent case which occurred in Great Barrington, an action was brought against some 12 or 15 young men by an old man, to recover damages for a spinal injury received by him, and occasioned by a wicket ball, which frightend his horse and threw him from his wagon. The boys were playing in the street. The action was carried to the Supreme Court, and it was decided by the full Court, after argument, that the practice of playing ball in the street was unlawful, and that all the persons engaged in the game were liable, if the ball be thrown or knocked by any one of them, and a horse frightened, and any injury to person or property ensued. The injury in this case affected the health of the plaintiff for life, and the amount recived was very heavy.

PENALTY OF PERJURY.—In the Supreme Court of the State of New Jersey, at Trenton, on the 2d inst, the Attorney General moved the Court for judgment in the case of Harvey Dayton, former Cashier of the State Bank at Morris, convicted of perjury, in making a false affidavit as to the assets of the bank which exploded in August, 1849.

His counsel, F. T. Frelinghuysen, Esq., addressed the Court in his behalf, asking their merciful consideration, seeing that the conviction alone was of itself a grievous punishment, that an innocent wife and a respectable circle of connections would he injuriously affected by the infliction of an ignominious punishment, and that the jury had recommended the prisoner to mercy.

The Court then passed sentence, which was that he pay a fine of $600, and stand committed until the fine and costs be paid.

Chief Justice Green, in pronouncing the sentence, made some very impressive remarks, reminding the prisoner that by this conviction and sentence he stood in an ignominious position in society; that he was now disfranchised and could never again give testimony in a court of justice, unless restored by legislative clemency to the rights which he had forfeited.

SUGAR REFINING MACHINERY.—At the present moment there are being constructed at the Novelty Works, New York, four copper vacuum pans, the largest ever seen in this country, each weighing over four tons, and capable of containing 2,000 gallons. They are constructed also on a new and improved plan, having double bottoms, and being lined with coils of pipe which allow of the application of steam to the boiling of the sugar. An air pump, worked by steam, draws off the vapor arising in the pans while the sugar itself was dissolved in water. All risk of burning is avoided by the boiling point being obtained at a low temperature. Each pan is provided with a thermometer; a guage to exhibit the extent to which the air has been exhausted; a proof-stick to enable the boiler to test at any time the condition of the mass; and an eye-glass which affords a view of the interior of the pan. HORACE GREELEY ON THE RAPPINGS.—Shortly after Mr. Greeley arrived in London, he wrote a letter to The Atheneum newspaper, denying the charge that he had ever used The Tribune to advocate a belief in the spirituality of the demonstrations. Part of that letter was published, including the following sentence:—

"My opinions did certainly, at one time, incline to that hypothesis, [that the noises were made by spirits,] and I am still unable clearly to account for the phenomena I have witnessed, or believe to have been witnessed by credible persons, on any other grounds. But I now incline to the belief that Mesmerism, Clairvoyance, and Jugglery combined, may yet furnish a clue to the mystery."

AMERICANS IN THE EAST.—A letter from Constantinople, dated May 24th, says that the Eastern world is thronged with American travelers. "Visiting England and Western Europe from America has become such an every day thing that it gives a man no notoriety at all to return to his native land and say that he has seen London, Paris, and Berlin. He must also visit Egypt, the Holy Land, Athens, and Constantinople; and such is already the number of American travelers in these parts, that ere long, Nineveh, Teheran, and Timbuctoo, must be explored by those who are ambitious of renown as tourists. Last week we had a party of twenty or more American travelers here, four of whom were clergymen, and parties of six, eight, and ten have been quite common of late."

We learn from the Sussex Register, that four persons of Sandystown, in that county, while getting out timber in the woods one day last week, ate their dinner, which they had carried with them, and soon after three of them were taken sick; for some time the lives of two were despaired of, and they remained at last accounts seriously ill. Their sickness is attributed to eating pot-cheese, as the one who did not partake of it was not at all affected. The cheese had been made in an earthen pot, and was doubtless impregnated with the lead from the glazing with which similar utensils are coated.

A letter to the editor of the Benicia (California) Gazette, says:—About 4 o'clock on Friday afternoon a violent hail storm occurred, accompanied by much thunder and lightening. The hail fell the size of ordinary bullets to the depth of two or three inches. Curiosity induced the Mayor to put one of the hailstones into his mouth, and to his surprise found it distinctly salt. Not willing to trust his own senses, he called upon his neighbors to try the experiment. The result was the same, and this extraordinary meteorological fact may be therefore considered as fully established.

The Grand Lodge of Masons of the District of Columbia, have accepted the invitation of the President, to perform the appropriate ceremonies at the laying of the corner stone for the extension of the capitol, and the Masonic fraternity of the neighboring states are requested to unite with them. Grand Master French will wear the same Regalia and use the same Gavel which Washington, in 1793, in the capacity of Grand-Master, used in laying the corner stone of the capitol.

The Connecticut Legislature passed all the Bank Charters vetoed by the Governor. The Banks were as follows: The Merchants' Bank of New Haven; the Central Bank of Middletown; The Pequonnuc Bank of Bridgeport; The Bank of America, of Seymour; The Ocean Bank, of Stonington; The Woodbury Bank, of Woodbury; The Mystic River Bank, of Groton; The Hatters' Bank, of Bethel; The Farmers' Bank of Bridgeport; and the Middlesex County Bank, of Middletown.

Mr. Archibald Slate of Dudley, England, has received a patent for certain improvements in Canal Navigation, which relate to the transfer of boats from one level to another, and to the propelling of boats. The transfer is effected by a new construction of vertical lift, in which the boat is run into a caison raised and lowered by machinery, working in a frame-work which is situated above the arms of the levels. The new method of propulsion consists in the employment of compressed air as the motive power.

SUMMARY.

The Marysville (Cal.) Herald says:—The purest gold found in California, was gathered at Chinese Diggins, (junction of Wood's Creek Toulome,) four hundred feet above the level of the San Francisco river and deposited at the United States Assay Office, San Francisco. It yielded in value $19 84-100 per ounce; 23 carat. This is quite equal to the gold dust from "Senegambie," Africa, long regarded as the finest gold in the world.

The Philadelphia Ledger of Thursday states that the number of letters received at the Post Office in that city on Tuesday, the first day of the operation of the new Postage Law, was double the average received daily under the late law and amounted to about twenty thousand. The number of prepaid letters was about one-third the amount received, which is but little over the number of paid letters under the former law.

A lady stepping off the cars at Albany one day last week lost a purse containing $25. A boy 10 or 12 years of age, by the name of Richard Shay, picked up the purse. While seeking for the lady he was told to keep it, for she would never give him a cent. The honest boy replied he did not care, he did not want a cent, for the money was not his. He sought out the lady and restored her the purse. Richard is the eldest son of a widow, a hard working woman who by her labor supports six children.

The Treasurer of Rhode Island finds in his possession five thousand dollars of which he has no account, and which he is sure does not belong to him, but must belong to the State, to which he passes it over. The error occurred during the illness of the Treasurer, and though it has not been discovered, the money has been, which is an important consideration.

It has been decided in a suit brought for the recovery of the value of a cow maimed on the track of the New-Jersey Railroad Company, and tried at Newark, N.J., "That an engineer in charge of a locomotive engine is not liable for accidental injury to a cow which, suffered to go at large, had strayed on the Railroad. The owner of cattle is bound to keep them in his own close at his peril."

The Telegraph informs us says the Albany Journal of the arrival of our associate, Mr. Dawson, this forenoon, in the steamer Africa. Mr. Dawson left Boston on the 30th of April. He has therefore crossed the Atlantic twice, and traveled through England, Belgium, Prussia, Germany, France, Scotland and Ireland, in sixty-three days! Grass don't grow under such men's feet.

Rev. Daniel S. Butrick, of the Dwight Mission in the Cherokee country, died on the 8th ult. It is reported that for some time previous to his death he was engaged in writing a history of the Cherokees—giving a glowing picture of the rapid progress made by that nation in civilization and refinement, and an account of the Cherokee language, customs and peculiarities.

Mr. Fennimore Cooper is so ill that he is not expected to live. His family were summoned to him on Saturday last, and in the evening of that day he received the sacrament preparatory to dissolution. He has been unwell for some time and went home from New York about five weeks since in hope of recovering his strength. Mr. Cooper is now about sixty years of age.

At the commencement of Dickinson College, held on the 25th of June, the degree of D.D. was conferred upon Rev. Charles Collins, President of Emory and Henry College, Virginia, and the degree of LL.D. upon Gerardus B. Docharty, Professor of Mathematics in the New-York Free Academy, and upon Job R. Tyson of Philadelphia.

The Charleston Mercury says that arrangements have been made for the importation of Gunny Bagging directly to that city from Calcutta, by which means it is intended to take this branch of commerce from Boston. A British ship the Grasmere, is now on her way from Calcutta with a full cargo.

Hon. William Horace Brown, Senator from the 1st District of New York composed of Queens, Richmond, and Suffolk, died at Albany at 6 o'clock on Friday evening, July 4 after an illness of 48 hours. He was not thought dangerously ill until a few hours previous to his death.

A drove of 700 or 800 elephants has been known to visit the Bonny country, Africa at one time. The numbers scattered over the whole region are countless. As they all have tusks, and some of their tusks weigh 120, 130, and 140 pounds each, the quantity of ivory which Africa may produce, is almost without limits.

The number of interments at St. Louis for the week ending June 23, was 273, of which 149 were by cholera. The week previous to this the total mortality was 224, and the deaths by cholera 123, showing an increase of 49 on the whole number, and 26 on the deaths by cholera.

The house in Berlin where dwelt the celebrated philosopher Moses Mendelssohn, has been purchased by the Hebrew community of that city, for the purpose founding a school in which poor orphens may, without distinction of religion, be taught some means of earning their bread.

Sir Samuel Romilly says: "There is nothing by which I have, through life, more profited, than by the just observation, the good opinion, and the sincere and gentle encouragement of amiable and sensible women."

The ship Sallie Dearne, from New Orleans for Liverpool, was struck with lightning on the 28th June and burnt to the water's edge. The crew and $120,000 in gold were saved by the ship Frank Johnson.

The Congress of New Granada adjourned on the 20th ult. Previous to adjournment, it passed a law abolishing Slavery in the Republic to go into effect on the 1st of January, 1852.

Jenny Lind sang at Springfield, Mass., on the evening of the 1st inst., and at Northampton on the 3d. She was to sing at Albany on the 8th, and at Utica on the 9th inst.

The Ausland, an able journal published at Stuttgart, thinks that the next great step of the Americans will be infallibly the subjugation of Japan and China.

The next National Convention of Journeymen Printers will be held in Baltimore on the 12th of September. Arrangements are making to have a full representation of the whole country.

A dispatch dated Detroit, Tuesday, July 1, says:—An attempt was made yesterday to blow up the Depot of the Michigan Central Railroad. A box of powder, with a slow match attached, was received by the steamer May Flower and put in the Depot, where it exploded during the morning. Two men were blown up, and seriously though not fatally injured. It was thought by some that the box was designed to explode on the boat.

The Ann Arbor (Mich.) Argus states that "In conversation with an intelligent and respectable blacksmith a few days since, he informed us that iron from the mines of Lake Superior was of a quality superior to any other. It ranks even higher than the celebrated Swedes iron, being more malleable, tougher, and not so subject to flaws. It is now the only iron used on the lake steamers, where superior strength is required."

The miners engaged in the mines at Sterling Hill, of the New Jersey Exploring and Mining Company, a few days ago, the Sussex Herald states, put in a sand blast, by which about 400 tuns of zinc ore of pure quality was thrown down upon the bank. It is believed to be the largest blast of workable ore ever loosened at one time.

The brig Henry Edward, Captain Samuel Washburn, from Boston to Port-au-Prince, when 23 days out, during thick and squally weather, struck on Grand Turks Island at 4 A. M. on June 11. She sunk in 30 minutes and became a total loss. Most of her cargo, consisting of provisions, &c., was landed in a damaged state.

The traffic of the Erie Railroad for June exceeds the expectations of its friends, and already shows the effect of the extension to Dunkirk. The anticipated amount for June was $205,000 or $210,000, whereas the figures show within a fraction $225,000.

The Boston Traveler understands that the cases of Morris, Elizur Wright, Hayes, and T. P. Smith, charged with aiding in the escape of Shadrach, will not be taken up for trial at present.

A dispatch dated Elmira, Tuesday, July 1, says:—An accident happened to the night Express train here this morning about 3 o'clock. One man was killed and several badly injured.

It is related of the great Audubon, lately deceased, that he had no faith in genius; that a man could make himself what he pleased by labor; and that by a proper use of every moment of time, the mind might be kept improving to the end of life.

The name of Bridegroom was formerly given to the new married man, because it was customary for him to wait at table on his bride and friends on his wedding day.

The modes of suicide chiefly followed by the Chinese are hanging, drowning and taking opium; and, among the rich people, swallowing gold.

A number of mills in the neighborhood of Providence are going into the manufacture of De Laines.

Patent purse gloves, which have a pocket to contain any small sum of money, a railway ticket, &c., for immediate use, have been invented.

A system of banking is discovered to have prevailed in Babylon at least seven or eight hundred years before the Christian era.

THE WATER-CURE JOURNAL for July commences the twelfth volume of that "Herald of Reforms, devoted to Physiology, Hydropathy, and the Laws of Life." It is industriously edited, neatly printed, and well worth the $1 per year at which it is furnished. Published by Fowlers & Wells, 131 Nassau-st., N. Y.

THE AMERICAN PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, by the same publishers, enters upon its fourteenth volume with the July number. Though devoted primarily to the discussion and illustration of Phrenology, it contains a variety of scientific and literary matter. Terms, $1 per annum.

MARRIED.

In Brookfield, N. Y., June 28th, by Eld. Joshua Clark, Mr. JACOB C. WALTERS to Miss MARY J. ROYAL, all of the above place.

DIED.

In New York city, on the morning of Second-day, June 30, Mrs. ANN ELIZA MOSHER, wife of Pinkham Mosher, aged 43 years. She was formerly a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Plainfield, N. J., but had recently united with the Church in New York. Her remains were taken to New Market, N. J., for interment.

In Genesee, on the 9th of June, Mrs. AVIS COLGROVE, wife of Amos Colgrove, of Wisconsin, in the 36th year of her age. She had been many years an acceptable member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Genesee. She was married on the 18th of January last, and was about to remove to Wisconsin, when she was seized with a disease which terminated in death. She has doubtless gone to a better country, where all is peace. "The memory of the just is blessed." J. B.

In Leonardsville, N. Y., Mr. JAMES WAMSLEY, (colored,) aged 90 years. The subject of this notice was originally from Rhode Island. When young he was engaged in the service of his country at the time of the Revolution, both by land and by sea. He came into this State some 60 years since, and appears to have been one of the original members of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield. For the last four years he has resided within the pales of this church, and was esteemed a pious and worthy member. At the communion previous to his death, being unable to meet with his brethren, he requested to have the communion administered to him in his room of confinement. The request was complied with, much to his satisfaction. We trust he has died the death of the righteous, and that his last end is like his.

At Glen's Falls, N. Y., June 10th, Rev. AMOS R. WELLS, aged 57 years.

In Hopkinton, R. I., June 7th, Mrs. HANNAH WILBUR, relict of the late Gideon Wilbur, aged 88 years.

In Lincklaen, N. Y., June 13th, after a long illness, and in hopes of heaven, CHARLOTTE M. ACKLEY, daughter of Daniel Ackley, Esq., aged 20 years.

Drowned, while bathing in the Kickapoo Creek, June 1st, GIDEON, son of Uriah Davis, of Southampton, Ill.

Notice.

THE Committee of the Publishing Society on the Monthly Periodical would request ministers and others who have received the Circular of the Commitiee, to forward the articles solicited for the Biographical Department as soon as practicable, as the publication must be delayed until a sufficient number of articles are furnished to insure the regular issue of the work after it is commenced. It is desirable to have a memoir of every minister or other distinguished Sabbath-keeper in the denomination. It is possible some ministers may have been overlooked, or a wrong direction given to the circular intended for them; if such should be the case, they will consider this a request to furnish leading events, at least, of their own life, or that of any other person coming within the scope of the object of the Society. Eight Lithographic Portraits, drawn in the best style of the art, are now ready for the press, and others will be prepared as soon as proper materials are furnished to the Committee, that each number may have a portrait as intended.

For Sale.

THE subscriber offers for sale the elegant house recently built by him in the vicinity of the Academy at Alfred Center, Allegany Co., N. Y. It is sufficiently large to accommodate a numerous family, and is most favorably situated for any one having children to educate. The buildings and garden occupy one acre of ground, and there are already on the premises thirty-four trees of the choicest fruit—apples, pears, and cherries. IRA SAYLES.

The Ladies' Wreath.

PROSPECTUS OF THE SIXTH VOLUME.—The May number commenced Vol. VI. of this popular Magazine; and the Publishers confidently assert, that the forthcoming volume will rival, in the beauty and elegance of its Embellishments, and the Literary Merit of its contents, any former volume, or any Dollar Magazine in the World! Each number will contain one or more fine Steel Engravings, and a beautifully colored Flower Plate. It will be printed on Fine White Paper, with Large, Clear-Faced Type. The best Writers in the country have been engaged to enrich its pages, and no pains will be spared to make it what it assumes to be—a Model Magazine.

The Editorial Department will be conducted by HELEN IRVING, a lady justly celebrated for her refined taste and extensive literary acquirements; besides occasional gems from the pen of Mrs. S. T. MARTYN, the late Editress, under whose control the work has secured its present high standard of literature and moral excellence, and a circulation unparalleled by any similar work. The present Editress will be sustained by a list of Contributors not excelled by any periodical in the country; many of them are among the most popular writers of the day.

The Musical Department, under the control of an eminent Professor, will be enriched by Original Pieces from some of the ablest Composers.

Particular Notice!—Postage Reduced!—On and after the 1st of July, the Postage on the "Wreath," within 500 miles of the office of publication, will be one cent per number; and any distance over 500 and within 1,500 miles, two cents—if paid quarterly in advance.

TERMS.—The subscription price of the "Ladies' Wreath" is One Dollar a year—invariably in advance. Best Terms to Clubs.—We offer to Clubs the following low terms, which are very near the cost: Four copies for one year, to be sent to one address, $3; Eight do. do. $6; Fourteen do. do $10; Twenty do. do. $14. Any person wishing to get up a Club, will be supplied with a Specimen Number by writing for it, and paying the postage. Bound Volumes are always on hand, and will be exchanged for numbers in good order, by paying the price of Binding. Back Numbers can always be supplied.

Note.—For each additional ounce, or fractional part of an ounce, beyond the ten ounces embraced in this table, an additional rate must be charged.

Directions.—1. On every transient newspaper, unsealed circular, handbill, engraving, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book, and every other description of printed matter, the above rates must in all cases be prepaid, according to the weight.

2. Whenever any printed matter on which the postage is required to be prepaid, shall, through the inattention of postmasters, or otherwise, be sent without prepayment, the same shall be charged with double the above rates.

3. Bound books and parcels of printed matter, not weighing over 32 ounces, shall be deemed mailable matter.

Periodicals published at intervals, not exceeding three months, and sent from the office of publication to actual and bona fide subscribers, are to be charged with one-half the rates mentioned in the last above table, and prepayment of a quarter's postage thereon must in all cases be required. Periodicals published at intervals of more than three months are charged with the full rate, which must be prepaid.

Note.—In case there is on or in any newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, or other printed matter or paper connected therewith, any manuscript of any kind, by which information shall be asked for, or communicated in writing, or by marks or signs, the said newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, or other printed matter becomes subject to letter postage; and it is the duty of the postmaster to remove wrappers and envelopes from all printed matter and pamphlets not charged with letter postage, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is upon or connected with any such printed matter, or in such package, any matter or thing which would authorize or require the charge of a higher rate of postage thereon.

N. B.—All letters to and from foreign countries, (the British North American Provinces excepted,) are to be charged with single rate of postage, if not exceeding the weight of half an ounce; double rate, if exceeding half an ounce, but not exceeding an ounce; quadruple rate, if exceeding an ounce but not exceeding two ounces; and so on, charging two rates for every ounce or fractional part of an ounce over the first ounce.

Ship Letters.—Letters sent from the United States to foreign countries by private vessels, are chargeable with inland postage, which must be prepaid from the mailing office to the port of sailing. The postmaster of San Francisco is especially instructed to make up and dispatch such mails to the Sandwich Islands, China, and New South Wales.

Periodicals.—Periodical works and pamphlets, are not entitled to transit conveyance through the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, but they may be sent from the United States to the United Kingdom, and vice versa, at two cents of United States postage each, if they do not exceed two ounces in weight; and at one cent per ounce, or fraction of an ounce, when they exceed that weight, to be collected in all cases in the United States; and the same will be subject to an additional like charge in the United Kingdom when not exceeding two ounces; but the third ounce raises the British charge to sixpence with an additional charge of twopence for each additional ounce. When sent to or received from foreign countries, without passing through the United Kingdom, they will be chargeable with the regular United States rates, to be prepaid when sent, and collected when received.

Newspapers and Periodicals to Foreign Countries (particularly to the Continent of Europe) must be sent in narrow bands, open at the sides or ends; otherwise they are chargeable there with letter postage.

N. K. HALL, Postmaster General.

Wild Man of the Woods.

During March last, Mr. Hamilton, of Greene county, Arkansas, while out hunting with an acquaintance, observed a drove of cattle in a state of apparent alarm, evidently pursued by some dreadful enemy. Halting for the purpose, they soon discovered, as the animals fled by them, that they were followed by an animal bearing the unmistakeable likeness of humanity. He was of gigantic stature, the body being covered with hair, and the head with long locks that fairly enveloped his neck and shoulders. The "wild man," for so we must call him, after looking at them deliberately for a short time, turned and ran away with great speed, leaping from twelve to fourteen feet at a time. His foot prints were thirteen inches each.

This singular creature has long been known, traditionally, in St. Francis, Greene and Poinsett counties, Arkansas, sportsmen and hunters having described him so long ago as seventeen years since. A planter, indeed, saw him very recently, but withheld his information lest he should not be credited, until the account of Mr. Hamilton and his friend placed the existence of the animal beyond cavil.

A great deal of interest is felt in the matter by the inhabitants of that region, and various conjectures have been ventured in regard to him. The most generally entertained idea appears to be that he was a survivor of the earthquake disaster which desolated that region in 1812. Thrown helpless upon the wilderness by that disaster, it is probable that he grew up in his present state, until he now bears only the outward resemblance of humanity.

So well authenticated have now become the accounts of this creature, that an expedition is now organizing in this city, by Col. Cross and Dr. Sullivan, to scout for him. They are to be accompanied by several other gentlemen, and we await with much anxiety the result of this excursion. [Memph. Enq.

Curious Discovery in Bulgaria.—A very curious discovery has just been made in the province of Bulgaria, in Turkey. Some Greek workmen, in digging near the village of Rahmanileah and the town of Hadzah, found a large table of grey-colored marble; they removed it and found one beneath exactly similar; having removed that also, they saw a great number of objects shining like gold and silver. They hastened to the captain of the district, and that functionary, assisted by two ecclesiastics, proceeded to make an examination. They found the skeleton of a man of large stature, with a copper hemlet on his head, surrounded by a thin crown of gold; the hands and the arms up to the elbows were stained with somthing of a bronze color; in the right was a copper chain, with an incense-box of the same metal, covered with verdigris, on the third finger of the left hand was a gold ring, with the figures in Roman characters, 966. By the side of the skeleton were three cups in silver, very brilliant, and 26 cups in iron, very rusty, but bearing traces of having been gilded; there were also an immense number of nails, and about 500 arrows, of which the wood was rotten and the points rusty. The skeleton and the different articles were carefully packed up, and sent to Adrianople for examination.

Flax Culture.—A Commitee of the Massachusetts Legislature, appointed to procure information concerning the Culture of Flax and the probability of its substitution for cotton in the manufacture of cheap fabrics, report that there is no doubt that the plant can be raised abundantly in every State in the Union under proper tillage, without exhausting the soil; and that it is but reasonabte to conclude, from recent developments, that Flax may soon be adopted to a considerable extent, as a substitute for cotton, in the manufacture of the class of fabrics referred to. It is affirmed that not less than 46,000 acres of land in the State of New-York were sown with Flax in 1849.

The London Times Office.

An intelligent German writes as follows of the office of the Times newspaper in London:

"I was received at the office, and the details of the whole establishment were shown me with all that courtesy of which the stranger in London with good recommendations is sure. The most surprising thing of all is the order and regularity with which everything is managed. There is no hurry, no half-way work, no negligence. Everything has its appointed place and time, and the most stringent penalties prevent any delay or failure on the part of those employed. If you consider that every day as much matter is printed in the Times as would fill two large octavos, and that regularly within five hours 34,000 copies, and since the 1st of May between 38 and 39,000, copies are struck off, and even then you can hardly imagine this collosal business, if you have never seen it. Among the many remarkable objects in this great building by Blackfriars bridge, (for the Times office stands upon the foundation of Blackfriars, where for centuries Plantagenists, Yorkists, Lancastrians, and Tudors held court,) is the steam Press, the hundred armed Briarens who achieves this gigantic task. It stands in a large hall by the side of another entirely similar, but at present unused, and the two occupy the whole surface of the floor. You ascend a cast iron staircase to a platform, where the engine can be quietly observed and studied. The single white sheets of paper, already stamped red, disappear with surprising swiftness into this iron crater, and then in a manner incredible to the uninitiated, they are turned out pointed at eight different points, when they are immediately seized by persons appointed for the purpose and turned over. The roar of that mighty machinery is not unlike that of a waterfall, and is not to be likened with that of any press upon the Continent. The new presses of The Times were fully and technically described a few weeks since, and are entirely peculiar, and the new principles involved promises extraordinary advantages for the art of printing within the next dozen years."

Destroying Bank Notes.—A correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser says:—"In March last the Legislature ordered the destruction of the plates and notes of certain broken banks. The notes had been accumulating for years, and were collected in packages at the Treasury Department. The plates had not been collected, however, but have been partly since, and were those of the Watervliet Bank of Buffalo, Commercial Bank of Buffalo, Bank of the City of New-York, Bank of Lyons, Clinton County Bank, and Wayne ditto. Those of the Bank of Lockport, City Bank of Buffalo and La Fayette Bank of New-York have not yet been found. It was at first determined to destroy the notes by placing them in a large strongly heated stove, but this was found to be a very tedious operation; the notes were so closely packed as to prevent the fire penetrating between them. Next a common straw cutter was used, which did the business rapidly. The cuttings were then burned; still it was a slow work and the destruction of the notes occupied five days and a half. The destruction of the plates was a still more difficult task, especially the steel ones, which could not be brokeu into pieces with hammers. Neither could files effectually erase the engravings, and the steel plates were heated and hammered at a blacksmith's forge, until destroyed. The copper ones were melted and sold. Thirty-two plates were thus destroyed and $1,580,445 in broken bank notes, $500,000 of which belonged to the Buffalo banks. If these old notes had tongues, what tales they could tell.

Noiseless Wheels.—In this instance the invention consists in the application of a solid band of vulcanized India rubber over the iron tire of the wheel. The India rubber is held in its place by the tire having a raised rim on both sides, and by its own elasticity. The band of an ordinary carriage wheel is about an inch and a half in thickness, and, unless on close inspection, no difference from the common iron-shod wheel is perceptible. We have driven some distance in a carriage with the wheels so shod, and were struck, not only with its noiselessness, but at the perfect smoothness of the motion—the wheels being, in fact, springs, and, by their elasticity, giving a lighter draught than with the iron tire. We have seen one set of wheels which have been driven 4,000 miles; they have here and there a trifling cut, but show no appearance of being worn out, and seem quite capable of another three or four thousand. An iron tire is generally worn out in 3,000 miles, so that the India rubber tire has so far proved itself the more lasting. It is certainly a great addition to the luxury of a carriage to have it run without jar or noise; and it would be a universal comfort to have the streets of cities without the incessant rattle of carriages, omnibuses, &c. [Scientific American.

Improvements in Gas-Lights.—An improvement in the method of lighting with gas has recently been announced in Paris, which promises to be of importance. It has been used with success in the office of the Presse, and excites the admiration of all who see it. The light proceeds from a small vessel provided with tubes, which send forth long jets of flame, which play on another vessel placed a short distance above the first. The gas is brought into the large vessel; this is heated by the flame below; it heats gradually, and soon doubles its volume; when doubled, the same illuminating matter comes in contact with double the quantity of atmospheric air; and hence burns with greater intensity and without loss; nearly one half being lost when the gas is not expanded. A small capsule of platina serves to divide the flame, and as it is heated, becomes luminous itself. The arrangement is such as to obviate the danger of explosion, and much cheaper materials can be used for the production of the gas, than in the ordinary method. [Tribune.

"The Controversy Touching the Old Stone Mill in the Town of Newport, R. I.," is the title of a pamphlet which will naturally excite the interest and will repay the perusal of the summer visitors at Newport, part of whose pleasure there is the wondering contemplation of the singular ruin, which has assumed historical importance from its mention in the Antiquitates Americanæ of the Royal Society of Denmark. It has been fondly deemed a relict of the Northmen, who in the vague antiquity of American history, came into the continent by the back door, settled all the Atlantic coast, even to Virginia, called the temperance land "that should be," Vinland or Vineland, and then abruptly withdrew, and have ever since eluded historical precision. In this little work, the anonymous author collects and collates, in the most sprightly and pleasant manner, all the authorities and traditions upon the subject, and comes to the conclusion that it was an old mill. [Tribune.

A Settler's Company.—The Pittsburgh Dispatch states that a number of enterprising and intelligent citizens of Allegheny are organizing a company to make a settlement in Iowa or Wisconsin. Their plan, as we understand, is to select a site of 800 acres, lay out farm lots of seven acres, and a central town, in lots of comfortable size, after retaining sufficient for public buildings, squares, &c. The number of members is limited to one hundred. They will be joint purchasers of the whole 800 acres, say at Government price; after the land is divided into the 100 farms and 100 town lots, &c., they will be put up at auction; members of the company will then be entitled to bid for the lots, according to their eligibility of position, and the excess of purchase, survey, &c., of the land, will be devoted to the improvement of the town, grading and paving of the streets, public buildings, &c. The aim is and has been so far carried out, to induce persons of various trades and occupations to unite in the purchase and settlement. After the purchase and settlement are made, each purchaser is required to build a house on his portion of the ground. He may then either sell it to a third party, or retain it, as he pleases—the joint or company relation ceasing after the settlement is made.

Eccentric Movements of the Fixed Stars.—At a meeting of the Berlin Academy of Sciences held on May 31 last, the venerable Alexander von Humboldt made an interesting communication upon some observations of singular movements of fixed stars. It seems that at Triest, January 17, 1851, between 7 and 8 o'clock P. M., before the rising of the moon, when the star Sirius was not far from the horizon, it was seen to perform a remarkable series of eccentric movements. It rose and sank, moved right and left, and sometimes seemed to move in a curved line. The observers were Mr. Keune, a student in the upper class of the gymnasium, and Mr. Thugutt, a saddler, both certified to be reliable persons. The family of the latter also beheld the phenomena. Mr. Keune with his head leaned immovable against a wall, saw Sirius rise in a right line above the roof of a neighboring house, and immediately sink out behind it, and then again appear. Its motions were so considerable that for some time the beholders thought it was a lantern suspended by a kite. It also varied in brilliancy, growing alternately brighter and fainter, and now and then being for moments quite invisible, though the sky was perfectly clear. As far as it is known, this phenomenon has been remarked but twice before, once in 1799 from the Peak of Teneriffe by von Humboldt himself, and again nearly fifty years later, by a well-informed, and very careful observer, Prince Adalbert of Prussia.

The Danger of admitting Bull Dogs into Glass Palaces.—The subterranean glass palace of Phalon, in Broadway, appears to be as great a show to strangers visiting New York, as the Baths of Caraculla were, in their days of splendor, to the visitors of imperial Rome. The Binghamton Democrat publishes the following curious occurrence which recently happened at Phalon's underground palace:—

"As Captain Nye, the gallant commander of the Pacific, was conducting a party of European friends through Phalon's magnifiTonsorial Saloons, a few hours after landing, for the purpose of showing them what an expensive, tasty people we Americans are, not only in the fitting up of our steamboats and steamships, but even in the decoration of our barber's shops, a pugnacious bulldog, belonging to one of the foreign gentlemen, suddenly plunged through a costly mirror extending from the floor to the ceiling, and shattered it into a hundred fragments. The price of the mirror was five hundred dollars, which the owner of the dog immediately handed over to Mr. Phalon. It is supposed the bulldog saw his own impudent face in the mirror, and thinking that it belonged to some other animal of the canine race, considering it his duty to chastise its owner for exhibiting such an ugly physiognomy in such a fashionable place of resort."

Folding Papers by Steam.—Probably there is no branch of machanics in which such rapid improvement has been made within the last twenty years, as that of printing. But a few years since the casting of type was a slow, laborious process—each type cast requiring some three or four motions of the hand; our presses could turn but about two hundred and fifty impressions per hour, and the paper used was made by hand in single sheets. Now the steam engine performs all. Paper is drawn out in endless rolls by means of steam—type are cast by steam—composed by steam, and our steam presses multiply impressions at the rate of fifteen or twenty thousand per hour. Heretofore, at this point, steam has stopped. The papers must be folded by hand, and to do the work of a daily paper required many laborers. But even this difficulty has been overcome. At the press-room of Messrs. Childs & Platt, 16 Spruce st., we yesterday inspected a machine that was taking in broad sheets at one side and piling them up, neatly folded, at the opposite side. With but a boy to feed, it turned out eighty folded papers per minute, and we presume it would do much more—for we see no limit to the speed at which it may be worked.

Bought his own House.—A gentleman of Boston built a fine house, at a great expense, a short distance from the city. It was a splendid residence, but he got tired of it, moved back to the city, and went to an auctioneer to have it disposed of. The auctioneer advertised it in such glowing terms that the owner didn't recognize the description of his own property, and when the day of sale arrived he sent a friend to bid off, at any price, a place that had so many advantages as the auctioneer's advertisement enumerated. The gentleman is now back in his old quarters, and whenever he thinks of moving, his wife reads him the auctioneer's advertisement. [Spring. Post.

Method of Making Palm Oil.—Palm oil is procured only from Africa, and is the product of the majestic palm tree. The manner of making it is as follows: A square pit is formed in the ground, something similar to tan pits in this country, and this square place is filled with palm nuts, which are taken down ripe from the trees, and the females trample the oil out in the sun with their feet. They continue trampling until the nuts and the oil form one mass. They then extract the oil by allowing water to run into this place, and take it all up with the palm of the hand, scraping it into a calabash. In this tedious and difficult process, an immense quantity is lost by its running into the ground. There is also a great deal left attached to the nut. The oil is obtained from the surface of the nut, and not from the kernel. Yet notwithstanding the waste which must result from this rude process, 19,163 tons of the oil were imported into England in 1847, and it promises to be one of the heaviest articles of traffic in the world.

India Rubber Cuirasses.—Ben. P. Poore says the French heavy cavalry still wear metallic cuirasses, but it is proposed to adopt a new pattern, of vulcanized India rubber, about half an inch thick. This thickness, it is stated, is more than sufficient to resist the action of a ball projected from any kind of firearm. All the experiments tried up to this time have proved entirely successful. The force of the ball is completely broken by the elasticity of the India rubber, and it falls on the ground at the feet of the person against whom it was sent. Some public experiments on a larger scale are soon to be tried, and the army is to be supplied.

Speed of English Railroads.—On the London and Liverpool road, 201 miles, the actual speed, excluding stoppages, is 37½ miles per hour. There are five stoppages; the running time, 5 hours 45 minutes, and the average speed, including stoppages, is 35 miles per hour. On the London and Exeter road, 193¾ miles, the actual speed in motion is 51½ miles per hour; average speed, including stoppages, 43 miles per hour. The actual speed in motion on the London and Southampton road, 80 miles, is 45¾ miles per hour; on the London and Dover road, 88 miles, 48½ miles per hour; on the London and Brighton road, 50½ miles, 40 miles per hour

Variety.

The ship Prince Albert has sailed again in search of Sir John Franklin. She takes out seven carrier pigeons—one of them, (the Lady Ross,) the identical one that is supposed to have been dispatched by Sir John Ross. Should any of these birds find their way either to the States or Britain, they will not again be mistaken, as they are stamped with red solution on each quill of the wing, thus: "W. A. Hodgson, Kennington, Surry." In order, also, that they may be distinguished from a distance, their tails will be dipped in a red solution.

The rock called the Pinnacle, near the Middle Falls of Portage, a rock known to every traveler in the Genesee Valley, was hurled from its place a few days since. This rock hung over the precipice below the second fall, and was 300 feet above the bed of the river. The practice had become common of climbing to the top to look down from its dizzy height, and aid had frequently been necessary to rescue persons who would have fallen off from dizziness; and it was for this reason that it was deemed prudent to dislodge it, which was done by a sand blast.

Speaking of the Great Exhibition, M. Thiers asserts that there can be no dispute as to the high position France holds at the Exhibition, especially in her silk manufactures. He was struck with the fact that France is pre-eminent in all the articles of luxury, which none but the wealthiest can buy; whereas, England excels in the productions usually consumed by the middle and poorer classes. Thus democratic France works for the rich, and aristocratic England works for the poor.

New Era for the "Best Youth's Magazine!"

☞ GREAT REDUCTION OF POSTAGE! ☜

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET

STILL under the editorial charge of Francis C. Woodworth, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, commences a new series with the issue of the number for July, 1851. This number is now ready. Now is the time to subscribe.

The great reduction in postage goes into effect on the first day of July. From and after that day, the postage on a single number of the Cabinet (paid quarterly, in advance) will be, for any distance not over 500 miles, 1 cent; over 500, and not over 1500, 2 cents—it being a reduction to all subscribers within 500 miles from 42 cents to 12 cents per annum, to all other subscribers in the Union a reduction of almost one half from the old rates. The publisher anticipates, as the result of this liberal reduction, a large and immediate addition to his subscription list from every part of the country, as the former high rates of postage have deterred many from receiving the work by mail.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet, in its reading matter, in the number, variety, and beauty of its illustrations, and in its general costume, now stands at the head of all monthly publications for the young. "It is unqualifiedly the best youth's magazine in America."—Brattleboro Democrat. "It is a model for all works of its class. We cannot too warmly commend it."—N. Y. Tribune. "It gives us pleasure to recommend it to our southern friends."—Balt. West. Continent. "Best magazine for youth we have ever seen."—Christ. Adv. & Jour. "It is a little world within itself."—N. Y. Independent. "Best publication of its class that I am acquainted with."—Rev. Dr. Adams.

Each number contains 32 pages, and some 8 or 10 beautiful engravings. The reading matter is just such as is best adapted to amuse, entertain, and instruct the young mind.

☞ Please send on your orders at once. Specimen numbers can be seen at the office of this paper, or they will be forwarded, gratis, on application, (post paid,) to the publisher. Subscribers may send money by mail, at the publisher's risk.

Terms, (invariably in advance,) $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5.

Clergymen, postmasters, editors, and school teachers, who will form clubs of four or more, and who will forward the money, shall be allowed an additional copy for their trouble; or they are authorized to retain 25 per cent. on all new subscriptions, where the full price ($1) is paid.

Bound volumes, (of which there are now 5,) $1 25 each; the whole set, $5 50.

☞ Postage Free!—Subscribers at a distance, who will remit the full price ($1 25 each) shall receive the volumes postage free. These volumes contain nearly 500 pages each.

AGENTS WANTED.

The publisher wishes to employ several gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, Publisher,
118 Nassau-st., New York.

Note.—The publishers or editors of those newspapers to whom this advertisement is sent, MARKED, are requested to give it (not including this note) some half a dozen conspicuous insertions; for which they shall be entitled to receive a copy of the Cabinet, monthly, for two years, on their sending to the address of "Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet" copies of the papers containing the advertisement; or, if preferred, they shall receive one volume of the Cabinet bound in muslin, and a copy of "Woodworth's Stories about Animals," illustrated with 40 engravings. Those who prefer the latter, must signify such preference and inform us how the books are to be sent. D. A. Woodworth.

JEWISH LIFE IN CENTRAL EUROPE.

[Concluded.]

Having followed the Jew through the various phases of his existence, let us now look at him in the last stage preceding and following his departure from life. Let us suppose him attacked by

ILLNESS.

If this becomes serious, an application is made to the minister, the synagogue is opened, the friends of the sick, and others assemble, when prayers, especially the 23d and 119th Psalms, are offered up for the recovery of the invalid, and alms given to the poor. If he recovers, on being able to leave the house, his first walk should be to the synagogue; there, in the presence of ten adult males, he pronounces the following benediction: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who dispenseth mercy even to the guilty, and hast also shown such mercy unto me;" upon which the bystanders respond, "May He who has shown thee such mercy ever continue to grant thee every felicity. Selah." Should, however, the patient become worse, and the danger imminent, it is deemed right to impress him with a sense of his state, and to exhort him to reconcile himself to his Maker. The friends visiting him offer up appropriate prayers on entering the room, and on leaving it say, "O may God send thee a a speedy and perfect cure, and unto all the patients of Israel;" and if in his senses, he is desired to impart once more his paternal blessings to his children. At the same time the "watchers" are sent for. The functions of these individuals begin with the death-struggle of the sick, and cease with the transfer of the corpse into the hearse; from the moment the agonies of death (which these "watchers," from long experience and practice, can discern with great exactness) have commenced, it is held unlawful to put anything to the mouth of, or to interfere in any way with, the dying; and it is the duty of the watchers to prevent any such attempt, which cannot preserve life, but might accelerate death. The oil of life must be consumed; not a single drop must be spilled.

The treatment of the dying and the corpse springs from a mixture of prudential considerations, sanitary measures, feelings of respect for the remnant of an immortal spirit, and of deep awe inspired by the mysteriousness of the metamorphosis just effect. Popular belief has vested the deathbed with singular ideas of sacredness and terror, and all the proceedings concerning the dead flow from one or several of these views. In the popular belief it is not proper to stand at the head or feet of the dying; for the former place is sanctified by the divine glory, (shekinah,) and the latter is occupied by the Angel of Death. This personage is depicted by the superstitious as covered all over with eyes, of an immense wide stride, and with a sword or slaughtering-knife in his hand.

During the agonies, the watchers, together with such of the relatives and friends as wish to join, offer up prayers in an adjoining room, or even in the sick room, in which prayers the dying person, if able, is desired to join. As soon as, according to the experience of the watchers, death is taking place, they ejaculate the scriptural verse, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one." They next cover the face of the deceased without touching the corpse; and after a short interval a feather is laid upon the upper lip beneath the nostrils, and if its delicate fibres do not stir, it is a sign that the breath of life has fled; the bystanders then make a rent in one of their garments, saying aloud the following prayer:—"Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, Righteous Judge. He is the rock; His work is perfect; for all His ways are judgment; a God of truth, and without iniquity; just and right is He. Thy righteousness shall precede thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy reward. Thou shalt lie down in peace until the comforter shall come, the proclaimer of peace." An hour afterwards the following scriptural verses are recited:—"O house of Jacob, come, we will walk in the light of the Lord. The Almighty God, the Lord, hath spoken and proclaimed to the earth, even from the rising of the sun to his setting. Let him enter in peace; may they rest in their places of repose; for dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." Having next recited certain appropriate psalms, the appointed persons lay the corpse on the ground; putting a pillow, or some straw under the head; the hands and feet are then laid in a strait posture, the latter towards the door. The body is next covered with a black cloth, a vessel with water and a towel put in the room, and a lighted candle placed at the head of the dead. During all the time that the corpse is above ground, a watcher never leaves the room which contains the corpse, in order to prevent any improper treatment, or abstraction of any part of the body; for, according to the rabbinical views, the body is due to the dust from whence it was taken. Thit scruple is carried so far, that any of the integral portions of the body, solid or fluid, which may have been seperated from it during the illness, is carefully collected, and committed to the grave together with his body. Rabbinical authority strongly recommends a speedy committal of the body to the grave; and considering the warm climate in which the recommendation was given, the advice was very salutary, and no doubt even prudent in overcrowded Ghettos, where the care for the living must outweigh every other consideration, but may, nevertheless, in its indiscriminate application, be productive of much evil. The preparation for the burial consist in the acts of cleansing and dressing the body. The parties performing these rites offer up a prayer for the occasion, then wash the corpse with tepid water, cleansing at the same time the nails on hands and feet, and next dry it carefully. They then shroud it in white apparel; the white robe and cap and praying scarf described before are now brought into requisition. Thus attired, the eyes, if open, are covered; the lower jaw, if dropping down, is drawn to the upper; the hands are placed in a straight posture, close to the body; and the thumb is within the hollow of the hand, so as to be encompassed by the four fingers. Two small bags filled with sand are placed under the head. Sometimes, however, they are filled with mould brought from the Holy Land. It is especially the pious Jew who is anxious for this rite, so that his dust may at least mingle in death with the dust of his beloved land, after which he yearned all his life. Individuals desirious may see the face of the deceased; and an opportunity is afforded them for begging his meihilah (pardon.) Relatives, friends, and acquaintances, approach singly the feet of the corpse, and, standing opposite the face, lay hold of its toes, begging pardon for any wrong they may have done the deceased while living. They are induced to this step by the opinion that the soul, although incapable of communicating with the survivors, still lingers behind, hovering round its former tenement, and will be willing to concede the pardon asked. The corpse being now deposited in a coffin with its face turned heavenwards, is carried forth to the burial-place. No pomp, no pageant attend the funeral procession, which is formed by those who wish to join it. The rites described are to be performed by strangers, and not by the family. These are not to stay in the room where the corpse lies; and if they have only one room, a partition is to be made between the dead and the living. In the bed on which the deceased lay, nobody is to sleep for the next seven days; and all the water in the house, as well as in all other neighboring Jewish houses on the same side of the street, is poured away. The family are advised to change their linen, and the men to shave, as they would not be allowed to do so during the seven days prescribed for deep mourning, and which does not commence till after the funeral. Whilst the body is being brought out of the house, the women retire to a seperate room, nor do they join in the funeral procession popular superstition assigning as a reason the greater power over the living which would thereby be given to the Angel of Death. However, all male relatives of the deceased are expected to follow to the burial-ground. There arrived, the minister and those present offer up an appropriate prayer. If the deceased should have been a person of merit, a funeral discourse is delivered. The mourners now approach the coffin singly, on the other side of which stands the minister with a knife in his hand. With this he cuts in a peculiar manner into the front parts of their upper garments, enlarging the rent by his hand. This rent the mourner is expected to wear during the next twelvemonth. This done, the corpse is carried forward to the grave, dug in a direction from north to south, and lowered into its last resting place, whilst the bystanders say, "May he come in peace to his appointed place!" The mourners now approach, and every one singly takes up a shovelful of earth and throws it upon the coffin. This example is followed by all the friends of the deceased. On retiring from the grave, they pluck some grass, and say the scriptural verse, "They of the city shall spring forth as the grass of the earth." They next wash their hands, saying, "Death will be destroyed forever, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all the faces, and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off the earth." The recital of some appropriate psalms concludes the funeral service.

Having returned to the house of mourning, the family sit down on the ground and take the meal of mourning, consisting of hard-boiled eggs, generally supplied by some friend. In the afternoon the evening service is performed, at the conclusion of which a particular prayer is generally said by the sons of the deceased. This prayer is repeated by them at the conclusion of every morning and evening service during a whole year. Not less conducive to the rest of the soul is supposed to be the mishnah, (the text of the Talmud,) especially if read in the house of the deceased during the first month, or at least the seven days of mourning. For this reason competent persons are engaged or invited to perform there during the period mentioned the usual morning and evening services, and to study portions of the Talmud. The mourners themselves are, during the first seven days, not allowed to leave their dwelling, and must not sit on chairs, but on hassocks; must not pursue their usual avocations, nor work at their trade. However, they may read suitable religious works, such as Job, or the Lamentations of Jeremiah, &c. The tediousness of this condition is also relieved by the visits and consolations of friends and acquaintances, and by the dainty dishes presented to them by the same parties. These presents are necessary in order to support the mourners, who, as just stated, are, during the first week, debarred from employing themselves in obtaining a livelihood. These visits and presents, moreover, are enjoined by Rabbinical authorities. The visitor, on entering, does not salute the mourners, as is customary on other occasions; nor is he offered a seat by them, but accommodates himself as he likes. On leaving, instead of using any of the phrases customary, he says, "May the Omnipresent comfort you with the other mourners of Zion and Jerusalem!" For this purpose, also, a board is hung up in the room, upon which this sentence is written. On Sabbath, however, the signs of mourning are suppressed; the mourners therefore repair on Sabbath eve to the synagogue, when all the members of the congregation move forward to meet them with the words, "On towards the mourner." The mourners, however, do not occupy their usual seats, but have for the twelvmonth assigned places at the bottom of the synagogue, for that reason called "The Mourners' Bench." At the expiration of the week they are allowed to follow their usual avocations, but the signs of deep mourning, and the burning of the lamp are continued for a whole month; nor are the men allowed to remove their beards before that period. For the rest of the year the mourners must not partake in any rejoicing; no sound of music is in the house, and no place of amusement is visited by them. The anniversary of the death of a parent is each year strictly kept by the family; a lamp is kept burning the whole day; the males do not fail to attend synagogue on that day, in order to offer up a special prayer; and the children of the deceased distribute alms among the poor according to their means. A mourning service for the departed is, moreover, celebrated on every festival in the synagogues during prayer time.

Having thus briefly traced the life of a Jew through all stages, from the cradle to the grave, we must necessarily stop where every earthly pursuit ceases, and now bid the reader a friendly farewell.

THE DEAD.

The dead are every where!
The mountain side, the plain, the wood profound,
All the wide earth, the fertile and the fair,
Is one vast burial-ground!

Within the populous street,
In solitary homes, in places high,
In pleasure-domes, where pomp and luxury meet,
Men bow themselves to die.

The old man at his door,
The unweaned child, murmuring his wordless song,
The bondmen and the free, the rich, the poor,
All—all to death belong!

The sunlight gilds the walls
Of kingly sepulchres enwrought with brass;
And the long shadow of the cypress falls
Athwart the common grass.

The living of gone time
Builded their glorious cities by the sea,
And, awful in their greatness, sat sublime,
As if no change could be.

There was the eloquent tongue;
The poet's heart, the sage's soul was there;
And loving women with their children young,
The faithful and the fair.

They were, but they are not;
Suns rose and set, and earth put on her bloom,
Whilst man, submitting to the common lot,
Went down into the tomb.

And still, amid the wrecks
Of mighty generations passed away,
Earth's honest growth, the fragrant wild flower, decks
The tomb of yesterday.

And in the twilight deep
Go veiled women forth like her who went,
Sisters of Lazarus, to the grave to weep,
To breathe in low lament.

The dead are every where;
Where'er is love, or tenderness, or faith;
Where'er is pleasure, pomp or pride; where'er
Life is, or was, is death.

MADAME IDA PFIEFFER.

My readers may perhaps recollect a short paper inserted a few months ago and entitled, "A lady that has seen the World." It recorded my meeting with a female pilgrim to Jerusalem, who subsequently went round the earth entirely by herself, who, when the paper was written, was on her way home to her native city, Vienna. I had often anxiously desired to meet again so remarkable a fellow-traveler, and by the merest hazard in the world, I chanced, through a newspaper paragraph, to hear that she was at the present moment in London, and immediately obtained her address. As she was at that time lodging at a friend's house some distance from town, a meeting was appointed at his counting house in the city. From Jerusalem to Crutched Friars was certainly a rather abrupt transition, and as I pushed my way through the multifarious obstructions of our crowded streets to the place of rendezvous, I could not help speculating as to what changes had been wrought by the interval of time and travel that had elapsed since our previous meeting.

I reached the house, hurried up two flights of dirty stairs, tapped at the door of an office differing in no respect from the thousand dark and dingy ones in the city. "Come in," was the response; and on entering, in the shadow of the room, and looking strangely out of place in the midst of a heap of legers and daybooks, was, sure enough, the well-remembered face of my old fellow-traveler, who rose and received me with the most lively expression of satisfaction. I too was rejoiced to find no change for the worse in the appearance of my friend after so severe an ordeal as a journey round the world.

I remarked in my previous paper, that there was little in the person or bearing of Madame Pfeiffer (such is the name of our adventurer) to mark her out as the heroine of such a remarkable exploit. Her age may be (for in such cases we may only presume to guess) verging, perhaps, upon fifty; her stature is small, her figure slight, her features plain, her dress homely, and her whole appearance the very reverse of commanding. Her manner is remarkably quiet, not to say even humble; and it is only in conversation with her, when her dark eye kindles into animation over the recital of some passage in her travels, that one perceives an outward manifestation of the courage and enthusiasm that so remarkably distinguish her.

After exchanging our mutual congratulations, the conversation (which was carried on in French, Madame speaking English but imperfectly) naturally turned upon the subject of her recent journey. Reminding her of our original meeting on the shores of Palestine, and of the indifference with which she endured fatigue and hardship on that occasion, I playfully observed, "that I considered she had served her apprenticeship to myself, and that I had always boasted of a pupil who had left her tutor so infinitely behind." She admitted that it was even so, and that her power of bearing privation, tested in that journey, together with the taste for traveling she then acquired, had led her to meditate still more extensive wanderings.

"It was after my journey to Iceland, which followed that into Palestine—"

"Iceland! my dear madame!" I exclaimed with a sudden start. "Why, I had not the slightest notion you had ever visited that country."

"Oh yes, and published a book about it," was her quiet reply; and she immediately resumed, "After this Iceland journey, then, I left Vienna and embarked at Hamburgh for Rio Janeiro, and, after remaining sometime on the coasts of Brazil, penetrated into the interior, visited the savage tribes, and crossing the continent of South America, reached Valparaiso, which, you know, is on the shores of the Pacific Ocean. Thence I crossed over to the Island of Tahita, where during my stay I was upon the most intimate terms with Queen Pomare. Leaving that beautiful spot, I crossed the wide Pacific Ocean to Canton, with which city I was much delighted."

"Of course," I remarked, "you do not mean the interior of the Chinese quarters, into which Europeans are not allowed to penetrate?"

"Indeed I do," was her reply. "I am perhaps the only person who has ever gone through it. I must admit that the attempt was rash, but I could not overcome my curiosity. Madame Gutzlaff, the Missionary's wife, assured me she never ventured to think of such a thing."

"But how did you contrive to accomplish it?" I inquired.

"I hired two native Chinese to show me about," was her reply. "On reaching the prohibited entrance of the city, it occurred to me that if I paid them there they might perhaps go off and leave me. I was obliged therefore to resort to a little stratagem. Making signs that I had no money, but showing an order upon one of the Eglish houses of business, I pointed to the city, and expressing in the same way my desire to go through it to the English quarter, they consented to accompany me through the streets. In I ventured. Such a sight had never been seen in the streets of Canton before. The people gathered round in crowds, the women held up their children as I passed along, the curiosity and amusement of the people were prodigious, and your gracious Queen on the opening of the Exhibition, could hardly be more run after than was my poor insignificant self."

"And were you not horribly afraid?" I inquired.

"Not in the least," was the reply.

"And did you meet with no insult?"

"Not the slightest. Nothing could exceed the civility of the people. After traversing the city, my Chinese guides brought me to the house of the English merchant, who could scarcely believe that I had come off scatheless from so unprecedented an enterprise. Well, from Canton I visited several of the principal ports of China, and thence, touching at Singapore, made my way to Ceylon, where, not satisfied with remaining at Point de Galle, I visited the capital, Kandy. Calcutta was the next point of my journey. I ascended the Ganges on the deck of a bungalow, and far into the interior, examined the antiquities, visited the courts of some of the native princes, by whom I was kindly received, and, satisfied with my survey of India, returned to the coast, embarked for the Persian gulf, and then ascending the Tigris, looked upon Dr. Layard in the midst of his excavations at Nineveh."

Such a narrative of adventure, and from the mouth of a female, might well take away one's breath. I really seemed to be dreaming as I looked upon the frail little body before me, and heard her describe the devious career like this with far less excitement of manner than the mistress of a cockney boarding school would throw into her account of the perils of a journey to Boulogne. "What next?" I inwardly exclaimed, as Madame, renewing her narrative, quietly went on.

"I entered next upon a rather dangerous journey among the countries occupied by the wandering tribes of Kurdistan. Here I more than once fell into the hands of robbers."

"You surely were not alone on this occasion?" I exclaimed.

"Entirely so," she replied; "and to that cause I probably owe my complete immunity from outrage. What could they do? They saw before them a poor unprotected woman, advanced in years and with all she possessed in the world done up in a small bundle. They would stop my horse, gaze upon me with astonishment, ask a few questions, and then suffer me to pass unmolested. On one occasion, being exhausted with thirst, I begged for water from the leathern bottles they carry it about in, and they gave it me immediately."

"Then there are many more Robin Hoods than have ever been commemorated in song; there is honor even among thieves. Human nature is the same in the forest of Sherwood and the wilds of Kurdistan!"

"Well," she resumed, "after I had done with the Kurds, I made my way through Persia and Circassia to the shores of the Black Sea, along which I sailed to Constantinople; thence to Greece, Sicily, and Italy, and so back to my own door at Vienna, after an absence of three years. And now guess, what do you think this journey cost me?"

Having already observed the simple and self-denying habits of my old companion, I was prepared for a rather low estimate, but when I considered the mere distance she had gone over, without allowing her anything to eat, I mentally named a figure, (a sum of several hundreds, which some experience of travel led me to fix upon as the very minimum of her expense. What was my surprise, then, when she declared that she had performed this extensive series of wanderings into the interior of so many countries, where the means of conveyance are almost wanting, for the insignificant sum of a hundred and fifty pounds!

The next time I met Madame was at the hospitable house of a friend. She had been making the most of her short stay in London, had visited the principal objects of interest, and been present at the inauguration of the Glass Palace by her Majesty. She confessed that the vastness of London oppressed her, and it was not one of the slightest instances of her courage and self-reliance, that she boldly sallied forth one morning to make her way on foot from Hackney to Picadilly, with nothing but an address-card, and the merest smattering of English to guide her in her devious course.

The conversation turned upon her present plans. Far from her taste for travel having been satisfied, it seemed only "to have grown by what it fed on," and she was already preparing for a second voyage around the globe. Although scientific research was not to be expected from a solitary woman, yet her travels had not been without fruit, since she had made collections in botany and entomology which formed a valuable addition to the museum of Vienna. The Austrian Government had not merely paid her for these, but had made her a present of a hundred pounds toward the prosecution of her further adventures, while the Professors had given her instructions in the best mode of preserving specimens, and collecting objects of value to science.

Her present views were to go by the Cape to Australia and New Zealand, and thence to Borneo and the islands of the Indian Archipelago. She had already taken her passage, and was to sail during the following week.

Reverting to the manner in which I had re-discovered her, I observed that it was through a New York newspaper, under the head of "What is talked about," stating that she was in that city, after performing the voyage round the world. What was my surprise to learn, then, "that she was never there in all her life," and that the statement was a pure mystification, like so many others in which our trans-atlantic brethren seem to delight. "It was this account," I remarked, "that contained your adventure with a robber, stating moreover that you had valiantly defended yourself, and cut off one or two of your adversary's fingers with a knife, and that, I suppose, is also an invention of the editors."

"On the contrary," she replied, "it is strictly true. I was traveling through the wild interior of Brazil in company with Count ——, who you remember made one of our party to Mar Saba and the Dead Sea. We were attended by a single servant, and having understood that the road was safe, had neglected to provide ourselves with defensive weapons. On passing through a secluded spot, we were suddenly attacked by a powerful Negro armed with a sword. He rushed upon the Count, who being unable to parry the blow, received a severe wound, when I drew forth a clasp knife which I carried about my person, and in the excitement of the moment rushed upon the robber, and cut him desperately in his hands. The servant flew on the robber, the robber attacked the Count, whom I in my turn sought to defend, though drawing down vengeance on myself, but as our adversary was powerful and well-armed, the issue would have been fatal to us all had not some travelers, attracted by our cries, hurried up to the spot, whereupon the Negro took to flight."

"Did you receive no injury in the conflict?" I inquired.

"Far from it, I bore away with me a lasting memento," was the reply, as she then extended her arm, enveloped in a muslin sleeve, and invited me to make an examination of it. As I did so, my hand sunk, with a sickening sensation, into a hollow, midway between the elbow and the shoulder, the token of a deep and ghastly wound, which she will carry with her to the grave.

Reminiscences such as these filled up the remainder of our interview. I was disappointed in my hope of seeing this extraordinary woman again. She has set sail upon her long and perilous enterprise, at a time of life when most persons are only anxious to repose calmly by the fireside for the remainder of their days. Notwithstanding the old proverb concerning "the pitcher and the well," let us earnestly hope that she may return safe and sound to her own home, and add another chapter to the record of her most marvelous experiences.

A WIFE'S LETTER.

The following touching fragment of a Letter from a dying Wife to her Husband, was found by him some months after her death, between the leaves of a religious volume, which she was very fond of perusing. The letter—which was literally dim with tear-marks—was written long before the husband was aware that the grasp of a fatal disease had fastened upon the lovely form of his wife, who died at the early age of nineteen:—

"When this shall reach your eye, dear G——, some day when you are turning over the relics of the past, I shall have passed away forever, and the cold white stone will be keeping its lonely watch over the lips you have so often pressed, and the sod shall be growing green that shall hide forever from your sight the dust of one who has so often nestled close to your warm heart. For many long and sleepless nights, when all beside my thoughts were at rest, I have wrestled with the consciousness of approaching death, until at last it has forced itself upon my mind; and although to you and others it might now seem but the nervous imagination of a girl, yet, dear G——, it is so! Many weary hours have I passed in the endeavor to reconcile myself to leaving you whom I love so well, and this bright world of sunshine and beauty; and hard indeed it is to struggle on silently and alone with the sure conviction that I am about to leave all forever and go down alone into the dark valley! "But I know in whom I have trusted," and leaning upon His arm, "I fear no evil." Don't blame me for keeping all this from you. How could I subject you, of all others, to such sorrow as I feel at parting, when time will so soon make it apparent to you? I could have wished to live, if only to be at your side when your time shall come, and, pillowing your head upon my breast, wipe the death damps from your brow, and usher your departing spirit into its Maker's presence, embalmed in a woman's holiest prayer. But it is not to be so, and I submit. Yours is the privilege of watching through long and dreary nights for the spirit's final flight, and of transferring my sinking head from your breast to my Saviour's bosom! And you shall share my last thought; the last faint pressure of the hand, and the last feeble kiss, shall be yours; and even when flesh and heart shall have failed me, my eye shall rest on yours until glazed by death; and our spirits shall hold one last communion, until, gently fading from my view—the last of earth—you shall mingle with the first bright glimpses of the unfading glories of that better world, where partings are unknown. Well do I know the spot, dear G——, where you will lay me; often have we stood by the place, and as we watched the mellow sunset, as it glanced in quivering flashes through the leaves, and burnished the grassy mounds around us with stripes of burnished gold, each perhaps has thought that some day one of us would come alone, and whichever it might be, your name would be on the stone. But we loved the spot; and I know you'll love it none the less when you see the same quiet sunlight linger and play among the grass that grows over your Mary's grave. I know you'll go often alone there, when I am laid there; and my spirit will be with you then, and whisper among the waving branches, "I am not lost, but gone before!"

EARLY BIBLE DISTRIBUTION.

A singular circumstance is related of early Bible distribution in Louisville. Many years ago, when Louisville was a petty village, consisting of a few houses and two stores, it was a great resort for gamblers and persons of dissipated habits. At this period a Colonel C., a wealthy, but a very wicked man, carried on an extensive mercantile business. On a certain occasion he sent a confidential clerk to the East to lay in a supply of goods, furnishing him with the requisite amount of cash. An unexpected fall in prices left the clerk $300 in hand after all his purchases were made. He did not wish to take it back with him, and was somewhat at a loss to know how to invest it. He was a religious young man, and it occurred to him that Bibles were more wanted than any thing else in Louisville, and he finally resolved to invest it in Bibles, and accordingly sent home three hundred dollars' worth. Colonel C. thought the transaction rather unpromising, as it was an article never called for at his store. Cards he could sell in abundance, but not Bibles. At length, after sleeping, an idea struck him. Gamblers would have cards at any price, and on any terms. Accordingly he made his arrangements; he put up a Bible to every pack of cards, charging $1 50 for the former, and 50 cents for the latter, telling each applicant that he could get no cards without a Bible. In due time the Bibles were all disposed of; but as the gamblers wanted only the cards, they usually presented the Bible to the first boy or girl they met in the street. In this way hundreds of Bibles were distributed in Louisville, and many houses were supplied with the word of God, that never contained one before. This is the first and only instance, perhaps, in which gamblers were made the instruments of circulating the Bible. Great good, we were informed, resulted from this singular proceeding. Louisville is greatly changed since that, not only in size and wealth, but in moral and religious character. Society here is refined and intelligent, and in its moral condition is scarcely excelled by any place of the same population in the West.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The regular monthly meeting for the reception of intelligence respecting the operations of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, was held in New York on the first Monday in July, at Dr. Spring's Chapel.

Mr. Lyons, at Hawaii, Sandwich Islands, in preparing his annual report, speaks of a mortality among the inhabitants of his district that is not counterbalanced by the number of births.

Two Mormons from Salt Lake, an elder and a prophet, have made their appearance in Hawaii. They belong to a company of ten, who have scattered in pairs over the Islands, with the design of converting the in habitants, natives, foreigners, and missionaries, to the Mormon faith. As yet, they have met with no success, the natives being satisfied with the religion they already have.

The church under the care of Mr. Lyons at Hawaii numbers 2,114 members, and during the year 1850 they have given for benevolent purposes $701, of which $337 was for foreign lands, and $364 for the pastor's support.

Mr. Hitchcock, at Molokai, S. I., March 20, speaks of large additions to his church. On one occasion more than 80 united. In proof of the liberality of his people, Mr. H. states, that for several years prior to 1850, they contributed to the Board more than his salary.

Mr. Wilson, under date of March 28, gives a dark picture of African society. He finds that the marriage relation does not there exist. The wife is regarded as a sort of loan or exchange, and her destiny is considered as fully answered if she enriches her husband with a few children. No man can get a wife except he can succeed in enticing her away from some one else. The missionaries have solemnized seven Christian marriages, and with good effect.

In Turkey the influence of the press is beginning to be more perceptible. Mr. Everett, May 14th, says the missionaries have learned that "wherever the books which they have issued can be introduced, there the darkness soon appears to break away."

Mr. Schneider, at Aintab, refers to the progress of evangelical sentiments at Oorfa. "Fourteen persons," he says, "have affixed their signatures to a petition, asking for a vizieral letter to protect them in their rights as Protestants." Another priest is spoken of as having just declared himself a Protestant—an event which produced a profound sensation among the Armenians. Great exertions had been made by them to bring him back. Under date of March 24, Mr. S. speaks of the largest congregation ever gathered at Aintab, of prospects of further additions, and of an unusual agitation among the Armenians.

In Benjamin Constant's eloquent book on religion, it is stated that, when the Tartars conquered the Chinese, they ordered them to shave their heads after the Tartar fashion; but that many of the Chinese preferred death to a compliance with the order, lest their souls, appearing bald before their ancestors, should not be recognized or welcomed by them.

THE GOSPEL AN ANTIDOTE TO SORROW.

In discoursing upon afflictions, a week or two since, we remarked, in substance, that man was as certainly doomed to a life of sorrow in this world as he was to death at last. In the sentence against Adam, as the representative of the human race, the one was as much included as the other. The mercy of God, however, has provided an antidote, so that human life, instead of being a course of unmitigated sorrow, bears witness to the goodness of Him "in whom we live, and move, and have our being." This antidote is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. There is no other that is effectual. It has not yet banished all sorrow from the earth, it is true. But it has given a pledge, in what it has done, of its power to do so; and its disclosures speak of "a good time coming," when "sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

What is called Christian experience need not be appealed to in proof of our position. A simple comparison of human society as exhibited in heathen countries with what obtains in lands enlightened by Divine Revelation, is all that is needed. The facts brought to light by those who have visited the "dark places of the earth," and made the most careful observation of the state of things there, confirm the testimony of Scripture, that they are "full of the habitations of cruelty." At the great annual festival of Juggernaut, when it is reasonable to suppose that the principles of that system of religion are in their highest and most vigorous exercise, what sorrow reigns! What multitudes of poor, crippled, blind, and diseased mortals, that have dragged themselves thither for hundreds of miles, are left to die in sight of the bloody deity, no one stopping to do them any kind offices, no one caring for their groans, no one offering them food or medicine, but with heartless cruelty abandoning them to the dogs and jackals, that in some instances begin to prey upon them before life is extinct! Nor is this an extreme case. For who does not know, that every system of religion among the heathen inculcates, as sacred duties, practices which are productive of naught but sorrow? Among whom is the murder of infants justified? Among whom do we find cruel neglect of aged parents, and even the killing of them, tolerated? Among whom do we find human sacrifices offered to propitiate their bloody deities? Where do we find fornication and polygamy unblushingly upheld? Where do we find theft and fraud in their worst forms? Where do we find the most cruel and oppressive governments, crushing the subjects in continual poverty and wretchedness? Where do we find woman degraded and her sorrows multiplied? All these things we find in heathen lands. How true it is, that "their sorrows are multiplied who hasten after another God."

On the other hand, where do we find kindness to the poor, sympathy with the distressed, kind offices to the sick and dying, children carefully nursed and trained, the aged provided for, and woman elevated to her true position? Where do we find governments modeled upon the principles of humanity, and employing their resources in endowing and fostering such institutions as promote the happiness of the people? Where do we find thrift and prosperity, and society in a continual state of progress, not only as it respects the arts and sciences, but also as it respects the great principles of virtue and human brotherhood? There can be but one answer to these questions. Such things are found only in lands where the Gospel is preached; and their prevalence is just in proportion to the influence of the Gospel over the people at large.

In view of such facts, the folly of the human race in stubbornly persisting to find some other antidote to sorrow, becomes glaring. The unbeliever thinks that he can get beyond the reach of that law which dooms him to a life of sorrow, by some contrivance of his own. He knows the power of riches to move the heart, and he fancies that if he were in possession of them in a sufficient measure, he could buy an exemption from most of the afflictions of life. In open disregard, therefore, of that testimony which assures him that "riches profit not in the day of wrath," and that "he that trusteth in them shall fall," he sets himself to work, with might and main, to possess himself of them. But what does he accomplish? What does he not invariably find? During a life of thirty, forty, fifty, or sixty years, all of which time he is striving for wealth, he suffers untold anxieties, is filled with distressing fears lest his plans should fail, is a prey to a thousand vexations and disappointments; in short, he realizes that, in the act of pursing his object, he is as much subject to "vanity and vexation of spirit" as any other man. During all this time, then, he does not get beyond the reach of the law sentencing the human race to sorrow.

But does he, by this life of hardship, succeed in placing himself at last in a state of exemption from trouble? Does he enjoy happiness a little while before he dies? No; for the sorrows of old age are then ready to pounce upon him. Then the "evil days" come, the years when he says, "I have no pleasure in them." His limbs, the "keepers of the house" in which his soul lodges, begin to tremble; his once strong back bends with weakness; his teeth, the grinders of his food, become few and cease to do their office; the windows of his once flashing eyes are darkened; his slumbers are broken, and he is glad to rise at the voice of the bird; in short, his nights are passed in pain, and his days in wearisomeness and fears, till "the dust returns to the earth as it was." He finds no exemption from sorrow. Being a child of Adam, the curse is upon him; and nothing can take it away at last, or mitigate its operation now, but the Gospel of Christ, and the hopes which it inspires.

"Blessed are they that mourn," said the Saviour when opening to the understanding of his disciples the great principles of his administration, "for they shall be comforted." "Blessed are they that mourn on account of sin," is the amended reading of those who busy themselves in patching up the Word of God here and there. But let us not so restrict it. What our Saviour designed to teach was that the Gospel of the kingdom was a sovereign remedy for the sorrows of Adam's race. He contemplated the world as not only dead in Adam, but as afflicted in him. He contemplated those who were mourning, not only over the depravity of their own hearts, but over the loss of friends, the loss of health, their poverty, their oppressed condition, their lack of all the comforts necessary to render life comfortable, and says, "I am come to comfort all that mourn." Isa. 61: 3. He looked on this world as covered with sorrows. He looked on the heathen nations as steeped in afflictions. He saw in Adam's transgression a fountain which would continue to send forth its streams of trouble, till old things should be done away. He proclaimed his Gospel as a remedy for all this, and has taught us, that when the former things shall have passed away, then "God will wipe all tears from the eyes of his people, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." Rev. 21: 4.

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. In Adam we have sorrow; in Christ we have comfort. In Adam we are tormented with anxieties about the morrow, inquiring with doubtful mind, What shall we eat? what shall we drink? and wherewithal shall we be clothed? In Christ we dismiss all such distressing anxiety, and repose upon the promise which assures us that our wants shall be supplied. In Adam we are living in constant fear of the dangers of life, and of the oppressions of those in power. In Christ we leave it with Him who governs the world, and is able to take care of those who trust in him. In Adam we have sickness and pain; in Christ we have one who "took our infirmities, and bore our sickness." In Adam we have the constant fear of death, and are subject to bondage; in Christ we have the hope of life and immortality, and, in the spirit of adoption, call God our Father. And though we are dead in Adam, we have a life hid with Christ in God; and when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory. Col. 3: 3, 4.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

NUMBER FORTY-ONE.

GLASGOW, June 27th, 1851.

The Metropolitan Sunday Trading Prevention Bill has at length been brought up again, and rejected, in the House of Commons, by a majority of 77 against 42. It had been adjourned from April 30th, and remitted to a Select Committee; and on the 18th inst. Mr. W. Williams moved that the amended bill be committed. He stated, in its support, that 8,000 shops in the Metropolis are open on Sunday. Of nine-tenths of these, he said, the proprietors "were anxious to have them closed" on that day. Accordingly, Mr. Roebuck, in replying, asked, "Well, why didn't they shut them?" This question is pertinent when there is professedly anxiety on the point. Mr. W. J. Fox said that the Bill, if intended to sanctify the Sabbath, should, according to the original law, be directed, not merely against trade, but against work, "and more especially against household and domestic work—the labor of servants, and even of animals. Now, the present Bill said nothing about the thousands of servants, butlers, and grooms, employed on the Sunday." The result is, of course, highly displeasing to the strenuous maintainers of the Sunday. The Editor of the British Banner, (the Rev. Dr. J. Campbell, London,) who, in his Christian Witness, in reference to my pamphlet on the unauthorized change of the day, said he had not "much sympathy with any discussions concerning it," speaking of this discussion in the House of Commons, now says, "We should exceedingly like that the Honorable House would permit the various portions of the church of God in these realms to be heard at their bar by counsel—not Westminster counsel, however, but men who fear God and work righteousness—a half dozen of the leading ministers of the several denominations. But, however little sympathy the Rev. Dr. Campbell may have with discussions on the import of the Fourth Commandment and the authority of the change which the church has made, he might possibly find, if "the Honorable House" should listen to his suggestion, that they were less disposed to blink the consideration of so important an element in the question as whether "counsel" were speaking of the Sabbath at all when they urged the sanctification of the Sunday. We cannot give "the Honorable House" much credit for higher principle than a wish to please either themselves or a majority of the nation; but we confess that, in such an argument, so seriously affecting the fidelity both of "the several denominations" and of their "leading ministers," we fear the Word of God would be less regarded as the standard than the practice of the church, however unauthorized.

At a special meeting of the Shareholders of the Glasgow and Greenock Railway Company, held this week for the purpose of deciding upon a proposed arrangement by which the Caledonian Railway Company would manage the traffic on the Greenock line, Mr. George Blair opposed the arrangement, on the ground that if the Caledonian Company got the management of the Greenock line, they would likely run morning and evening Sunday trains upon it. The resolution to adopt the proposed arrangement was, however, carried; and it is by no means improbable, that the prediction of the Caledonian running Sunday trains on this, as on their own line, will by and by be verified. The Inverness Exchange Reading Room, which was, at the annual meeting recently held, voted to be shut on Sundays, has this month been determined to be reöpened, by a majority of 35 against 16.

The Papal Aggression Bill has passed through the Committee of the House of Commons, without alteration, and will probably pass the third reading this afternoon. The Irish Papal Members have wasted much time to little purpose; but equally in vain have been the efforts of Protestant members to get introduced clauses strengthening the Bill. It may, however, be still improved in the House of Lords. Government, in voting £1,236 for repair of the buildings of the Popish College of Maynooth in Ireland, had very nearly sustained a defeat—the subsidy being granted by the Commons by a majority of 121 against 119.

ALFRED ACADEMY—ANNIVERSARY.

The undersigned, members of a Committee appointed by the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association to attend the Examination and Anniversary Exercises of Alfred Academy, having been in attendance most of the time, are happy to state the high measure of satisfaction which the occasion afforded. The Examination was evidently conducted in a manner well calculated to test the attainments of every student in each class; and the result was most commendable, reflecting honor alike upon the pupils, the teachers, and the institution. The various branches of study which constitute the regular course, were well represented, and not only was every class prepared for the ordeal, but to an extent scarcely to be expected where the number is so large, almost every scholar evinced a familiarity with the studies pursued, which spoke well for the general plan of the Institution, and the studiousness with which it had been pursued. Not the least among the attractions of the occasion were the freedom from embarrassment, and the business, home-like air manifested in the intercourse between the teachers and their pupils. Upon the whole, we regard the performance as a flattering exponent of the grade of talent and moral worth which the Institution attracts. From the most humble beginning, this Institution has gradually risen in the confidence of the public, till its patronage is wide-spread and permanent, and each year still indicates that it is settling deeper into the affection and confidence of those who love the progress of our race in all that ennobles and dignifies humanity. The ability and untiring zeal of its projectors are sure indices of still more commendable attainments, and promise much for the future.

The morning of the Anniversary opened very unfavorably, and the hopes of an immense gathering, which have been so uninterruptedly realized on former occasions, were reluctantly abandoned. The expectation of a comfortable and airy place for the exercises, in the pleasant grove surrounding the Academy, was disappointed, as it had been drenched with rain on the previous night, and on the morning up to the hour of appointment. The only alternative was to occupy the Chapel, which was soon crowded to overflowing, and great numbers still arriving who could not be accommodated. This emergency forcibly impressed the friends of the Institution with the desirableness of the more commodious chapel now in progress of erection.

The exercises opened with enthusiasm, and thus continued until noon, during which time the clouds broke away, and introduced a fine afternoon. After dinner, the exercises were announced to be held in the grove, where commodious seats had been prepared. Music by the Andover Band, (which, by the way, performed well its part,) announced the hour for reässembling. In a few moments a multitude gathered, nearly equaling that of former Anniversaries. Where they came from could scarcely be imagined, but when seated (those who could be) and quiet, they covered an area farther in extent than the strongest voice could reach and be distinctly heard. The orations pronounced by the gentlemen, and the essays read by the ladies, were of a high order, indicating superior talent, mental discipline, and moral sense, and surpassing previous efforts, probably from the fact that the graduating class was much larger than that of any previous year.

The Annual Oration was delivered by Rev. Isaac P. Langworthy, of Chelsea, Mass. The theme was "The Bible a text-book for the Student." The speaker introduced his subject by announcing and illustrating the proposition, that the object of study is mental discipline. The mere acquisition of knowledge does not constitute the object, nor does the ability to demonstrate particular propositions; but the true object of study is attained in the strength of mind to grasp and elucidate great principles, and to perceive truth in science and religion. The Bible, aside from its inspiration, furnishes the key to unlock the mysteries of science the most abstruse and arts the most ennobling. Its chronology lit up a space of five thousand years, left almost a blank in the world's history by all other tables. It penetrates with a certain light, when the misty fables of mythology and uncertain tradition lead only to bewilder. Its geography traverses the rivers and scales the mountains of a large part of the globe. These, the eyes of science, being sound, let us examine the body. Its value to the student as a book of history is above estimation. Its incidents and illustrations are inimitably beautiful. Its characters present models of perfection, both in virtue and vice. Poetry is an essential element of popular education, but its height of perfection must be sought in the rapt utterings of Isaiah, the touching pathos of David, and the lofty strains of Solomon. As a book of oratory, it rivals the choicest selections of Greek and Roman literature. Jurisprudence here culls its choicest gems. The Bible alone has enunciated and enforced that higher law, to which kings and subjects are alike amenable. It alone claims the prerogative to denounce judgment upon faithless governments, and to point out the legitimate sphere of legal enactment. The Bible has furnished designs for the choicest productions of art. The most distinguished artists have purchased their fame by contemplating and embodying in living colors the scenes of sacred writ. The most perfect specimen of the art of ship-building was that majestic bark which rode securely above a submerged world. The eloquent speaker here introduced the testimony of eminent men, both friends and foes of the Bible, all corroborating the propositions under consideration. He then proceeded to a comparison of those nations which have an open and unperverted Bible, with those which have contemned or neglected it, clearly demonstrating that the Bible constitutes the essential element of civilization. Next he compared Bible reading individuals with those who despise its teachings. He closed by an eloquent appeal to the graduating class, urging the duty of studying the Bible. It should not be merely read as a recreation, but should be studied as a practical guide. In this connection, the transcendant worth of the Bible, as a guide to immortality, was brought to view.

After the oration, Prof. Wm. C. Kenyon delivered a most admirable and soul-stirring address to the graduating class, which consisted of the following ladies and gentlemen:

Ladies—S. M. Gilman, of York; S. E. Langworthy, Genesee; E. E. Potter, Alfred; L. M. Graves, Cohocton; S. Dorr, Dansville; M. A. Hatch, Rice; E. Bartholomew, Howard; S. Williams, Alfred.

Gentlemen—Asa M. F. Randolph, Hayfield, Pa.; O. Allen, Milton, Wis.; N. L. Reynolds, Troupsburg; D. J. Petibone, Hartsville; J. H. L. Jones, Alfred; A. R. Cornwell, Alfred; C. R. Burdick, Alfred; Galusha Anderson, North Bergen; G. R. Shaw, Waterloo; R. D. Stevens, Greenwood; L. Allen, New Hudson.

After the address, each member of the class rose and received the diploma of the Institution, (executed in a neat and elegant style,) from the hand of Prof. Kenyon. The course of study prescribed for the graduating class is sufficient to prepare them for the senior class in any of our colleges. A more extensive course is open to those wishing to pursue their studies farther in the Institution.

The exercises, examination, and anniversary, were pronounced, by experienced educators in attendance, to surpass any thing of the kind witnessed elsewhere.

PRESBYTERIAN PUBLICATION BOARD.

The annual report or this institution, presented to the late General Assembly at St. Louis, shows its affairs to be in a remarkable state of prosperity. Total number of Books and Tracts published during the year was 430,300; being an increase of 46,800 copies over the issues of last year. The donations to the colporteur fund, from which the salaries and expenses of colporteurs are paid, are larger by more than fifty per cent. than those of last year—by $17,500. The sales for the year ending 1849, were $29,000; for the year 1850, $42,000; and for the year just closed, $60,000. Total receipts for the year from all sources, $80,987 52.

There have been granted to needy ministers, 1,136 volumes; feeble churches 734 volumes; Sabbath Schools 1,301 volumes; Hospitals and other Humane Institutions 171 volumes; Literary and Theological Institutions 243 volumes; Ships of War and Military Stations 222 volumes; individuals for gratuitous distribution 717 volumes, in addition to 250,000 pages of tracts. Donations have also been made through the Board of Foreign Missions, of Books and Tracts to the amount of $500, and by colporteurs of 5,525 volumes and 528,154 pages of tracts.

The whole number of colporteurs employed in the course of the year has been 125. Their fields of labor have occupied 24 States. The following are the aggregates of their labors. Time spent, thirty years, four months and sixteen days; families visited, 50,890; conversed or prayed with, 22,151; families found destitute of the Bible, 1,898; Presbyterian families visited, without the confession of faith, 2,237; volumes sold by colporteurs, 58,492; volumes granted by colporteurs, 5,525; pages of tracts granted by colporteurs, 528,154.

BIBLIOTHECA SACRA AND BIBLICAL REPOSITORY.—The July number of this able quarterly is before us, and from a hasty glance at its principal articles we judge that it will abundantly repay a thorough perusal. It contains articles—on Conscience, by Dr. Cheever—on the Relation of Style to Thought, by Prof. Shedd—on the Hegelian Assaults upon the Four Gospels, by Dr. Stowe—on Syriac Philology, by Rev. B. Davies—Translations from Anselm, by Dr. Maginnis—on Imputed and Involuntary Sin, by Prof. Park.

N. Y. INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND.

The examination and closing exercises for the year of the New York Institution for the Blind, took place last week. The graduating class was larger than in any former year. There are several classes in the Institution, who have been under instruction from one to seven years. The number of blind persons connected with the Institution, according to a statement in the N. Y. Tribune, is about 150. Of these, 105 are pupils under instruction, the remainder being employed in various capacities. In the Manufacturing Department, which constitutes an important feature, between 30 and 40 are constantly engaged in mat-making, weaving, willow-work, paper-box-work, and the fabrication of fancy articles.

The pupils now pursuing a course of instruction, are divided into five classes, according to their attainments. The first and second of these attend school in the afternoon. The remainder of the time is occupied in the workshops, and in receiving lessons in music. School commences at 7½ A. M., and continues to 10½ o'clock. Vocal music occupies the remainder of the time till noon. In the afternoon, the exercises are resumed at 1½ o'clock, and continued until 4½. A half hour before school each morning is devoted to reading the newspapers, with which the Institution is liberally supplied; and an hour in the evening is taken up with other reading.

The terms of admission are such that any blind person of good moral character may be admitted to work in the Manufacturing Department, and those received into the Institution as beneficiaries of the State are taken in by virtue of a certificate properly drawn. Applicants for admission as State pupils from New York or New Jersey, must be between the ages of 8 and 25 years. The charge for paying pupils, exclusive of clothing, is $130 per annum.

WITHDRAWAL OF FELLOWSHIP.—Several weeks ago we published the proceedings of a Council called by the Tabernacle Baptist Church in this city to advise whether it should receive to membership certain individuals who had been excluded from the 1st Baptist Church—a question to which the Council gave an affirmative answer, in accordance with which the Tabernacle Church has acted. Another step in the case has been taken by the 1st Baptist Church, in the adoption of a resolution "withdrawing Christian fellowship from the Tabernacle Baptist Church for receiving into fellowship N. C. Platt, J. M. Bruce, Jr., and Joseph Durbrow, individuals justly excluded from this church." This course is justified in a long article signed by the pastor, clerk, and deacons of the 1st Baptist Church, and published in the N. Y. Weekly Chronicle.

EDUCATION IN NEW YORK.—The Annual Report of the Board of Education of the City and County of New York for the year 1850–51, shows the gratifying fact that the average attendance upon the schools under the care of the Board has increased eleven per cent. There are 207 schools within the jurisdiction of the Board, and the scholars in attendance during the year ending Feb. 1, 1851, were 40,055, against 35,998 the previous year. The cost per scholar for 240 days' instruction was $5 86. The Free Academy is represented as prospering, and as bidding fair to surpass the hopes of those friends of popular education who urged its establishment and have promoted its advancement.

CENTRAL COLLEGE AND THE LEGISLATURE.—The Legislature of New York has had under consideration a bill appropriating $5,000 each to the Rochester and Genesee Colleges, $1,000 each to five Medical Colleges, and $17,000 to the other Colleges of the State, except Union and Columbia, according to the number of students in each. A motion to except from the operation of the Bill the Central College at McGrawville, gave rise to numerous lengthy speeches, in which it was set forth that the Central College held very strange and dangerous notions about admitting males and females, blacks and whites, to the same privileges. The motion was lost, however, and the bill adopted.

POPULATION OF GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.—On the 31st day of March, a complete census of Great Britain was taken. It appears that the whole population is 20,919,531, of which 10,187,687 are males, and 10,734,844 are females, an excess of the latter of 550,157, equal to 2.6 per cent. of the whole. The population of England and Wales is 17,905,831, and of Scotland 2,870,784. The population of the United States is 23,347,884, being 2,428,353 more than that of Great Britain. The increase in ten years in the United States was 6,283,196, or 36.8 per cent.; that of Great Britain was 2,263,550, or 12 per cent. The population of London is 2,363,741.

A TOBACCO COMMITTEE.—The following preamble and resolution were passed at a Convention of Congregational Ministers recently held in Boston, and Rev. George Trask of Fitchburg, Rev. John Pierpont of Medway, and Rev. Leonard Woods, D.D., of Andover, were appointed to act as the Investigating and subsequently Reporting Committee therein mentioned:—

"Believing the use of Tobacco, as a personal luxury, whether in the form of smoking, snuffing, or chewing, to be an injurious habit, uncleanly, unhealthy, and expensive; and fearing that the use of this pernicious article is rapidly increasing in many sections of our land, particularly among the young: Therefore,

Resolved, That this Convention raise a Committee, composed of a suitable number, which Committee shall collect statistics relating to the sale and use, to the pecuniary and moral bearings of this narcotic weed, and report to this body at some future meeting what action should be taken in the premises."

THE CLERGY AND THE SLAVE QUESTION.—At a late meeting of the General Association of Congregational Ministers in Connecticut—150 clergymen being in attendance—the following resolutions were adopted nearly unanimously:—

Resolved, 1. That to God, as the Supreme Lawgiver, our unconditional obedience is due; and that no law, contrary to His will, is binding upon us. 2. That human government is ordained of God, and is designed to be the expression of His will, and therefore, as a general rule, binds the conscience of the citizen to obedience. 3. That, in those cases where, through human ignorance or wickedness, the law of man conflicts with the law of God, the latter is to be obeyed; and that each individual must decide for himself whether or not there is such a conflict, his own conscience being the supreme and final arbiter.

The General Association of Massachusetts, at Wrentham, subsequently adopted the same resolutions, with a substitution in the last resolution, for the words "his own conscience being the supreme and final arbiter," the words "on his own responsibility to God and to human Government."

PEONS AND FREE NEGROES IN NEW MEXICO.—James S. Calhoun, Governor of New Mexico, has recently delivered to the Legislative Assembly a Message in which are set forth his views of almost all public measures. In relation to peons, he suggests the importance of having laws to define, distinctly, their obligations to the masters, and the obligations of the masters to them. Relative to Free Negroes he uses the following language:—

"Free negroes are regarded as nuisances in every State and Territory in the Union, and where they are tolerated society is most degraded. I trust the Legislature will pass a law that will prevent their entrance into this Territory. The disgusting degradation to which society is subjected by their presence is obvious to all, and demands a prohibitory act of the severest character."

THE UNIVERSITY OF ROCHESTER.—The first Anniversary of this young institution was held last week. From statements made on the occasion it appears to be in a flourishing condition. The Literary and Theological Departments have an endownent of nearly $200,000, and the number of students during the last term was 144. There were 13 graduates from the collegiate department, and 6 from the theological. Henry Ward Beecher delivered the Address, and Park Benjamin the Poem. Doctorates were conferred on several individuals, including one of D. D. on Rev. Wm. Dean, Baptist Missionary at Hong Kong.

BROWN UNIVERSITY.—Fourth-day of last week was Commencement Day at Brown University. The graduating class numbered 32, and upon all the members of it the degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred in course. Eleven A.M.s, two LL.D.s, one D.D., and one B.P., were also made on the occasion. The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on his Excellency, Geronimo Urmeneto, of Santiago, Minister of Finance of the Republic of Chili. Pray what has Monsieur Geronimo Urmeneto de Santiago done to entitle him to such an "honor?"

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.—This body closed its extra session at Albany on the 10th inst. More than five hundred Acts were passed during its brief sitting, some of them very important; among which may be mentioned the acts to provide for the completion of the Erie Canal Enlargement and of the Genesee Valley and Black River Canals—to divide the State into Congressional Districts—to abolish all tolls on the Railroads of the State—to amend the Code of Procedure—to make Appropriations for the coming year—to establish an Asylum for Idiots—to prevent Gambling, &c.

BIBLES PRINTED "BY AUTHORITY."—A late return to the British Parliament, shows the following aggregate of Bibles and Testaments printed "by authority" during the last two or three years:—

"The Queen's printers printed from the 1st of January, 1848, to the 31st of December last, 1,157,500 Bibles and 752,000 Testaments. The drawback of paper duty received was in the same period 7,723*l*, 8*s*. 10*d*. At Oxford University Press, in 1848, 261,500 Bibles and 262,000 Testaments were printed. In 1859, 308,500 Bibles and 253,500 Testaments; whilst in 1850 there were 305,750 Bibles and 285,000 Testaments. At Cambridge, in the three years, the number was 138,000 Bibles and 204,000 Testaments."

COLORED SCHOOLS IN ILLINOIS.—The American Baptist has a list of nine schools in Illinois, with 212 scholars, of which it says:—

"These schools are supported solely by the parents and guardians who send to them—a certain sum per month being paid for each scholar; the amount of course depending on the wages of the teacher. They are kept up, however, only a few months in the year, for want of means. The colored people bear this burden, in addition to the regular school-tax, which they are compelled to pay in common with others."

METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.—The sales of the Methodist Book Concern last year amounted to over $200,215, being an increase of $68.367 upon the $131,847 sold the previous year. The net profits are $42,162, which is 22 per cent. upon the sales. The sales were 22 per cent. upon the capital stock of $616,506; and the net profits are 67 per cent. on the capital. The stock at lawful interest in New York, 7 per cent., would yield $43,848; but that would not circulate the good books, which far outweighs the loss of $1,687.

DANIEL WEBSTER AND THE PRESIDENT.—Rumors were rife, last week, that Daniel Webster had resigned his place in the Cabinet, and was about to take a European tour for the benefit of his health. Later dispatches say that he has not resigned, and is not likely to

General Intelligence.

European News.

The steamship Franklin arrived at New York on the 14th inst., bringing London and Paris dates to July 2d.

The U. S. Mail steamer Pacific made a splendid passage outward, having left New York on the 21st ult., and passed Holyhead at 1 o'clock, P. M., on the 1st inst.—nine days twenty-one and a half hours, difference of time included.

On the 30th ult., there was a serious riot between the Police of Liverpool and the soldiers of the 91st Regiment. It seems that on a previous night the police had arrested several soldiers for misconduct. This aroused the indignation of their comrades, a number of whom, on the night in question, sallied out from a public house, and commenced an indiscriminate assault upon every policeman they could find. Clubs and side arms were freely used, and several persons were seriously injured. Twenty-nine of the rioters, mostly soldiers, were arrested.

In Parliament, nothing of note has transpired. An animated discussion was had on the 1st in the Commons, when the Marquis of Blandford moved an address praying Her Majesty, with reference to the spiritual destitution existing in England and Wales, to adopt measures for affording more efficient relief to the spiritual wants of the people, and for extending the parochial system by help drawn from the resources of the Established Church. After some plain talk, pro and con, the motion was withdrawn.

From France there is nothing worth mentioning.

A letter from Berne announces the death of Count de Mulinen, formerly Minister of Wurtemburg at Paris, which was caused by an unfortunate accident on the 21st ult. It appears that M. de Mulinen, returning late in the evening to the house in which he lived near Thoune, mistook the road, and fell over a precipice.

State of Things in Italy.

Recent letters from Italy represent that serious trouble is at hand. Many individuals occupying high offices have been threatened with personal violence; and one, Signor Evangelisti, the Chief of the Consulta at Rome, has been assassinated. The "riot" (so called) which took place at Florence, on the 29th of May, proves to have been a very significant and sanguinary affair. A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune gives the particulars, from which we learn that it occurred at a "mass" celebrated in honor of those who fell in the battle of Montenara, in 1848, between Radetzky and the Tuscans—this being the only form of commemoration which the government would allow. It was in the church of Santa Croce, an immense assemblage being present, estimated at 5,000 persons.

"When the mass was terminated, a young man placed a bouquet of flowers on the altar. A policeman, in plain clothes, (many were scattered among the crowd,) struck him to the ground senseless, with a blow upon the head, upon which a citizen standing by struck down the hired ruffian. The signal was instantly given by the police agents in disguise, and a body of carbineers, who had till now been concealed in the sacristy, came out, their muskets having been previously loaded with ball, and discharged a volley into the dense crowd—composed in great part of women and children. They re-loaded and fired a second volley—and probably would have fired a third, but the unarmed people nearest to these assassins rushed upon them and struggled with them for their weapons. One carbineer was killed—two are not expected to recover. In the mean time, the Croats who had been concealed without, near the spot, rushed in at the chief entrance and the church was cleared at the point of the bayonet. In this, many victims were sacrificed; one lady was killed by a bayonet; many more were trampled down. The public indignation can be better imagined than described, and it was with the greatest difficulty that the people could be restrained from breaking out into open revolt. The popular leaders, however, appeased the people with the assurance that, 'very, very soon, all measures would be ready for revenging their murdered comrades—till then, one more effort of patience!'"

The Independent has the following additional facts:—

"The young man who was first knocked down, received a blow from a heavy bludgeon in the hands of a policeman, and the policeman is dead. Among the victims suffocated in the crowd was a woman and her child, both dead. The city of Florence presents a sad spectacle—the streets nearly deserted—a stillness like that of the tomb—strong patrols of cavalry and infantry parading the streets night and day—the government and the priests, aware that they have filled the cup to overflowing, tremble at every shadow. The Pope has made an attempt to escape from Rome, and has been stopped by the French, this being his fourth attempt. The French are beginning to see the weakness of their position at Rome, menaced on one side by Austria, and on the other by King Bomba, and on the inside both by the Pope and the population. They are strengthening their garrison, and taking possession not only of all the strong positions in and around the city, but of the available outposts on all the roads leading to the capital."

A Penitent Lawyer.—Samuel S. Martin, Esq., of Chicago, was Attorney for Crawford E. Smith, of Missouri, in the arrest of Moses Johnson, as a fugitive slave. He has lately published a card in the Chicago papers, expressing his "regret and mortification" for the course he has pursued. He says that the course was repugnant with his feelings, and he only engaged in it at the earnest solicitation of Mr. Smith, who was an old acquaintance; and he has "dearly paid for doing what his conscience told him he should not do. The sleepless nights and agony of mind of his wife and children may tell that better than words." In conclusion, he says that he feels that his experience in this case "will not be lost on his future conduct, and he trusts he will hereafter in his actions not go counter to the advice and entreaties of his wife and friends, and his own better judgment.

SUMMARY.

A friend of ours from the interior of the State called to see us yesterday, (says the St. Louis Times,) and gave us the pleasing information that he had made the trip from New York to St. Louis in four days and seventeen hours. He came up on the New York and Erie Railroad to Dunkirk, from whence he took the steamer to Cleveland, thence to Cincinnati, and thence by steamer to this city. The regular time from New York to Cincinnati is forty hours. When our eastern line of railway is completed to Cincinnati, we shall go to New York in less than three days.

A fortnight ago, (says the Cayuga New Era,) the wheat crop in this country promised most favorably, and every one confidently predicted an extraordinary yield. But during the past week the aspect of things has materially changed. The weevil have made their appearance, and in some towns, both north and south, have committed serious ravages. In several instances we have seen fields fairly white from the effects of this pest of the farmer, and the ears completely filled with larva.

A Brooklyn paper tells a story of a Mr. Robinson, of Flatbush, L. I., who has two dogs, the one a small spaniel and the other a large half-breed deer-hound. The small dog was playing with Mr. R.'s child near a cistern, when the child fell, head foremost, into the water; the agonized mother, who, from a window, witnessed the occurrence, saw the spaniel run to the kennel of the hound, who instantly ran to the spot, and, before the mother could reach the child, the noble animal had placed it in safety.

Last week, says the Bridgeton Pioneer, a party went on an excursion to the Breakwater for the purpose of catching blackfish. While engaged in this sport they caught a large female shark, measuring nine feet and four inches in length, and supposed to weigh near 400 pounds. Upon arriving at the wharf they dissected the monster of the deep, and found within her stomach a quantity of bones and a man's lace boot. Three of the bones were in a perfect state of preservation, and were pronounced to be the ribs of a human being.

The Eaton (O.) Register says that a sad accident occurred at West Elkton on a recent Saturday (Sabbath.) Mr. Wheeler and his lady were looking through a new steam mill, just put in operation. In passing near a pair of horizontal spur wheels, Mrs. Wheeler's clothes were caught and herself drawn through between the wheels, cutting both her legs off near the body. She was so dreadfully mangled, that after three hours of agony her eyes were closed in death.

Advices from Texas to the 5th inst., represent that a terrible storm recently prevailed on the coast for several days, in which the steamships Mexico, Cortland, and William Penn, lying in Metagorda Bay, were driven ashore. The steamer Maria Burt, which left Galveston on the 24th ult., encountered the same gale and was totally lost. Many houses in Texas were blown down, and the young cotton crop is partially destroyed.

The Wilmington (O.) Republican of the 4th inst. says:—Our farmers are now getting into the midst of Wheat harvest; and we are gratified to learn that the grain is fine this year. Although the crop was somewhat injured in the spring by frost, and consequently not so good as last year, there is yet more than an average crop. Corn, Oats, and Grass, also look very fine and promising in the most parts of our county.

The Texas (La Grange) Monument of June 18, says: "Several slaves of this county had made arrangements to run away from their masters and go to Mexico. They were to have started on Monday night last, but one of Col. Moore's negroes, thinking he would take an early start, left on Sunday. He was pursued, and when taken confessed the whole plan. He stated that they were prepared to force their way."

Recently a gentleman residing near Oquawka, named Thompson, was killed by one of his neighbors named Nichols, who was in search of a panther. Thompson was "still hunting," and being perceived stealthily crawling through some brushwood, was mistaken by Nichols for the object of his search. Nichols fired, and his ball took too certain effect, lodging in the neck of Thompson, and killing him instantly.

The trial of the Railroad conspirators is yet progressing in the Michigan State Courts. This is probably the most extensive conspiracy, and shows the most heartless depravity of those who are guilty, of any thing that has ever been developed in the United States. The plans of the conspirators, as shadowed forth by the testimony, are astounding—almost beyond belief, and seem to belong to the department of fiction rather than of reality.

The Holy Office at Rome, in its last decree, issued June 10, prohibits Cahagnet's work published in this country, under the title of "Celestial Telegraph," Le Magnétiseur Spiritualiste; a periodical published at Paris, Cahagnet's Guide de Magnétiseur; Burdach's Great Treatise of Physiology, in the Italian translation, &c., &c.

John London, a notorious counterfeiter from Virginia, was arrested a few days since on board a steamer en route for Texas. On the officers approaching he resisted them and drew a bowie knife. They, however, shot at him, and finally secured him. He is now on his way to Virginia. When arrested he had his family with him, and also $10,000 in good money.

The Kenton (O.) Republican regrets to learn that the weevil has made its appearance among the wheat in some localities in that county, but the grain being very forward not much injury is anticipated. Aside from the injury sustained by the weevil the prospect is very encouraging indeed.

The Springfield Post says that there are living in the town of Luburgh, Mass., at the present time, forty-eight persons who were living when the Declaration of Independence was made. Several of them are over 90 years of age. The entire population of the town is but 1,300.

Lieut. Wm. D. Porter, of the Navy, has an interesting communication in the Intelligencer, in which he undertakes to show that all the phenomena of change in the ocean line of sea-coast and appearance of the rocks above the water, which have been observed and commented on from time to time, are caused by the constant diminution of the water of the ocean; and that a pressure is at all times going on by which the substance held in solution in the ocean waters are converted into solids.

A man of color named Thomas Scott Johnson, a seaman on board the British brig Commerce of Windsor, N. S., was recently seized as a slave in Virginia. The vessel was bound to Alexandria, but got ashore on Wreck Island, and there he was seized. His mother lives in New Bedford, and he refers to well-known citizens there who know him.

The Board of Health of Cincinnati report 206 deaths in the city during the past week, of which 19 were from cholera, and 124 were children under five years of age. We have received very unfavorable reports of the health of towns throughout that country.

An explosion recently took place in one of the Black Heath Coal Mines in Chesterfield county, Va., killing three persons—two white men and one black. At 7 o'clock, one of the overseers was on the edge of the same pit, preparing to descend, when another explosion took place, blowing out the shaft and killing the unfortunate man.

Clergymen's Sore Throat,

BY DR. W. W. HALL, New York, who devotes his whole attention to the treatment of the three diseases, Throat-ail, an affection of the top of the windpipe; Bronchitis, of the branches of the windpipe; Consumption, of the lungs themselves, which are little air cells, from the size of a pea down, at the ends of the branches of the windpipe, as leaves are at the ends of the branches of a tree. How do persons get Throat-ail, Bronchitis, and Consumption? How may this last be certainly distinguished from the others, and in its very earliest stages, when alone a cure is to be hoped for. Cutting out the Tonsils and Palate not necessary, and sometimes dangerous, always hurtful for life. Cod-Liver Oil, Nitrate of Silver alone, not efficient, often injurious. In Consumption, patent contrivances, braces, and supporters, absurd and mischievous. Secret and even known medicines long continued, shorten life. Pure air, pure water, appropriate nutriment, external means, these only reliable.

Are sea voyages, coast situations, going from home or to the South, desirable? Tables of Food, time of digestion, ease of do., per cent. of Nutriment, of Carbon, of Nitrogen; adapted to common readers. Price 50 cents full bound; 25 cents in paper; 5 cents in pamphlet form, only describing these ailments—in postage stamps to those at a distance. J. S. REDFIELD,

The Ladies' Wreath.

PROSPECTUS OF THE SIXTH VOLUME.—The May number commenced Vol. VI. of this popular Magazine; and the Publishers confidently assert, that the forthcoming volume will rival, in the beauty and elegance of its Embellishments, and the Literary Merit of its contents, any former volume, or any Dollar Magazine in the World! Each number will contain one or more fine Steel Engravings, and a beautifully colored Flower Plate. It will be printed on Fine White Paper, with Large, Clear-Faced Type. The best Writers in the country have been engaged to enrich its pages, and no pains will be spared to make it what it assumes to be—a Model Magazine.

The Editorial Department will be conducted by Helen Irving, a lady justly celebrated for her refined taste and extensive literary acquirements; besides occasional gems from the pen of Mrs. S. T. Martyn, the late Editress, under whose control the work has secured its present high standard of literature and moral excellence, and a circulation unparalleled by any similar work. The present Editress will be sustained by a list of Contributors not excelled by any periodical in the country; many of them are among the most popular writers of the day.

The Musical Department, under the control of an eminent Professor, will be enriched by Original Pieces from some of the ablest Composers.

Particular Notice!—Postage Reduced!—On and after the 1st of July, the Postage on the "Wreath," within 500 miles of the office of publication, will be one cent per number; and any distance over 500 and within 1,500 miles, two cents—if paid quarterly in advance.

Terms.—The subscription price of the "Ladies' Wreath" is One Dollar a year—invariably in advance. Best Terms to Clubs.—We offer to Clubs the following low terms, which are very near the cost: Four copies for one year, to be sent to one address, $3; Eight do. do. $6; Fourteen do. do. $10; Twenty do. do. $14. Any person wishing to get up a Club, will be supplied with a Specimen Number by writing for it, and paying the postage. Bound Volumes are always on hand, and will be exchanged for numbers in good order, by paying the price of Binding. Back Numbers can always be supplied.

☞ One Hundred Efficient Agents Wanted, to canvass all parts of the country. To men of energy, furnishing testimonials of character, liberal encouragement will be given. Postmasters are authorized to act as Agents. Address, J. M. FLETCHER & CO., Publishers and Proprietors,

Miscellaneous.

A New Printing Press.

The proprietors of the New York Reformer, published at Watertown, have introduced into their office a new printing press, invented and patented by Mr. Jason L. Burdick, of Utica. This press is the first of the kind yet built, and is thus described by the editor of the Reformer:—

"Its principal advantages over any other press in use are, that it prints both sides of the sheet at once, and secures a perfect register, and is, therefore, well adapted to either book or newspaper work. It will print with the utmost ease from five hundred to six hundred sheets per hour, which is equivalent to ten or twelve hundred impressions on the ordinary power presses; and it is presumed by the inventor, that after a little use the average speed will be 1,000 sheets, or 2,000 impressions per hour.

"The press has two beds and two cylinders, one directly over the other. The sheet is fed in at one end of the machine, where it is secured by very ingeniously coutrived steel clips; it then passes under one cylinder, receives an impression on one side, passes on and up under the upper cylinder, receives an impression on the other side, and is delivered a foot or so above the place where it was taken in.

"Presses have before been invented to print both sides of a sheet at once; but the difficulty encountered was, not to speak teachnically, that the side printed first, the ink having no time to set and dry, soon inked and smutted the tympan to such an extent that it would off-set on the sheet and so blacken it in a short time as to obliterate the impression. This difficulty is obviated in Burdick's press by a moveable absorbing blanket of cotton fabric between the upper cylinder and the printed side of the sheet, which, while the second impression is being taken, is pressed down upon the side already printed, and absorbs, like a blotter, any superfluous ink that may attach to that side of the paper. By two dogs and cog-wheels, with a sort of reel attached for the purpose, this blanket before the next sheet comes through is moved slightly forward, (about one-sixteenth of an inch,) by reeling it from one roller to another, sufficiently to bring the next impression from the printed side of the sheet upon a clean spot in the blanket. Two or three yards of cotton cloth will serve as a blotter in this manner to print an edition of two or three thousand, when it can be washed and used again; or, a piece of some 30 yards can be put on at once, and will last a year or so. There are some other distinctive characteristics about the press which are difficult to describe, though they betoken much ingenuity on the part of the inventor."

Census Statistics.

In our State it appears there are 472,151 dwellings, accommodating 3,097,095 persons, making an average of a little more than six persons to a house—not a great degree of crowding. Nevertheless, there are 94,808 families more than there are houses. Of course the great proportion of these are in large cities, where the poor are compelled by excessive rents to pack themselves into the narrowest space. In Maryland there are 81,708 dwellings to 583,035 persons, or a little more than seven to each house. There are, however, only 5,676 families more than there are houses, which gives proportionately only about a third as many cases in which there is more than one family in a habitation. The population of Maine is but 53 more than that of Maryland, while the number of families is 16,403 more. A Maine family, on the average, consists of 5.63 persons. It would then appear that more of the hardy farmers and seamen of that State contract marriages, and that they are less prolific than the people of Maryland, or even of New York. In Maine the average of persons to a habitation is a fraction above six, or about the same as in New York.

In New York State 46,651 deaths occurred during the year ending July 1, 1850. This is, in round numbers, one to every 66 persons. In Md. there were 9,594 deaths, or one to every 60. In Maine there were 7,245, or one to every 77 persons. New York is thus more healthy than Maryland, and Maine ahead of both. But in point of long life, New Mexico seems to carry off the palm.

In New York there are 170,698 farms under cultivation, or one to each 12.22 persons. In Maryland there are 21,860 farms, or one to 26.71 persons. In Maine there are 46,760, or one to every 10.33 persons. In this respect again, the new State is ahead of the two old ones.

In New York the number of manufacturing establishments, whose yearly product exceeds $500, is 23,985, or one to each 129 persons. In Maryland there are 3,863, or one to 150 persons. In Maine 3,682, or one to 158 persons.

The number of slaves in Maryland is 90,368, or 873 more than ten years ago, in 1840. In 1810 there were 111,502, in 1820, 107,398, in 1830, 102,294. During the year previous to taking this census there ran away from that State 215 slaves, and 135 were manumitted. The number of free persons of color according to the present census is 74,077; in 1840 it was 62,020, making an increase of near 20 per cent. In Delaware there are now 2,289 slaves; in 1840 there were 316 more than that number. On the other hand, the free population of color has increased 1,038 above its number in 1840, which was 16,919. In Maryland there were more runaways than manumitted during the year; but in Delaware there were 174 of the latter to 19 of the former. In Maryland one slave run away out of every 420; in Delaware one to each 120; in Maryland one was manumitted to every 669; in Delaware one to every 13. In Virginia there are 473,026 slaves; and in the year there ran away 89, or one to 5,314; and 211 were manumitted, or one to every 1,942. This difference arises no doubt from the difference in the facilities of escape from the several States.

The number of colored persons in New York is, in round figures, 48,000, of whom 23,000 are males, and 25,000 females; in 1840 the number was 50,000, of whom 24,000 were males and 26,000 females. The decrease has thus been about equal in the two sexes.

It is worthy of notice that in Maine, New York, and Maryland, the number of white males considerably exceeds that of the females. In New York the excess is 40,000, in Maine 11,000, and in Maryland 4,000. The excess is thus proportionally largest in Maine. This, we suppose, is to be attributed to the large number of the daughters of that State employed elsewhere in factories, or as school-mistresses, possibly also to superior beauty, health, generosity of heart, and household thrift, which have induced bachelors of other States to resort thither in search of wives.

The Prairie Dog.

The following is from the Providence Journal, written by a member of the Mexican Boundary Commission, is the best of many accounts we have read of the prairie dog:

The prairie dog, so called, deserves a better name, as it has no trait common to dogs, nor does it in the least resemble them. Its looks and habits are different, and it feeds wholly on grass. This is one of the most interesting animals met with on the prairies. The first colony of these little creatures we met was near Brady's Creek, a branch of the Colorado of the East. This was the largest we met, and I have never heard of one so extensive. For three days we traveled through the colony, during which time we did not lose sight of them. On either side, as far as we could see over the plain, their habitations extended, the hillocks they had raised with the earth brought up from below the surface of the ground. The habitations were usually about two rods apart, and from the beaten track between some of them, there was probably a family connection. In other cases there was nothing to denote an intimacy. Occasionally was seen a hillock much larger than the rest, containing two cart-loads of earth. These had two entrances to them, whence it might be inferred, that the family might be larger than usual. We suppose this vast collection of "prairie dogs" to extend from 60 to 70 miles, as we traveled at that time upward of 20 miles a day.

For the greater part of the distance where this colony extended the country was very flat, and covered with short grass (kept so by these animals feeding on it,) and by musquit trees. Rivers did not stop the colony, for several streams passed through it, but it extended on both sides. In one instance I noticed a colony of these animals on the summit of a range of hills where the country was exceedingly barren, and the herbage so scant that there seemed hardly subsistence enough even for them. It was evident that the colony was not in a flourishing condition, as many of the habitations seemed deserted.

Of the habits of these animals, I can say little from observation, as we could not stop long enough to watch them. I would have been glad to have taken a position in or near a tree for a day for the sole purpose of studying their habits, for I have no satisfactory account of them. Major Long, in his expedition to the Rocky Mountains, is one of the earliest writers who describes them. He says they pass the winter in a lethargic state. But other travelers deny this, and say they come out from their holes during the winter whenever it is warm. I saw them on some pretty cold days in Novamber, and think there are few days when they do not come from their holes. In the plains far to the North, where the snow lies on the ground for weeks, and where the cold is severe, they doubtless become torpid—for they could find nothing to feed on, even should they venture from their habitations.

The color of the prairie dog is a light brownish yellow. Its size varies from that of a large grey squirrel to a Northern woodchuck. Its tail is bushy like a squirrel's, but only about half its length. It stands erect like a squirrel with its tail in constant motion, and its movements altogether resemble those of that animal more than any other. It makes a noise more resembling the chirping of a bird than the barking of a dog, and this is kept up whenever any one approaches. As we drew near their habitations, we noticed a general scampering among them, each running to his hillock. They would then stand erect at the entrance of their holes, with their heads just peeping above, when they would keep up an incessant chirping, and frisking of their tails until we passed. I found it difficult to shoot one, and think more than a dozen shots were fired before we secured one. I must believe that more were killed, but as they stood at the entrance of their holes, they doubtless fell in when they were shot, as I noticed blood about them in several instances. Two that I obtained were too much injured to be preserved as specimens.

The prairie dog is said to be good food—but at the time we killed those referred to, our provisions were plenty, and no one could be tempted to try them,—subsequently, when we got on short allowance, we should not have hesitated to eat them, but we had then got beyond their colonies. There is one peculiarity in their habits, which deserves to be noticed. It is their drink. How and where do they obtain it? They generally select the most arid spots for their abodes, and I have seen a colony of them fifteen miles from the nearest water. Some persons suppose them to burrow so deep that they find water, others that they do not drink at all. I am inclined to believe that they want but little water, and this they obtain from the heavy dew on the grass.

Rabbits often burrow with the prairie dogs—or what is more probable, they occupy habitations made by the latter. The habits of a rabbit generally lead them to places where shrubs and bushes abound, and not to a bare plain with nothing but dwarfish musquit trees. I think, therefore, that the rabits I have seen are merely some wanderers strayed away from their more natural places, which finding comfortable quarters provided by the prairie dog without the labor of burrowing themselves, drive away the weaker animals and monopolize their dwellings.

A small brown owl also resides with the prairie dog. I saw this bird several times toward evening, standing on the little hillocks, just emerging from its underground habitation. From the known habits of the owl, one of which is its fondness for ground mice, moles, and other small quadrupeds, it doubtless seeks the quarters of the prairie dogs to feed on the young, although one would suppose this animal to have sufficient strength to drive from its habitation so diminutive a bird as this owl. I never saw any but the small owl alluded to in these colonies.

Besides the rabbit and owl, which dwell with these animals, there is another creature which is always found among them, this is the rattle-snake. I had often heard that such was the case, but I believed it accidental, until I witnessed the fact in several instances. On one occasion I saw several of these revolting reptiles enter a single hole in the very midst of a dog town. No one can believe that there is any friendship between two animals of such different natures, but that the rattlesnake takes up his abode among the prairie dogs, for the sole purpose of living on them. They cannot drive the snake away, and are compelled to give him quiet possession of any habitation he may select, and let him feed upon the junior members of their fraternity.

Romance and Tragedy.

Many of our readers will remember, (says the Springfield Republican,) a series of articles, entitled, "Three Weeks on a Cotton Plantation," which appeared in our columns a twelvemonth since, or more. In one of those articles, the romantic history of the planter, whose hospitality the writer so gratefully recalled, was briefly given. He landed at Natchez, a boy. He had come down the Ohio and Mississippi on a flat-boat, with his father and his father's partner. There the father died and was buried, and there the boy was left by the heartless partner, without a picayune. Naturally shrewd, he soon picked up business—sold tickets for the theater, did errands, peddled knick-knacks, &c., until he grew up to a proper size for larger operations. He then become the owner of a dray, then of a small plantation near Natchez, then of an immensely large plantation at Milliken's Bend, above Vicksburgh. Here he went into speculations, and before the crash of '37 supposed himself to be worth a quarter of a million.

Hitherto, his fortunes had waxed. He was independent. He then, for the first time, returned to Cincinnati, and sought out his mother and sisters, whom he left behind long years before. He found his family, who supposed him dead, in poverty, and provided for them, and then came the reverses. The wife of his youth had borne him three beautiful children. These, one after another, died, and then the wife was laid in the grave. An interval elapsed, of pecuniary prosperity, but of intense grief, when he was blessed with the hand of one of the most beautiful and lovely of womenkind. Then came the commercial crisis of '37. His active energy parried, in some degree, the force of the blow, and he was enabled to retain and add to his beautiful plantation.

Years passed on, and another family of beautiful children had grown up around him, to whom, and their beautiful mother, he was attached with almost fanatical idolatry. Two years ago last August, his home was the abode of plenty and the largest hospitality. Immediately after, his favorite child sickened and died. A month or two after his house was burned. A few weeks more, and a long-pending law-suit, originating in his efforts to retain his property, and pay his debts, was decided against him, and his plantation was put under the hammer of the auctioneer, and the broken-spirited man moved to Vicksburg. Here another child died.

With the remnant of his large possessions, he purchased the beautiful steamer Mohawk, and run her in the Vicksburgh and New Orleans trade, acting as captain himself. The following dispatch was subsequently received by the northern papers:—

"Louisville, December 17th.—Capt. Cobb, of the steamer Mohawk, blew out his brains yesterday, at Vicksburg. Cause—pecuniary troubles, and the death of his wife."

Another dispatch from Nashville, of the same date, stated that that morning the steamer Mohawk sunk, with two thousand bales of cotton on board, while lying at that city! Two poor, weeping, terror-stricken children are all that remain of the whole family. What dream of fiction ever equalled a tragedy like this?

A True Heroine.

The New York Sunday Times notices a young, intelligent and interesting woman, residing within sixty miles of New York, who has, with the assistance of an aged and infirm father, saved twenty-one lives within the last fifteen years. The following particulars are given:—

"Kate Moore is the daughter of Captain Moore, who keeps the light-house on Fairweather Island, situated midway between the harbors of Black Rock and Bridgport, Conn. The island contains five acres of land, and is about half a mile from the shore. Many disasters, it is known, have occurred to vessels driven round Montauk Point in a storm, and sometimes in the Sound homeward bound; and this lady's ear is so accurate, that it is said she can distinguish the shrieks of the drowning mariner, and direct her boat in the darkest night. She can trim a boat and manage it as well as any man, and seems to make up in tact what she lacks in strength, and never refuses to turn out in the darkest night, to the relief of the sufferers. Our informant adds that she is a highly accomplished and literary lady, and perfectly feminine in her manners, and that, although she occasionally visits New York, and other places in that vicinity, and has a large and most respectable acquaintance, many of whom knew of these facts, they have never come to the knowledge of the public before. The late lamented Major Noah, who was remarkable for collecting the most interesting facts, by some means become acquainted with them. We also understand that Captain Moore and his worthy helpmate have resided upon the island over twenty years, and brought up a family of five children, upon a salary of three hundred dollars a year, all of whom have an excellent education, and that they entertain a great many persons who visit the island with true, old fashioned hospitality."

A CURIOUS FACT.—"I met," says Atkinson, "with a curious instance lately, of a fact in regard to the force of our absorbing power. A friend's gardener having taken a few pinches of flour of sulphur to sprinkle over a plant, found, although his hands were cleansed immediately, that the subtle influence of the sulphur had penetrated his system, and come out again from his body, and through his clothes, so that the money in his pocket, and other metal about him became tarnished. Other substances will produce similar effects. I know a lady who could not touch the brass knobs of her door for some weeks, from their producing pain and partly paralyzing the arm; and of another lady who was variously affected by the approach of different metals. Medicines rubbed on her skin would produce precisely the same effect as if she had swallowed them. I know a whole family who are disagreeably affected by the near approach of iron."

Keeping Fowls.

At a late agricultural discussion in this city, says the Albany Cultivator, Mr. Chester Moses, of Skeneateles, made some valuable remarks on poultry keeping. He stated that for several years past he had kept 600 to 700 fowls, and the last winter kept 900. His chief object is eggs, of which his fowls average about 100 each annually. They are not confined, but are allowed to range at will. Their food is principally wheat screenings, with some corn, buckwheat, and animal offal. He is also particular to allow them plenty of oyster shells, pounded, of which, during, or at the season when they lay most, they eat in large quantities. The lime in the oyster shells doubtless contributes to the formation of the shell of the egg, and perhaps assists, also, in the digestion of the food.

He keeps the Polish or top-knot fowls, and the common country stock—prefers the former on account of their laying more steadily the first year, or two years—thinks there is not much difference in the black and spangled varieties of top-knots. His general practice is not to keep fowls after the second year. As they do not lay so well after that age, they are regularly sold off, and the stock is kept up chiefly by purchase, though some chickens are raised; and it only for the latter object that cocks are kept, Mr. M. being satisfied that they are no benefit in the production of eggs for the market.

Mr. Moses considers the manure of his fowls of much importance, and takes care that it is all saved and applied to his crops. Under the building in which the fowls roost, is a cellar, into which all the manure is put. In spring, a few weeks before planting time, the manure is worked over and mixed with plaster—sometimes with plaster and ashes in equal proportions—using enough of these articles to make the manure so dry as to pulverize thoroughly.

The domestic guano, of which Mr. M. sometimes has the quantity of 300 bushels in a season, produces a powerful effect on the growth of Indian corn. His mode of applying it is, to drop a handful in each hill, which is then covered half an inch or more with earth, in order to prevent the seed from coming in immediate contact with the manure, which experience has shown would prevent its germination. Mr. M. stated that he had tried this compost in comparison with good hog manure, by applying each to corn in the same field and on similar soil. On one part, half a shovel full of hog manure was put on a hill, and on the other part a handful of the hen manure compost. The crop was best where the latter was used, and the succeeding crop, (which was oats,) showed the same result in favor of the hen manure.

Cultivating Pearls.

Pearls are deposited by the interior part of shell-fish, which may be made to deposit this in the form of drops or globules, instead of spreading it naturally over the inner surface of the shell. This art of causing the pearl oyster to deposit its secretion in this way, has long been known to the Chinese, who have practiced it with great success and very considerable profit, producing by its means pearls of good size. The celebrated Linnæus discovered the method of effecting this, and is said to have disposed of the knowledge to some of the pearl-dealers for a considerable sum. Almost every species of bivalve shell-fish secretes this matter more or less plentifully. The unio of our fresh-water streams, or common fresh-water clams, often produces very pretty pearls.

The great secret of making these creatures deposit pearls, is to disturb the natural process, by placing a small piece of pearl next to the shell and the mantle or membrane that covers the body. This forms a nucleus, and is made to increase by the deposit of pearly matter over it.

The Encyclopædia Britannica gives the following as the method of producing pearls:—"The shell is to be opened with great care, to avoid injuring the animal, and a small portion of the internal surface of the shell is scraped off. In its place is inserted a spherical piece of mother-of-pearl, about the size of a small shot or grain. This serves as a nucleus, on which is deposited the pearly fluid, and which in time forms a pearl."

CONFESSIONS OF A SLAVE-CATCHER.—The infamous creature, John Caphart, gave the following testimony on cross examination in the Hayden case:—

"It was part of my business to arrest slaves and free persons of color, who were collected in crowds at night, and lock them up. It was also part of my business to take them before the Mayor. I did this without any warrant, and at my own discretion. Next day they were examined and punished. The punishment is flogging. I am one of the men who og them. They get not exceeding thirty-nine lashes. I am paid fifty cents for each negro I flog. The price used to be 62½ cents. I am paid fifty cents for each negro I arrest, and fifty cents more if I flog him. I have flogged HUNDREDS. I am often employed by private persons to pursue fugitive slaves. I have been thus employed since 1836. I never refuse a good job of that kind. Sometimes they turn out bad jobs, but never if I can help it. All that I ever arrested as fugitives were decided to be such, except those Portuguese the counsel read about in the other trial."

State of things at Rome.

We take the following from the Roman correspondence of London Daily News. The date is June 20:

The past week has been eventful. It opened very lugubriously by the assassination of Signor Marco Evangelesti, on the evening of Sunday, the 15th inst., an event which has created an immense sensation in Rome. Signor Evangelisti held the office of Chancellor of the Sagra Consulta Tribunal, and was high in favor with the papal government on account of the strong re-actionary principles he entertained, and the unrelenting severity with which he prosecuted the liberals. He was proceeding alone and on foot on the evening in question to pay a visit at the house of Signor Massina, at a quarter to ten o'clock, and had entered a street named La Paddacchia, near the Piazza di San Marco, when a man of short stature, dressed in a frock coat, white trousers, and straw hat, passed him, and walked on until a dozen paces in advance, when he suddenly turned round and ran furiously back at Signor Evangelisti, who, although a tall, powerful man, not more than forty years of age, could not resist the suddenness of the attack, but received a violent poignard wound in the abdomen, which brought him to the ground, his assailant falling over him in the struggle. Both however, rose again immediately, and his assassin took to flight pursued by Signor Evangelisti, who shouted al ladro! al ladro! without obtaining aid, until, finding himself growing faint he stopped at the French barracks in the Jesuit's convent, where he was placed in a chair, while a carriage could be procured to convey him home. He was of opinion that his wound was only slight, as he felt scarcely any pain, but the surgeon presaged differently and more correctly. After a few hours, dangerous symptoms manifested themselves, and he expired on Tuesday morning, without having been able to leave any clue that might have led to the detection of his murderer, who besides being of low stature, held his head purposely down at the moment of the onslaught, so that his features might not be seen. That the murder was not the work of a robber is very evident, but it is not clear whether it is to be attributed to a political motive, or merely to the revenge of some one of the many victims of Signor Evangelisti's unsparing system of persecution.

A Chinese Map of the World.

In knowledge of geography the Chinese have been, till recently, sadly deficient. Malcom describes a map of the world which he obtained there, as follows:—

"It is two feet wide by three and a half high, and is almost covered with China! In the left hand corner, at the top, is a sea, three inches square, in which are delineated, as small islands, Europe, England, France, Holland, Portugal, and Africa. Holland is as large as all the rest, and Africa is not so large as the end of one's little finger! The northern frontier is Russia, very large. The left corner at the bottom is occupied by 'the western ocean,' as it is called, containing the Malay peninsula, pretty well defined. Along the bottom are Camboja, Cochin-Chiua, &c., represented as moderate-sized islands; and on the right is Formosa, larger than all the rest put together. Various other countries are shown as small islands. I should have given an engraving of this curious map, but that a true reduction to the size of a page would have left out most of these countries altogether! The surrounding ocean is represented in huge waves, with smooth passages, or highways, branching off to different countries, or islands, as they represent them. They suppose that ships which keep along the highways go safely; but if they, through ignorance, or stress of weather, diverge, they soon get among these awful billows, and are lost!"

THE WOMEN OF SAVOY.—A letter of Horace Greeley, giving some account of his journey from Lyons to Turin, says:—

"I think I saw quite as many women as men at work in the fields throughout Savoy. A girl of fourteen driving a yoke of oxen attached to a cart, walking barefoot beside the team and plying the goadstick, while a boy of her own age lay at length in the cart, is one of my liveliest recollections of Savoyard ways. Nut-brown, unbonneted women, hoeing corn with an implement between an adze and a pick-axe, (and not a bad implement, either, for so rugged an unplowed soil,) women driving hogs, cows, &c., to or from market, we encountered at every town. So much hard, rough work and exposure is fatal to every trace of beauty, and I do not remember to have seen a women in Savoy even moderately good-looking, while many were absolutely revolting. That this is not Nature's fault is proved by the general aspect of the children, who, though swarthy, have often good forms and features."

The old Greeks observed a beautiful festival, called "The Welcome of the Swallows." When these social birds first returned in the springtime, children went about in procession, with music and garlands; receiving presents at every door where they stopped to sing a welcome to the swallows, in that graceful old language, so melodious even in its ruins, that the listener feels as if the brilliant azure of Grecian skies, the breezy motion of their olive groves, and the gush of their silvery fountains, had all passed into a monument of liquid and harmonious sounds.

The Rev. Mr. Choules says: "I wish that we could create a general passion for gardening and horticulture. We want more beauty about our homes; more to attach us to our homes. The scenes of our childhood are the memories of our future years. Let our dwellings be beautiful with plants and flowers. Flowers are the playthings of childhood and the ornaments of the grave; they raise smiling looks to men and grateful ones to God."

New Era for the "Best Youth's Magazine!"

☞ GREAT REDUCTION OF POSTAGE! ☜

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET,

STILL under the editorial charge of FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, commences a new series with the issue of the number for July, 1851. This number is now ready. Now is the time to subscribe.

The great reduction in postage goes into effect on the first day of July. From and after that day, the postage on a single number of the Cabinet (paid quarterly, in advance) will be, for any distance not over 500 miles, 1 cent; over 500, and not over 1500, 2 cents —it being a reduction to all subscribers within 500 miles from 42 cents to 12 cents per annum, to all other subscribers in the Union a reduction of almost one half from the old rates. The publisher anticipates, as the result of this liberal reduction, a large and immediate addition to his subscription list from every part of the country, as the former high rates of postage have deterred many from receiving the work by mail.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet, in its reading matter, in the number, variety, and beauty of its illustrations, and in its general costume, now stands at the head of all monthly publications for the young. "It is unqualifiedly the best youth's magazine in America."—Brattleboro Democrat. "It is a model for all works of its class. We cannot too warmly commend it."—N. Y. Tribune. "It gives us pleasure to recommend it to our southern friends."—Balt. West. Continent. "Best magazine for youth we have ever seen."—Christ. Adv. & Jour. "It is a little world within itself."—N. Y. Independent. "Best publication of its class that I am acquainted with."—Rev. Dr. Adams.

Each number contains 32 pages, and some 8 or 10 beautiful engravings. The reading matter is just such as is best adapted to amuse, entertain, and instruct the young mind.

☞ Please send on your orders at once. Specimen numbers can be seen at the office of this paper, or they will be forwarded, gratis, on application, (post paid,) to the publisher. Subscribers may send money by mail, at the publisher's risk.

Terms, (invariably in advance,) $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5.

Clergymen, postmasters, editors, and school teachers, who will form clubs of four or more, and who will forward the money, shall be allowed an additional copy for their trouble; or they are authorized to retain 25 per cent. on all new subscriptions, where the full price ($1) is paid.

Bound volumes, (of which there are now 5,) $1 25 each; the whole set, $5 50.

☞ Postage Free!—Subscribers at a distance, who will remit the full price ($1 25 each) shall receive the volumes postage free. These volumes contain nearly 500 pages each.

AGENTS WANTED.

The publisher wishes to employ several gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, Publisher.
118 Nassau-st., New York.

NOTE.—The publishers or editors of those newspapers to whom this advertisement is sent, MARKED, are requested to give it (not including this note) some half a dozen conspicuous insertions; for which they shall be entitled to receive a copy of the Cabinet, monthly, for two years, on their sending to the address of "Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet" copies of the papers containing the advertisement; or, if preferred, they shall receive one volume of the Cabinet bound in muslin, and a copy of "Woodworth's Stories about Animals," illustrated with 40 engravings. Those who prefer the latter, must signify such preference and inform us how the books are to be sent. D. A. WOODWORTH.

SABBATH SCHOOLS & BIBLE CLASSES.

A Report prepared by J. M. Allen, adopted by the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, and published at its request.

In all ages of the church, there has been some method more or less extensively adopted for giving religious instruction to the young. This instruction has partaken of the character of the church and the state of society at the time of its being given. Under the Jewish dispensation, it was given by proverbs, stories, and rites, adapted to explain and enforce their religious institutions. In the early ages of the Christian church, the catechumenical schools were established for the purpose of instructing proselytes and the children of Christians. The Romish Church sedulously taught the young to count the rosary, make the cross, and sprinkle holy water. Since the dawn of the Reformation, the various Protestant denominations that have sprung up have labored to instil their principles into the minds of the young. A great variety of catechisms, containing summaries of creeds, and books of a similar nature, have been produced for giving denominational and biblical instruction. Parochial Schools were early established by the Presbyterians of Scotland, for the purpose of instructing their children in the elementary principles of knowledge, and in the Bible and Catechisms. Various other plans have been adopted by different denominations.

Between the years 1740 and 1747, a Sabbath School was established by Ludwig Hœcker, at Ephrata, Lancaster Co., Pennsylvania, and patronized by the Seventh-day Baptists of that place. It continued in successful operation until interrupted by the revolutionary war.

Robert Raikes, of Gloucester, England, is honored as the founder of Sunday Schools, from which has sprung the present Sunday School System. He commenced his first school in 1781. His chief object in organizing these schools was to collect children of the poor, and give them instruction in reading and writing, uniting therewith moral and religious instruction. A similar school was established in Beverly, Massachusetts, in 1810, by two young ladies. Sunday schools soon spread throughout different parts of the country. As they were extended to children of all classes, they assumed more and more the character of schools organized for the express purpose of studying the Bible, becoming in many cases, no more nor less than Bible Classes.

In 1817, the "New York Sabbath School Union" was formed. During the same year, similar Unions were formed at Albany, Baltimore, Boston, and Philadelphia. In 1824, the Philadelphia Union was enlarged into the American Sunday School Union. It immediately began to publish books suitable for Sunday Schools and Libraries. This Union is composed of persons belonging to various denominations, and its Constitution prohibits publishing any thing doctrinal, unless held in common. There are other societies, mostly denominational, whose object is the support of Sunday Schools.

By these various societies, and by individual effort, religious light and knowledge is being diffused throughout all portions of the country. By similar means, used by all Protestant denominations in other countries, youthful hearts are receiving rays of Bible light, wherever the Gospel has found its way. Thousands of teachers are weekly instructing the rising generation in the truths of the Bible. Thousands of religious books are being scattered like the leaves of Autumn. Thousands of colporteurs are running to and fro, dropping sparks of light into the youthful mind, which shall kindle and radiate long after the present generation have passed away.

From the above statements it will be perceived that Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes are kindred institutions, having the same object in view, with similar methods for obtaining that object. From this oneness of aim, and the ready blending of the two, it is very easy and appropriate to consider them in the same connection, under the same head, applying the same thoughts to both. We would, therefore, present them jointly for your favorable consideration, suggesting their object—their adaptation to that object—for whom organized—methods of conducting them—and our responsibilities.

There was a time when man did not need systems and associations for the purpose of moral and religious instruction; he was taught directly from heaven. Sitting enthroned amid the immutable principles of right, his every act bore the impress of holiness. Joy and peace poured constant streams into his soul. But, aiming at things forbidden, he lost his innocence, and hurled himself into the pool of guilt and sin. The impress of holiness disappeared; the effects of sin followed. God was displeased, and sent fire, water, famine, war, and pestilence, as the avengers of his broken law. Yet, in the midst of wrath, He remembers mercy; and a portion of the human family is set apart to be the medium for transmitting the will of Heaven to man. Holy men arise, act their part, deliver their message, and then disappear. At length the Saviour of the world comes, and proves himself, as foretold, the Son of God. He sends forth his apostles to forward and perfect his plans. A record of their deeds and teachings is made; and, preserved by the watchful care of Heaven, it is handed down to us as the Magna Charta of our happiness—as a lamp hung out from heaven to guide our wandering feet thitherward. This is the Christian's Bible. It is the object of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes to give instruction in this Bible—to awaken the latent moral susceptibilities of our nature—to sow the first seeds of virtue and religion—to create a taste for biblical knowledge.

Instruction, to accomplish these ends, should be natural—should conform to the great models given in nature and revelation—should be adapted to the nature and wants of the recipients—the young, the inexperienced, the susceptible, and the ignorant. Natural and revealed religion are in harmony with each other, and both in perfect harmony with the wants and capacities of man. Both are emanations from the same Divine mind, in harmony with Divine ideas, and directed in their unfoldings by Divine laws. Man, created in the image of Deity, with abilities capable of adaptation to his varied relations, finds himself happily correlated to these two revelations. They present truths—wondrous truths—scattered in natural order, and rich profusion—truths adapted to every stage of man's existence, and to every degree of development in his constantly unfolding faculties. The budding powers of childhood; the expanding intellect of youth; the quick, energetic, comprehensive grasp of manhood; the withering, decaying perceptions of old age—all find here suitablle instruction. The Bible, moreover, stepping from this common platform, takes a higher stand, more plainly revealing those truths that are but dimly shadowed forth by the light of nature. Leaving the physical and intellectual capacities of man, it unfolds to him his moral nature, reveals to him the realities of an unseen world, makes known to him his relations to his fellow man and to his God, and the responsibilities growing out of these relations. It is a book suited to all the circumstances of life. The joyous find here delights ever new—the mourner finds a balm that heals his wounded spirit—the doubting, a sun that dispels the mists of unbelief—the wanderer, a polar star that leads ever onward to the right—the penitent, the crushed sinner, finds here a magnet, that ever points to Calvary, to the Cross, to Him that hung, bled, and died thereon—the dying finds the Bible a guide, that points across the Jordan of death directly up to the celestial city.

The method by which Deity has manifested himself to us in natural and revealed religion, is peculiar and characteristic. In nature we find a continuous variety, well calculated to call out all of our varied powers and susceptibilities. Here we see utility, there beauty; on the one hand we behold quietness and repose, on the other life and activity; now we meet the minute and unimportant, and anon the grand and the sublime attract our attention, each blending with the other, and thus producing, like the kaleidoscope, an infinite variety of beautiful and delightful changes. Such manifestations raise emotions of joy, love, reverence, gratitude—indeed, all of the emotions of our better natures. No individual, with perfectly-constituted and rightly-developed intellect, can remain impassive to the manifestations of nature. Turn to the Bible. We find its great truths unfolded in the same manner. History, biography, travels, incidents, natural and supernatural, abstract truths, great moral principles, prophetic revelations of the future, are mingled in grateful variety. 'The fruits of the spirit—love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance'—find here food appropriately prepared and arranged for their culture and development.

Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes, if pre-eminently calculated to accomplish the object for which they were designed, must conform, in their constitutions and modes of operation, to the great models given in revelation. They do thus conform. Indeed, their naturalness, simplicity, and adaptedness of method, is a strong a priori argument in their favor. The time, the manner, those participating—all add interest and effect. The time is the Sabbath, when all of the religious exercises and influences of that day conspire to make a hallowed impression. The method is free from many of the restraints that are thrown around the more labored and systematic exercises of the sanctuary. It is a free and easy investigation of the Scriptures, in the same order as presented to us by Divine wisdom, accompanied with colloquial discussions of the various points of interest. Hence, in almost every lesson, there is a passage considered, a remark made, a thought or suggestion elicited, that is adapted to the various circumstances and conditions of all present. The simple and abstruse, the practical and theoretical, all are presented harmoniously blended. Food for the hungering soul, living water for the thirsty, rebuke for the froward, consolation for the desponding, light for the ignorant, counsel for the young and inexperienced, warning for the impenitent, are presented. This is done in those little collections of parents and children, brothers and sisters, relatives and friends, where truth is imparted in an open, frank, unostentatious manner, and the hearts of the recipients are not barred against the introduction of truth, nor prejudices aroused, or feelings excited, as in more formal attacks by those occupying official stations in the church. The instructions of the Sabbath School are next to the instructions of the family circle in simplicity and naturalness. In both cases, truth steals into the heart almost unawares, and the habits are surely though slowly molded in harmony with it.

The primary design of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes is to give instruction to the young. Any system having this object in view, should be of deep interest to every Christian heart. The young are to be the future repositories of everything great and good existing at the present time. To them are to be left politics, science, and religion. On their shoulders are to rest the destinies of nations. The great questions of reform that now agitate the world, are to be passed into their hands. The praying, the preaching, the anxious watching, the rejoicing and weeping in Zion, are soon to be performed by those who are, or who should be, in our Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. The question whether the flag of the Redeemer's kingdom shall be unfurled to the view of every nation, kindred, and tongue, floating triumphant and free in every breeze, or left to trail in the dust, "will soon be for them" to determine. The varied duties of friend, parent, citizen, ruler, patriot, philanthropist, counselor, and Christian, are soon to rest upon those whose intellects are just budding with life.

It is for those who are now engaged in the strife of the Christian warfare to say, whether these buddings of intellect shall be nipped and destroyed by the simoon blasts of sin, or yield a golden harvest of virtue and truth. It depends upon them, in a great measure, to say what place their children shall assume in society, what part they shall take in reforms and religion, what shall be their lot in eternity. It is believed, that if Christian parents would but perform to their children the whole duty that is [illegible]equired of them by their religion, most if not all of their children would be converted in early life, and none, or scarcely any, would die the aged impenitent's death. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it," is Scripture testimony upon this point, of the most encouraging nature to those parents who are tremblingly and prayerfully training up their children in all the ways of right—"in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Parents, and all that have anything to do with the training of the rising generation, or that ought to have something to do with that matter, are bound to use all the means within their reach as assistance in the discharge of their responsible duties.

Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes are powerful auxiliaries in restraining, guiding, expanding, and exalting the youthful mind. They are a kind of connecting link between the family circle and the sanctuary—an adjunct of both—where the joint wisdom of parents and teachers is employed in preparing children, collected from family groups, to enter upon the varied duties of life—the high and holy duties of the church of God. Such combination and concentration of effort on the part of parents give each influence and power over all. This influence can be used as an efficient agent in giving a right impulse and direction to the youthful mind. The instinctive, outgushing desires of the young for knowledge, can here receive a response from those imparting instruction, and be directed to moral and religious subjects. Thus a taste for such knowledge may be early formed—a desire for truth may be implanted—aspirations for a holy life may be early awakened. A direction may thus be given to the youthful mind, which will render its future course a source of pleasure to itself, and a blessing to the world. Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes, though primarily designed for the young, furnish opportunities for the aged and the middle-aged to use their various attainments. Many, whose minds are rich in biblical knowledge, religious experience, and holy affection, do not make that use of these treasures which they might. Circumstances not seeming imperiously to demand their action, they suffer their powers to remain in a dormant state; their light is under a bushel. Not feeling themselves particularly called upon to preach, they content themselves without making any direct effort to instruct others. In the Sabbath School and Bible Classe, there is scope for the treasured knowledge, the searching interrogation, the apt reply, the outgushings of an overflowing heart, of those far advanced in the Christian life; and those whose acquisitions have not been so extensive, can turn an honest purpose and a warm heart to a good account. The varied talents of such, whether great or small, can be wrought into one harmonious whole, for the mutual edification and instruction of all concerned. Here, too, females can act. Woman, from the customs of society and the delicacy of her own feelings and nature, is forbidden the more public thoroughfares of usefulness. But here she is permitted to step forward, and the natural adaptedness of her powers for training the youthful mind, and the transfusing nature of her piety, has rendered essential service in the cause. It is not necessary that all should be teachers in order to accomplish this. They can enter the list as scholars, especially in Bible Classes, receive as well as impart instruction, and encourage by their presence, counsels, coöperation, and approving smiles, the younger members. There is not only an opportunity to improve upon the talents, the knowledge already possessed, but other talents, other knowledge, will be acquired. Exercise gives strength—repetition gives aptness—imparting of knowledge makes it the more possessed—study and conversation give light and power—in moral as in intellectual natures. Thus all, whether teachers or pupils, may have their knowledge increased, their powers expanded, and their virtuous principles strengthened.

From whatever point we take our view, the Sabbath School and Bible Class present themselves as auxiliaries in a Christian education. They form a common field where the old and young may meet—a place for the ignorant—a place for the wise—a place for the learner—a place for him who wishes to instruct—a place for ardent, whole-souled Christians, who wish to do good.

STRIFE AND PEACE.

BY CAROLINE A. BRIGGS.

"The battle of our life is brief,
The alarm—the struggle—the relief;
Then sleep we, side by side." [Longfellow.

Yes, I shall sleep! Some sunny day,
When blossoms in the wind are dancing,
And children at their cheerful play
Heed not the mournful crowd advancing,
Up through the long and busy street
They 'll bear me to my last retreat.

Or else—it matters not—may rave
The storm and sleet and wintry weather
Above the bleak and new-made grave,
Where care and I lie down together.
Enough that I shall know it not,
Beneath, in that dark, narrow spot.

For I shall sleep! As sweet a sleep
As ever graced a babe reposing,
Awaits me in the cell so deep,
Where I, my weary eyelids closing,
At length shall lay me down to rest,
Heedless of clods above my breast.

Asleep! how still this pulse will lie,
Rid of life's throb that beats so wildly!
How calm will be this restless eye,
Erst bright with tears, now closed so mildly!
For not one dream of Earth will come
To haunt the quiet of that home!

O, sweet Repose! O, Slumber blest!
O, night of Peace!—no storm, no sorrow—
No heavy stirring in my Rest,
To meet another weary morrow!
I shall not note nor Night nor Dawn,
But still, with folded hands, sleep on.

Sleep on, though just above my head
Prowl Sin and Misery's haggard faces—
For the dull slumber of the Dead
All sense of human woe erases;
Palsies the heart and cures the brain
Of every fever-throb of pain.

Armies above my rest may tramp—
'T will not disturb one rigid muscle;
I should not heed their iron stamp
More than a leaf's complaining rustle;
Nay, were the World convened to break
My leaden sleep, I should not wake.

And yet, methinks, if steps of those
I 've known and loved on earth were round me,
'T would tame the might of my repose,
Shiver the iron cords that bound me—
Save that I know this could not be,
For Death disowns all sympathy.

Well, be it so, since I should yearn
And weep and watch for their appearing—
Chiding each ling'ring, late return,
Forever sad, forever fearing—
Living Life's drama o'er again,
Its tragedy of Hope and Pain.

Then weep not, Friends, what time ye lay
The warm, moist earth above my ashes;
Think what a Rest awaits my clay,
And smooth the mound with tearless lashes—
Glad that the wasted form within
Has done at length with Care and Sin.

Think that with her the Strife is o'er,
Life's stormy, struggling Battle ended;
Hope that her soul has gained that Shore
To which, though weak, her footsteps tended;
Breathe the dear Hope above her sod,
And leave her to her Rest—and God!

Marblehead, February, 1851.

A DEATH-BED PREACHER.

There are many ways of preaching Christ's gospel without choosing a text, or standing in a pulpit. This glorious work is not restricted to any time, or place, or class of individuals. A Wilberforce could proclaim the gospel of love on the platform of Exeter Hall, or the floor of Parliament-House, though he never wore a surplice, and never had a prelate's ordaining hand upon his honored head. Thomas Cranfield preached to the boisterous rabble of Wapping till in their delight they were ready to reward him with "three cheers" for his thrilling exhortation. Hannah Moore preached Christ in the drawing-room; and Elizabeth Fry in the prison-cell. Harlan Page scattering tracts through a city-workshop, Nettleton whispering his solemn words to weeping souls at an inquiry-meeting, the Dairyman's Daughter murmuring the name of Jesus with her faint dying voice, and the Shepherd of Salisbury Plain, leaning on his crook to talk about eternity to a passer-by, were all intensely earnest "preachers of righteousness." The church has had few more faithful preachers than Thomas Halyburton, and his most impressive discourses were delivered on a dying-bed. "This is the best pulpit," said he, "that ever I was in; I am laid on this bed for this very end, that I may commend my Lord."

To his wife, who stood weeping by his bedside, he once said, "My sweet bird, are you there? I am no more thine. I am the Lord's. On the day I took you by the hand, I wist not how I could ever get my heart off you again; but now I have got it done. Do not weep; you should rather rejoice. Rejoice with me, and let us exalt his name together. We shall be in the same family in heaven; but you must even stay a while behind and take care of God's bairns."

At another time he remarked to her, after a night of agonizing pain—"Jesus came to me in the third watch of the night, walking upon the waters and he said to me, 'I am the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. I have the keys of hell and death,'" and then he added, "He stilleth the tempest in my soul, and lo! there was a sweet calm!"

When the eighty-fourth Psalm was sung for him, he said, "I always had a mis-tuned voice but which was worst of all, a mis-tuned heart; but shortly, when I join the temple service above, there shall not be, world without end, one string of my affections out of tune."

To his aged elder he remarked, "James, ye are an old man, and I am dying; yet the child is going to die an hundred years old. I am like a shock of corn fully ripe. I have ripened fast under the bright Sun of righteousness, and I have had brave showers!"

We have read of many sublime displays of courage in the dyinghour, but never met with such a calm confronting of the king of terrors as the following passage displays. "I am not acting as a fool," said he to his physician, "but I have weighed eternity during the last night. I have looked on death as stripped of all things pleasant to nature; I have considered the spade and the grave, and every circumstance that is terrible to nature! and under the view of all these, I found that in the way of God which gave me satisfaction—not merely a rational satisfaction, but a heart-engaging power that makes me rejoice."

On the morning of the 23d of September, he went to the dark valley. Yet he did not go alone, nor did the calm sunshine withdraw from his pathway—for in the "even-time it was light about him." Just before he died, he said, "I am thinking on the pleasant spot of earth that I will get to lie in, beside Mr. Rutherford and Principal Anderson. I will come in as the little one among them, and I will get my little George by the hand, and Oh! we will be a group of bonnie dust!" During the last six hours his voice failed him. But his angelic face was eloquent, and when he could not speak, he gently clapped his hands in triumph! So died the holy Halyburton—and on all the face of our earth the ministering angels of God beheld that day no other scene that was more like the heaven which they had left.

PREACHING TOUR AMONG THE INDIANS.

Mr. Tanner, a half-breed, who acts as interpreter at the Winnipec station, made an extensive tour nearly a year ago among various Indian tribes. The following extracts from his Journal, besides contaning other matters of much interest, show that Christ has his witnesses where we should little look for them.

July 10.—I wished to continue on my journey, but, as God would have it, my guide refused to go any farther. He was an unbeliever, and of course was afraid of death. At this time we were in the heart of the Sioux country, the Chippeway's sore enemy. In the evening a half-breed came to the tent where I put up, and offered to lend me a horse for one dollar per day; and as we were about closing the bargain, I was called out, leaving my Bible on the seat where I sat. When I came in, he asked what book that was? I said, "Look and see." "A good book," said he, looking into it and then at me. "I perceive, if I am not mistaken, you are a preacher." "Yes, sir." "Then, sir, you have my horse and all the services you want of me free; I charge you nothing." "But how," said I, "shall I get your horse back to you?" "Never mind that; don't be troubled. I am willing that my horse should go to carry you about to preach the gospel of God. Leave that with God; all shall be well. If I get my horse, well; if not, well; all is well!" He then went home. (This man is an interpreter of the Church of England in the Selkirks Settlement.)

A few minutes after, he came again, accompanied by another member of the same church, and spoke as follows: "My friend, many have entreated to have you stay with us a few days, showing you the danger of being killed on these plains by the Sioux, for we are trespassing on their hunting-grounds; also the wide door there is open for you to preach the gospel here. The people have collected together, and have sent this brother and me to advise you to give up leaving our camp. Now stay a few days with us. My horse, my tent, all I have, is at your service. Every door is open to receive you under its roof, free from all charges. The best food I have is for you, costing you nothing; only stay with us a while, if the Lord will, but if he will not have you stop [illegible] go on; I shall have nothing more to [illegible] He will protect you." I said to him, "As for fear of being killed, that is the least of my troubles. I will think and pray about it till morning;" and then, throwing myself before God, I asked his counsel, and laid down to rest. In the morning all desire to continue on was gone; my whole soul was drawn out for that camp. "This is of God," I said, "and I'll stay until the way is opened for me to go on." My friend came and invited me to stay with him. I accepted his offer, and was treated with all kindness and love. I stayed with this camp till the 21st, preaching two, three, and four times a day, and continuing on our journey, moving every other day, until we came within two hours' ride of the Missouri river, a short distance below the Mandan villages. On the 17th, I wished to continue on my journey, but met with opposition from every quarter. I consented to stop one day more, and on the 18th all things were ready for my journey, and with the full determination to go on the morrow, after preaching, I laid me down to rest. After I got asleep, my friend came to me and said, "Awake, and up! your brother has come!" Half asleep and half awake, I said, "Who! my brother!" "Your brother whom you are in search of." Arising from my bed in the dark, to my astonishment I saw five savage warriors, armed as it were to the teeth, coming up to me. "Is this my brother?" cried I to the first. "Yes," said a coarse and rough voice, at the same time reaching out one hand, while the other held his instruments of war. "My brother," said he, in a more faltering tone, embracing and kissing me. Oh, thinks I, what a difference God has put between two brothers! We had met but once in our lives before, and that meeting lasted only for part of one night. Sixteen years had rolled by since then, and now we meet again, one a professed soldier of Jesus, the other as brave a soldier of the devil as ever walked, a cruel and blood-thirsty warrior. I saw him loaded with the cruel instruments of death, and my heart rejoiced to use on him the spiritual weapons of my dear Lord. He had left home four days before in company with a war party, and that evening he had been chasing some of the Sioux, within a few miles of our camp; but as darkness overtook them, the Sioux escaped, and he, falling in our trail, rode up to our camp, never so much as dreaming to find a brother there. But the ways of God are past finding out.

The next morning my friend and I took him out some distance from the camp, and I spoke to him as follows: "My brother, I have come several hundred miles to find you, (for I had then traveled about eight hundred miles.) You can see the love I have for you; unacquainted with the country, I have not hesitated nor shrunk from danger to find you; I have left at home a wife and three little children, not knowing if I shall see them more. I came here in search of you, to try and turn you from your warfaring life. Your past life in sin ought to be enough; yea, too much; I now beseech of you to live a better life." After talking to him some time, he, looking me in the the face, said, "My brother! many often say I love, but they show no fruits of their love. When one says I love, I look to see his love—I see it not, I only hear it. I then think that man does not tell the truth. But in you, my brother, I see love more than your own life, therefore your instructions shall be dear to me, and I shall try to follow them as far as within me lies."

QUIETING A DISTURBER.

Some thirty years ago, (says a writer in the Christian Watchman and Reflector,) we knew in England, an excellent Congregational minister, small in stature, but eminent for piety, zeal and tact. He was greatly devoted to village preaching, and never seemed happier than when he stood in a brick-floored cottage, with a desk hung on the back of a chair for his pulpit, and surrounded by a company of poor laborers and their families. If there existed a disposition on the part of some of his hearers to create a disturbance, he did not very much regret it, for the result would certainly be to increase the attention of his audience. On one occasion, it was agreed by some sots at the village ale-house that the next time "Little Moody" came to preach, there should be some fun; they arranged their plans, and elected their leader. In due time he arrived, the cottage was crowded, and these men formed a part of the company. They allowed the introductory devotional services to pass undisturbed, but when the preacher rose to announce his text—"Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, the fifteenth chapter, and"—'twenty-first verse,' shouted the disturbing leader, who stood at the elbow of the preacher.

"No, my friend," replied Moody, looking him full, but very pleasantly in the face,—"No, my friend, it is the thirty-fourth verse, and the words are these, 'Awake to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God;'" and gently tapping his hearer on the shoulder, he finished the text—"'I speak this to your shame.'"

The congregation smiled to see the disturbed thus treated, the poor man sat down and quietly listened to the sermon, and ever after went to hear Mr. Moody preach, calling him his little parson, and manifested towards him the highest respect.

A TRICK OF TRADE.

"It was my place," says Adam Clarke in his Autobiography, "to measure and seal the cloth. One piece that passed through my hands came back, being short about six or seven inches, of the length required. I tried it again, endeavoring to accomplish the odd inches by the thumb. My thumb was small: but, in order to make up the inch, I placed it in an angular position. Still, however, I could not make out the proper measure; the consequence was, the cloth had to be stretched to the length required; but I could not stretch my conscience in that way. Mr. Bennett came in and told me to measure the piece; I told him I had done so, and it was short. He then ordered me to stretch it;—I hesitated. 'You won't do it then?' said Mr. Bennett, pausing a moment; adding—'You shall never measure another piece for me.' He did not tell me to go away, but took the piece from me and stretched and measured it himself; I stood aside and saw him fail. Well, I thought, God will step in for me in some way. After a few seconds, I said to him respectfully, 'sir, you cannot charge me with indolence, dishonesty or disobedience, from the time of my entering your service to the present period. I am ready to do any thing proper in itself; but this is not fair measure, and I cannot do that which I know to be wrong.' After this, I saw him, when he could not accomplish his purpose, cut a full yard off the piece. I moved a little off, and stood in the door-way, ready to take my departure. Mr. Bennett, apparently relenting a little, asked,—'Where do you intend to go?' 'Home, to my father, sir.' He replied, in a subdued tone, 'You may as well stop the night over.' I then went to another job, but measured no more pieces, and was soon after this set at liberty from the employment."

CHALMERS AND THE BIBLE.

His regular and earnest study of the Bible was one of the first and most noticeable effects of his conversion. His nearest neighbor and most frequent visitor was old John Bronthon, who, having once seen better days, was admitted to an easy and privileged familiarity, in the exercise of which, one day before the memorable illness to Mr. Chalmers, said, "I find you are busy, sir, with one thing or another; but come when I may I never find you at your studies for the pulpit." "Oh! an hour or two on Saturday evening is quite enough for that," was the minister's answer. But now the change was come, and John, on entering the manse, often found Mr. Chalmers poring eagerly over the pages of the Bible. The difference was too striking to escape notice, and with the freedom given him, which he was ready enough to use, he said, "I never come in now, sir, but I find you are at your Bible." "All too little, John, all too little," was the significant reply.

Consecration of Property.—Delightful examples are continually occurring (says the Journal of Missions) of the consecration of property to the cause of Christ. Recently the widow of a revolutionary soldier received some pension money, one-fourth part of which she devoted to the cause of Christ. And of that fourth, fifteen dollars is appropriated for carrying into effect the dying command of our Saviour, "Preach the Gospel to every creature." The like spirit, possessed by all his disciples, would secure the accomplishment of this work.

"Enthusiasm is the genius of sincerity, and truth accomplishes no victories without it." The world's history, in all its successful and beneficent undertakings, fully vindicates the justice and force of these words.

ROMAN CATHOLIC BANQUET.

Before our paper goes to press, sundry good "Catholics and other gentlemen" of this city will have refreshed their stomachs, and perhaps their souls, at a banquet given to "† John Hughes, Archbishop of New York." As Protestant papers will generally have a good deal to say about the affair, why should not we have something to say too?

In the first place, then, we rather incline to the opinion that "John" is fond of good dinners. The only time we ever saw him, we thought his appearance indicated that good roast beef, with perhaps an occasional glass of wine, often revived his inner man. He may, like Paul the Apostle, have been "in journeyings often"—for he has been on pilgrimage to the Eternal City more than once, besides performing other apostolic perigrinations—and "in perils in the sea;" but if he has also been "in hunger and thirst, in fastings often," he has not lost flesh by the operation, unless he is greatly changed since we looked upon him. But there is some difference between the apostles and their successors. However, we do not wish to be understood as intimating that there is any sin in being fat. Perhaps some, of "fair round belly with good capon lined," may get into the kingdom of heaven.

But, in the second place, whether "John" likes good dinners or not, it may be very well to eat this one. If it succeed according to expectation, it may prove a master stroke of policy for Holy Mother Church. His Reverence went to Rome to get a hat, the kind that he wanted not being made in this country; and 'they say' he returned without it. Not that there were none on hand that would fit him, but the last one that had been given away, was put upon a certain dignitary of the Church in England; and it made such a mighty uproar in that country, and elicited so many demonstrations against the Pope for his impudence, that it was probably thought best to be a little cautious about sending one to these United States of America. A little policy must be used first, and something must be done to draw out the true state of public feeling. We think, therefore, that it is best for "John" to eat this dinner, especially if a number of distinguished men—such as Mayors, Congressmen, Governors, Secretaries of State, &c.—can be prevailed upon to attend, and make complimentary speeches. Let us see; is not Daniel Webster somewhere in the vicinity at this time? Perhaps he will find it convenient to eat a little morsel, and crack a bottle of champaigne. If such a man can, by some artifice, be drawn into saying something which shall convince Pope Pius IX. and his admirers that it would be perfectly safe to create a Cardinal for America, then the Archbishop may yet have the hat. We have somewhere seen a list of eminent names, invited to participate in the proposed festival. Whether that of the Secretary of State was among them, we do not remember, but he has, no doubt, had his invitation; and if he should not attend personally, and deliver a speech, he may send a letter, with a 'sentiment,' which will answer just as well. All that is wanted is some emphatic demonstration of public sentiment, that the presence of a Cardinal among us would not be viewed as obnoxious to the spirit of our institutions.

What shall we say in the third place? For our discourse ought to have three heads, at least. The "Beast" has seven, and ten horns. Why, we were about to say something concerning the difficulty that our public men might feel of consenting to honor a Roman Catholic festival with their presence, considering how very fresh in the recollection of all this republican generation is the Pope's recreancy to the principles of liberty which for a time he espoused. With honest men, this would be rather a hard pill to swallow. But "John" knows that our public men are politicians; and that, for the sake of the votes of Roman Catholic citizens, the pill will be swollowed, however nauseous it may be. He does not fear any embarrassment of his scheme on this score—not he. He calculates confidently on success, and we think he calculates wisely.

Whether, as many Protestants imagine, Roman Catholics seriously design the subversion of the liberties of our country, we do not care to inquire at present. We certainly give Mr. Hughes no great credit for sincerity, when he affects to rejoice in the religious toleration by our Government of all creeds and denominations. But we are willing that he should eat as many dinners as his friends may choose to prepare for him. He may succeed in becoming a Cardinal, and, for aught we know, may yet sit in the Papal chair. And what if he should? He will be but a man still, and a sinner at that. A red hat might raise him somewhat in the estimation of Catholics, but Protestants, we are sure, would look upon it as a mere bauble, as they do upon the bellows-shaped cap which he has gloried in from the time he was made a bishop.

We have only one thing more to say; and that is, that the best and most certain way to counteract the anti-republican and demoralizing influence of Romanism, is for Protestants to be thoroughly Protestant themselves. Lutheran Popery, or Presbyterian Popery, or Episcopalian Popery, is just as hateful as Roman Catholic Popery. While Protestant sects cherish the spirit of intolerance, and give it play through the media of ecclesiastical tribunals, or seek the aid of civil law to promote the observance of their dogmas, they are not yet "clean escaped" from Rome themselves. In these respects many of them have important lessons to learn, and we would that they were a little more teachable.

GAMBLING IN NEW YORK.

The Legislature of New York, at its recent special session, passed a law more effectually to suppress gambling. It makes any person who shall rent or keep a room, building, arbor, booth, shed, tenement, boat or float, for gambling purposes, liable to a fine of not less than fifty or more than five hundred dollars. If any person, for gambling purposes, shall keep or exhibit any gambling table, establishment, device or apparatus; or if any person or persons shall be guilty of dealing "faro," or banking for others to deal "faro," or acting as "look-out" or game-keeper for the game of "faro" or any other banking game, where money or property is dependent on the result; or if any person shall sell or vend lottery policies, purporting to be governed by the drawing of any public or private lottery; or if any person shall endorse a book or any other document for the purpose of enabling others to sell or vend lottery policies; he shall be taken and held as a common gambler, and upon conviction thereof shall be sentenced to not less than ten days' hard labor in the penitentiary, or not more than two years' hard labor in the State prison, and be fined in any sum not more than one thousand dollars, to be paid into the county treasury where such conviction shall take place, for the use of the common schools therein. The law makes it the duty of any magistrate or police justice before whom complaint shall be made, to send an officer to arrest accused parties and take possession of their apparatus. It also makes it lawful for magistrates, when complaint has been entered, to break open suspected houses in case admission is refused. Inviting or persuading persons to visit gambling rooms makes one liable for any money that may be lost by the invited persons, and also to the fine and imprisonment which is threatened against the gambler. It is the duty of sheriffs, constables, and police officers, to inform against and prosecute every offender. Commanders of boats, who permit gambling for money on their boats, are liable for the money lost, and also to fine and imprisonment. The law takes effect on the first day of August.

PRAYER MEETINGS—WHO ATTEND?

It is not my purpose to enter upon a labored proof that the institution of prayer is from God. Most believers in the Bible admit it. Neither would I discuss the nature of prayer in general, preferring to take for granted that it is well understood by all who may read this. I would speak of only one kind of prayer, and that is social prayer, as distinguished from private and family prayer. We have intimations in the Bible, that it is obligatory upon Christians; and it ought not, therefore, to be neglected. That it is one of the main supporters of vital religion, there cannot be the least doubt. As well might we expect our animal economy to go on and discharge its functions without [illegible] heart, as to expect a church to grow a[illegible]ourish without prayer; and social prayer is as important in its place, as any other kind. Revelation and experience attest the truth of this. By learning the interest taken in social prayer, we gain a knowledge of the spiritual condition of a church. A church is dead without it. It were as vain to look for the fruits of righteousness in a church without it, as to look for summer bloom on the icebergs of the poles. A long continuance in such a state will bring about final extinction as surely as effect will follow cause. There is no alternative. God's work must be done, and if one people will not labor as he has appointed, he will raise up others to take their place.

But upon whom does the maintenance of social prayer devolve? Who shall attend our prayer meetings? Is the minister excused? I think not. Attending to these constitutes an important item in his duties; and nothing, however important, should divert a proper share of his attention from them. He may urge that other duties are pressing, that his labors are very fatiguing, and that when the time comes for prayer meeting he is so wearied that he cannot consistently attend. Better omit a portion of his other duties than this. His people look to him for an example, and whatever he does they will be pretty sure to do. If he habitually neglects this duty, no matter what the excuse is, they will do the same. A minister may preach till doom's day the necessity of attending these meetings, and if he does not conform his example to his precepts, he might as well preach to the wind for all the good he will do. I know a church, the spiritual thermometer of which is below zero, and in which I believe this state of things results, in a great measure, from the neglect of the minister in this department of his legitimate labors. Sometimes the minister urges that there are others as competent as himself to take charge of these meetings, and that therefore he should be excused from them to be preparing his discourses, or doing something else. This will not do. If the minister is what he should be, there is no other one in whom the people will place such confidence as they do in him. He is the man to lead these meetings in his own neighborhood, and wherever else he can. Fathers and mothers, if health will permit, should attend; because their influence over their children is great, and if they neglect the prayer meeting, their children will be likely to do the same. Youthful church members should attend; because they are strong and able to do duty, and because, by doing so, they may turn the attention of their companions to the subject of religion. In short, all should attend these meetings; because all may be profited by them, and in turn be indefinitely more profitable to the church and to the world. Let them be faithfully attended, and prosperity and joy will be in the courts of Zion, instead of dearth, famine, and lamentation. BETA.

A WORD TO THE LIBERAL.

It is well known to most of the readers of the Recorder, that Eld. J. W. Morton was dismissed from the Mission to Hayti, deposed from the ministry, and excommunicated from "the Covenanters," because he left their traditions and embraced the Sabbath of the Lord Jehovah. I suppose, however, it is not generally known, that he was thus turned away from his work in the very depths of poverty, and that his new religious views virtually bar him from the ordinary avenues which open to other men of less moral worth and literary attainments. He has a wife and three little children, whom he has managed to maintain, partly by teaching and partly by manual labor, as best he could. He has been connected with DeRuyter Institute the last year, and has won the affection of his pupils, and the confidence of all who know him. When applied to to renew his engagement, his chief objection was a wish to locate where he could secure to his family a spot they could call home should he be taken from them; and he supposed the income of the Institution would not warrant the Trustees in securing to him this boon. The Trustees have, however, engaged him as a permanent teacher; and to further his wishes, commend him to the liberality of their patrons, by engaging to receive as pay for tuition, at any time during his connection with the school, any receipts he may give for monies advanced to aid him in the proposed purchase. Five hundred dollars will purchase a house and lot with which he will be amply satisfied until he can earn means to make it better. Friends, knowing his wants, are forwarding small sums, which they are to receive again in the tuition of their own children, or of other persons whom they may choose to send, and some forward donations. This work I would heartily commend to the liberal as one which I trust will afford them lasting satisfaction.

Elder M. has made great advancement in the truth since breaking from the shackles of his church. I trust he is destined to be a great blessing to us, and a mighty champion in dissipating error and establishing truth in the minds of the people.

Funds to aid him may be left at the office of the Sabbath Recorder in New York, with J. H. Cochran of Berlin, or with the subscriber at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y.

FREEDOM IN GEORGIA.

The good people of the State of Georgia have just furnished another illustration of their hatred of freedom and love of slavery. It seems, from an official statement in the Augusta Republican that one Nathan Bird Watson of New Haven, Conn.—("a man of dark complexion, hazle eyes, black hair, and wears a heavy beard, measures five feet eleven and three-quarter inches, has a quick step, and walks with his toes inclined inward, and a little stoop-shouldered, now wears a check coat, and white pants, says he is twenty-three years of age, but will pass for twenty-five or thirty")—made his appearance in the town of Warrenton, and there in some way intimated that he was opposed to slavery; whereupon a meeting was called of citizens of the town and county, which appointed a committee of ten to expel Mr. Watson from the place, and accompany him to Camak for the purpose of shipping him to his native land. And lest this should not prove a sufficient protection against Mr. Watson's influence, the meeting voted that "a minute description of the said Watson be forwarded to the publishers of the Augusta papers, with the request that they, and all other publishers of papers in the slaveholding States, publish the same for a sufficient length of time."

What a commentary upon the freedom enjoyed in Georgia by citizens of the Northern States!

THE NEW YORK POST OFFICE.

A statement has just been made of the business of the New York Post Office for the quarter ending June 30. The whole number of letters received from California was 119,974, from Bremen 108,105, from Liverpool 322,712. The number sent to these places was about the same as that received. The gross amount of sea letters passing through the office during the three months was 1,093,125, and of papers 685,415. To the above add the daily average domestic correspondence, and it will give about 6,098,125 letters passed through this office during the quarter. The average number of daily mails, post billed, made up and dispatched, for the same quarter, is about 4,900; and about the same number are received, assorted and delivered or distributed daily. The number of of letters advertised for the quarter is 46,114; about one-fourth of which have been delivered to the proper owners, and the remaining three fourths sent to the dead letter office at Washington. The number of dead letters received from the dead letter office at Washington, for the same quarter, and containing property of value, consisting of moneys in various sums, bills of exchange, &c., for amounts ranging from $5 to $20,000, is 1,296—830 of which have been delivered to the proper parties, and the remaining 466 having been unclaimed, were returned to the dead letter office. In addition to the above, must be taken into consideration the enormous quantity of domestic papers daily passing through the office, as exchanges and to subscribers, and the reader may then form a slight estimate of the very great quantity of work transacted in the N. Y. Post Office.

TEMPERANCE IN CONNECTICUT.

A bill was recently reported in the Senate of Connecticut, and triumphantly passed, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. In the Assembly, however, it was so modified and mystified by proposed amendments, that its friends thought best to move its postponement to the next session of the Legislature. This was considered by its opponents as a great concession; and they were in high spirits—(report does not say whether any of them were high from the use of spirits)—when the following resolution was introduced by Senator Ramsdell, and adopted in the Senate and Assembly by overwhelming majorities:—

"Resolved by the Assembly, That on the first Monday of April next, the electors of this State be and are hereby required to assemble at the usual place of holding electors' meetings and to vote by ballot on the following proposition:

"Shall the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage, be prohibited in this State under suitable penalties to restrain the same?

"The Moderator of each electors' meeting, at the opening of the same, shall publicly state this proposition, and request all electors in favor of such proposition to deposit a ballot in the box for that purpose, on which shall be printed the word—YES; and all those opposed to such prohibition to deposit a ballot in the same box, on which shall be printed the word—No. Said ballots shall be counted by the officers of said meeting, and returns made of the number in favor of or against said proposition to the Secretary of State, with the returns of votes for State officers. Within ten days after the reception of said returns, the Governor of the State shall make public proclamation of the number of votes given in favor of and against, said proposition."

The friends of temperance in Connecticut have now a chance to work for the cause, and show their strength. Their aim during the coming year will be to obtain the largest possible vote in favor of prohibiting the liquor traffic, and a Legislature in 1852 which will obey the instructions of the people.

THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW.

The exceeding stringency of the Liquor Law which recently went into operation in Maine, made many of its friends doubtful whether it would be generally enforced. Papers from various parts of the State, however, show that such doubts were entirely without foundation. Large quantities of liquor have been summarily disposed of according to the law, and the officers who do the work appear to be sustained by public opinion. The following paragraphs, which we copy from the Bangor Whig, is to the point:—

"The City Marshal yesterday morning, by order of the Police Court, rolled out from the basement of the City Hall ten casks of liquor seized under the new liquor law, and destroyed the liquor by turning it out upon the ground. There were quite a number of persons present, but the whole proceeding seemed to be in accordance with the popular sentiment. One cask of the liquor was said to be of superior quality, and some persons were desirous of having it saved for appropriate uses, but the law makes no distinction, and it met the common destruction. The empty casks were safely returned to the owners."

* * * * * *

"The execution of the law in this city has so far produced a favorable effect. It has dismantled many rum shops. It has promoted temperance. It has caused several men, who have heretofore resisted every appeal and every law, to yield to the might and majesty of this law. It has caused to be sent back to Boston large quantities of liquor. It has lessened the police expenses of the city. It has inspired not a few men with a degree of self-respect and with higher aims."

CHRISTIANITY IN THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.—Rev Wm. Gill has given an account of a missionary expedition to a group of South Sea Islands some three days' sail from Roratonga, which shows that God is working in that region in a very powerful manner. Only fifteen months have elapsed since the missionaries commenced laboring there, and yet, according to the reports of the missionaries, the entire population have cast away their idols and welcomed the institutions of Christianity.

"Four months after landing, the chiefs and principal people on the island agreed to destroy all the 'maræs' (temples), and to burn all their idols. On that day their ancient places of idol-worship were demolished, and all their idols committed to the flames; another demonstration of Divine power communicated through feeble instrumentality. 'Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord.' There are about 1,200 inhabitants on this island, governed by two chiefs of equal authority. After the burning of the idols, each chief desired to have a teacher to reside in his district. To this proposition the teachers agreed, and after some little time they were assisted by the people in erecting a 'House of God' at each of the stations. Toward the end of last year these buildings were finished, and the people of the two settlements united alternately in the opening services. Daily schools, both for adults and for children, are established, and the people manifest great desire for instruction."

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIANS.—The Cumberland Presbyterians, a numerous body at the West, have recently organized a Presbytery in California, far up in the mining region. They have also a Presbytery in Oregon, and a respectably sustained Mission. At the late General Assembly of that body, held in Pittsburgh, the subject of Slavery was formally excluded, on the ground that, being a political institution, the church has nothing to do with it.

EPISCOPAL MISSIONARIES.—Three Missionaries of the Episcopal Church are to leave this country for foreign lands during the present year: Rev. Mr. Keith and Rev. Mr. Nelson, of the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, and Rev. Mr. Hubbard of Boston.

WITHDRAWAL FROM THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—Rev. B. P. Aydelott, a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, has recently withdrawn from that church on account of its papal doctrines and tendencies. The following extracts from his letter to Bishop McIlvaine, give the gist of his arguments and a clew to his feelings:—

"Convinced that the evils prevalent among us are not merely incidental, but that they naturally and necessarily grow out of errors unhappily retained by us at our separation from Papacy, and incorporated in our very standards; convinced that there is thus room on our platform, where the advocates of baptismal regeneration and other kindred errors of Rome may honestly stand, so that we cannot lawfully put them off; and convinced, after years of patient waiting and earnest effort, that reformation in our Church is utterly hopeless—what does Christian integrity, what does common honesty, require of me? * * *

After close examination, and long and prayerful reflection, I believe that the Protestant Episcopal Church needs reformation, but that she cannot be reformed. I must therefore reform from her. Duty to the cause of Christ, to my family, and to the world, forbid me any longer to give my influence, however small it may be, to the support of what I cannot but regard as fundamentally wrong. With a solemn sense of the responsibility of the step I am now taking, and with no other feeling, I trust, than that of personal kindness towards those whom I leave, I must respectfully, though in great heaviness and sorrow of heart, notify you of my determination no more to exercise my ministry in connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church."

CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS.—There is in London a small band of clergymen, connected with the Established Church, who call themselves "Christian Socialists." On a recent Sunday, one of these clergymen, Rev. C. Kingsley, author of "Alton Lock, Tailor and Poet," preached in one of the London churches. His subject was the message of the church of laborers—text, Luke 10: 16—19. From these verses he deduced the principles of "freedom, equality, and brotherhood"—natural, moral and political—which he maintained were embodied in all the institutions of the Church! By these the Church protested alike against the tyranny and pride of her own priests, the arbitrary rule of kings, the class legislation of aristocrats, and the selfishness of the rich and respectable. Rev. Mr. Drew, the regular minister of the church, protested against the discourse, and characterized it as imprudent, for the most part untrue, and not the Gospel. The large congregation dispersed in much excitement, Mr. Kingsley receiving many tokens of respect and approbation.

HARVARD DOCTORS.—The Commencement Exercises of Harvard University were held on Fourth-day of last week. Besides conferring upon the graduates the usual degrees, and making several honorary Masters of Arts, the honorary degree of Doctor in Divinity was conferred on Rev. Alonzo Hill of Worcester, Rev. John Adams Albro of Cambridge, Rev. Rufus Phineas Stebbins of Meadville, and Rev. Stephen Higginson Ting of New York.

The honorary degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred on George Sewell Boutwell, Governor of Massachusetts; Benjamin Faneuil Dunkin, Chancellor of South Carolina; John J. Crittenden, Attorney General of the United States; Sylvanus Thayer, Colonel of Engineers in the United States Army; Alexander Dallas Bache, Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey; Joseph Henry, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington; John Amory Lowell, Boston.

PRESBYTERIAN MINISTERS.—The Board of Education of the Old School Presbyterian Church reports in the Home and Foreign Record, that it has received under its care, during the six months ending in May, forty-one new candidates for the ministry of that church. During the whole last year, eighty-six were received; and since the separate organization of this department of the church's charity, 1962 young men have been named for gratuitous education in schools, colleges, and theological seminaries. During the past year, 49 of these students have entered the ministry; 7 have abandoned study; 3 have died; 10 have dropped out; 3 have been stopped for marrying, and 7 others have been discontinued for cause.

ANTI-SLAVERY ASSOCIATION IN DUBLIN.—A large number of the most intelligent and philanthropic citizens of Dublin have formed an Anti-Slavery Association, and issued an able address to Irishmen about to emigrate to the United States, exhorting them on their arrival here to identify themselves with those who are struggling by all rightful means to procure the abolition of slavery and the enlightenment and elevation of its victims, and to "show by their acts that in emigrating to America they have not forgotten the love of liberty and of Christianity which they professed at home."

SETTLEMENT OF A RETURNED MISSIONARY.—Rev. J. G. Binney, a Baptist Missionary who lately returned from Burmah on account of the failure of his wife's health, has accepted an invitation to become pastor of the Baptist Church in Elmira N. Y., and has already taken up his residence there. Mr. Binney, at the call of the Board some eight or ten years ago, left a church in Georgia, of which he was pastor, for Burmah; and there, in the Karen department, has been teaching and training native preachers.

REVIVAL IN NEW BRUNSWICK.—A letter from St. Johns, N. B., to the Morning Star, says: "You will be pleased to learn that we have a glorious revival in this city. Several hundreds have recently professed faith in Christ. It is so also in many places through out our province. I have never seen the like here."

DEATH OF AN AGED MISSIONARY.—An old missionary among the Cherokees, named Daniel S. Butrick, died at the Dwight Mission, in the Nation, on the 8th of June. He had served among the Indians for thirty years, and is said to have left among his papers a history of the Cherokees, which is to be published.

LEWISBURG UNIVERSITY.—This institution, recently established and endowed by the Baptists of Pennsylvania, appears to be in a flourishing condition. Rev. Dr. Malcom, now a pastor in Philadelphia, has accepted the office of President, and is expected to enter upon his duties at the opening of the fall term. At that time, also, it is proposed to model the course of instruction after that of Brown University—a proposition which some think it would be well to wave until more is known of of the working of the system adopted at Brown.

A BAPTIST DENOMINATIONAL REGISTER.—The Baptist Publication Society proposes to issue a Denominational Baptist Register about the beginning of 1852, containing full statistics of the condition of the Churches, Associations, Conventions, Colleges, Benevolent Societies, etc. For aid in the work, an appeal is made to the Clerks or Moderators of Associations and Conventions, Superintendents of Sabbath-Schools, and those interested in Colleges, Seminaries, and Benevolent Societies. We shall send them all the statistics in our possession.

OLD AND NEW SCHOOL PRESBYTERIANS.—According to the recent Annual Reports of the Old School and New School Presbyterian Church in the United States, the former body numbers 24 Synods, 134 Presbyteries, 381 candidates for the Ministry, 237 Licentiates, 2,027 Ministers, 2,675 Churches, and 210,306 Communicants; Members added within the year on examination, 10,852; by certificate, 7,892. The New School Church numbers 21 Synods, 104 Presbyteries, 1,489 Ministers, 140 Licentiates, 1,579 Churches, 140,060 Communicants; added within the year, by profession 5,699; by certificate 4,203.

A GOOD IDEA.—The Ohio Statesman says that an effort is being made by Governor Wood, of Ohio, in pursuance of a joint resolution of the Ohio Legislature, to have a uniform day for Thanksgiving and Prayer, in all the States of the Union, and he has corresponded with the Executives of the several States on the subject. The day selected will most probably be the last Thursday in November. This is right, and we hope all the States of the Union will adopt the suggestion.

THE METHODIST PROPERTY SUIT.—The N. Y. Tribune states that the negotiations, consequent upon the earnest recommendation of the Court, for an amicable settlement of the unfortunate dispute between the two branches of the Methodist Episcopal Church, have failed, the South making it prerequisite that the justice of her claim shall be admitted, and the North refusing to make any such acknowledgment.

REVIVAL AT AUBURN.—The N. Y. Recorder mentions an interesting revival in the Baptist Church at Auburn, N. Y. Forty-six young converts were baptized on Sunday, July 6th, and the right-hand of fellowship was extended to thirty-three young persons who had been received within a short time.

MISSIONARY TO HAYTI.—The public designation of Rev. Arthur Waring as a missionary of the American and Foreign Christian Union to the Island of Hayti, took place recently in New York. Rev. T. Osborn, and Rev. Drs. Baird, Dowling, and Lewis, conducted the exercises of the occasion.

EMBARKATION OF MISSIONARIES.—Rev. William Mellen and wife embarked from Boston on the 23d ult., in the new bark Springbok, Capt. Hunt, for Cape Town, as missionaries of the American Board to the Zulus of South Africa.

A BISHOP FOR AFRICA.—At Alexandria, Va., on the 11th inst., Rev. J. Payne, D. D., was consecrated as Bishop for Cape Palmas, in Africa. Bishops Meade and Johns of Virginia, Bishop Lee of Delaware, and Bishop Eastburn of Massachusetts, participated in the ceremonies.

SECESSION.—At an Anti-Slavery meeting held in Geauga Co., Ohio, on the 14th inst., (says the New Lisbon Aurora,) Hon. J. R. Giddings was present and publicly announced that he had withdrawn from the N. S. Presbyterian Church on account of Slavery.

DEATH OF A BAPTIST EDITOR.—Rev. Dr. Farnsworth, President of the Georgetown, (Ky.) College, formerly editor of the Christian Watchman, the Baptist journal at Boston, recently died of cholera. He was a scholar of liberal feelings and respectable attainments.

DEATH OF A MISSIONARY.—Intelligence has been received of the sudden decease of Dr. Azariah Smith, Missionary of the American Board at Anitáb. Dr. S. was a physician, and son of the late Azariah Smith, Esq., of Manlius, N. Y.

ANOTHER POSTAGE DECISION.—The Postmaster General has decided, that under the new postage law the annual pamphlets of religious bodies and benevolent societies cannot be sent by mail unless the postage is prepaid.

GAMBLING IN CONNECTICUT.—The Legislature of Connecticut, at its late session, enacted a law in these words: "That it shall be the duty of all sheriffs, constables, grand jurors, and tything men, upon view, and without warrant, to apprehend every person who shall play at cards, dice, tables or billiards, for money or other valuable things, and to carry him before the next Justice of the Peace, that he may be dealt with according to law; and the Justice of the Peace before whom such person is brought, shall on oath of the officer apprehending him, issue a warrant and cause him to be arrested, and shall proceed to a hearing and trial of such matter of complaint."

European News.

The steamer Asia, with three days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on the 16th inst. We abridge from the N. Y. Tribune the following summary of news :—

In England, the Anti-Papal bill has finally passed the House of Commons by a large majority. It had previously been amended, on the motion of Sir. F. Thesiger, and in spite of the opposition of the Ministers, so as to be much more severe than the Government designed. The amendments were carried in consequence of the indignant withdrawal of the Irish members. It seems that Mr. Hayter, the Secretary of the Treasury, had assured those gentlemen that the Government would not oppose a motion to the purport that the bill should not be taken to affect the strictly ecclesiastical functions of the Catholic Bishops. When the motion was made, however, Lord John Russell opposed it and it was lost. Hereupon the Irish members rose and left the House in a body, loudly accusing the Government of bad faith. This they did just as Sir F. Thesiger was rising to propose his amendments, which he told the House were important; but that had no effect on the Hibernian ire. The absentees were some seventy, and while they were out the amendments were adopted by majorities of thirty-five to sixty, and once in the bill, could not be got out of it again. Had the Irish members staid in their place, this could not have happened. There is no doubt that the Lords will adopt the bill, and that it will become the law of the land.

A good deal of excitement has been caused in England by an appeal addressed to Italians by the Pontifical authorities, at Rome asking for aid to the Catholic Missions in London, in which this great work is most earnestly recommended to the charity of Italian believers, and to the zeal of the bishops of Italy. Archbishop Minucci, of Florence, has also called on the people of his diocese to aid in constructing an Italian church in London, where the "spiritual wants of the faithful" may be cared for, and announcing an indulgence of one hundred days for those who shall contribute to this object.

The great event in France has been the speech of M. Thiers in reply to the propositions of M. Saint Beuve for a virtual abolition of the Tariff, reducing the mass of duties on manufactured articles to 10 per cent. and admitting agricultural products and raw materials generally without duty.

From Italy we have the same old story of persecution of all suspected of democratic tendencies, and of weakness on the part of the Government. At Rome sundry persons arrested for the killing of Count Rossi have been set at liberty, probably because there was no proof against them. Another woman has been scourged for trying to prevent persons from smoking cigars, an article of trade from which the administration derive a revenue.

From Russia we hear that a body of Belgian weavers and dyers has been engaged to go to St. Petersburg to set up their trade. In Circassia the Russian army has met with a serious defeat; in a battle where it had 25,000 men engaged, it lost 5,000.

From Turkey we have the grateful intelligence that Kossuth will now soon be liberated on condition of his going to the United States, Austria having given her consent thereto.

Negotiations are on foot for liberating the eight Hungarian refugees at Kuytaya. According to the demands of Austria, they must embark directly for the United States; on that condition she sanctions their liberty.

In China the rebellion in Kwanghi still keeps up. The troops of the Government were lately defeated there by the rebels opening the dikes of the country and drenching them with an unexpected inundation.

Two Weeks Later from California.

The steamship Brother Jonathan arrived at New York on the 18th inst., with two weeks later news from California.

The Isthmus was generally free from sickness. Two of the miscreants who were concerned in the murders on the Chagres River, were shot in the Cathedral Plaza of Panama on the 30th ult. Their names were Francisco Medrano, and José Maria Radillo.

Previous to the sailing of the steamer from San Francisco, on the 14th ult., buildings had been erected upon the greater portion of the "burnt district," and business was slowly but steadily reviving.

A Sydney convict, who gave his name as Jenkins, stole a safe, was arrested, tried and convicted, by a number of citizens, and was hung by them at midnight, on the Plaza at San Francisco.

The Alta California of June 14 sums up the events which had transpired since the sailing of the previous steamer as follows:—

The steamer Panama, with U. S. mails, and news nine days later from the Atlantic, arrived on the 1st inst., in 16 days and 6 hours from Panama, having accomplished the shortest passage ever made between the two ports.

Five men were drowned at San Pablo bay, on the 28th of May. Their names and former residences were as follows: Dr. Reuben Knox, of St. Louis; John Allen of Burlington, Vt.; James F. Graham of North Carolina, nephew of Hon. David Graham, Secretary of the Navy; a Mr. Davis of Maine, and an Indian boy.

A Long Island Indian, named Frank Brewer, was found dead in Montgomery-st. on the 2d ult. He is supposed to have been drugged to death for the purpose of robbing him.

The Indians have been troublesome in the southern section of the State. A company of white men under Capt. Irving are reported to have committed many outrages upon the inhabitants of Los Angelos Valley. The citizens volunteered and went in pursuit. But the last account received is that the Indians of a certain Mission had destroyed Capt. Irving and his 11 men.

The cap of the steam chest of the steamer New World blew off while she was on her passage from Sacramento to San Francisco on the 4th inst., the steam rushing out and killing two persons.

Seven men were recently drowned at Park's Bar. Their names are J. Stull, H. Modesburgh, Charles Cox, Mr. Hodge, Samuel Miller, Jorigan, a Frenchman, and Vincent, also French.

The attempts to burn the city of San Francisco have been too numerous to recapitulate, too bold and malignant to allow any other interpretation than a determined plan to burn the city. But our citizens are vigilant, and wo to him who is caught in the commission of the crime.

The accounts from the mining region, both north and south, represent the operations as being quite as successful for the last two weeks as they were for the month previous. There is more activity at this moment, and more gold is got out, than ever before at any other period in the history of the California mines. The various species of mining now pursued, are, washing on the banks of the various streams, dammed up or led off for that purpose; coyoteing or digging into the earth from one pocket to another on the rude practice of a scientific principle—tunnelling the hills, a system which has proved immensely profitable—and crushing the auriferous quartz, the success of which depends as well on the skill and machinery as on the richness of the ore. The operation of washing surface gold in the gulches and ravines, is not as extensively pursued as at first, nor is it by any means so profitable. This system of mining is now wholly confined to the northern mines. Quartz mining and the coyote principle obtain almost altogether in the southern mines, and in that region are the most productive quartz mines yet opened.

Census of Ireland.—The Census of Ireland, just completed, shows a decrease within the last ten years of no less than 1,659,330; the population which in 1841 amounted to 8,175,124, being reduced to 6,515,794, or about 20 per cent. The following resumé is taken from the Daily Express :—

"In this reduction Connaught and Munster have borne the largest share, the decrease in the former province being 28 per cent., and the latter 23; while in Leinster and Ulster the decrease is pretty equal, being about 16 per cent. each. It may not be uninteresting to state briefly the fluctuations in the number of the population for the last forty years. In the first decade it increased from 5,637,856 to 6,801,627, a rapid ratio of 35 per cent.; in the second the increase was 14 per cent.; in the third, 5 per cent.; and now, at the close of the fourth decade, by a reduction of 20 per cent. We are less in number than we were 30 years ago; whereas, if instead of decreasing, the population, according to its natural tendencies, had increased only in the low ratio of 5 per cent., it would now be upward of 2,000,000 more than it is. Dublin is the only county which shows an increase of about 10 per cent. With this solitary exception, the decrease extends to all the counties in Ireland, and varies from 9 per cent. in Antrim to 31 per cent. in Roscommon."

Accident from Gunpowder.—On First-day evening, July 13th, Wm. Henry Burdick, (son of Wm. C. Burdick of Temperance Valley, R. I.,) a lad about 16 years of age, was very severely burned, and otherwise badly injured, by the explosion of gunpowder. In company with a number of other boys, he had been engaged in discharging a pistol barrel—a recreation which they had followed most of the evenings since the Fourth. Finding a wad on the ground on fire, young Burdick amused himself by throwing powder from a bottle in his hand on the burning wad. Having thrown on a quantity, and finding that it did not flash readily, he darted forward the bottle and ejected another quantity, when the first flashed, and formed a communication with the bottle containing a pound and a half of powder, which instantly exploded. The whole company were thrown upon the ground, but fortunately none of the others were seriously injured. A. B. B.

Postage to Chagres, Panama, California, and Oregon.—We are requested, says the National Intelligencer, to call particular attention to the rates of postage on letters to California and Oregon; and also to the foreign places (Chagres and Panama) on the route of California.

In rating letters for California and Oregon, it must be borne in mind that these countries now form a part of the United States, and are of course entitled to the advantage of the domestic rates, according to the official "tables of postage within the United States" recently sent to postmasters throughout the country. Hence we are authorized to say, that the single rate to California or Oregon (the distance of over 3,000 miles) is six cents prepaid, and ten cents unpaid. On newspapers and other printed matter sent to California or Oregon, the domestic rates also of course apply.

But to Chagres and Panama (foreign) the letter postage must be rated under that clause in the law specifying letters to be "conveyed wholly or in part by sea, and to and from a foreign country." Therefore the single letter postage to either Chagres or Panama is ten cents, if the distance from the mailing office is under 2,500 miles, and twenty cents if the distance is over 2,500 miles; in both cases to be prepaid where the letter is sent from, and collected when received in the United States. To either of these places from New York, we are informed that the distance exceeds 2,500 miles; from all the Southern ports the distance is less than 2,500 miles.

Tornado and Freshet in Michigan.—The Detroit Tribune of the 14th says: The up country as far as Washtenaw and Jackson Counties has been visited by a dreadful tornado. It commenced raining about 3 o'clock, A. M., on Saturday, and poured down during the day, at intervals, until 4 o'clock, P. M., swelling all the streams leading to the Huron River, Grand River, &c. For eight or ten miles, along the line of the Central Railroad, the crops have been much injured by a tornado from the north; trees uprooted, and limbs broken off by the violence of the gale, which lasted till a few minutes prior to 4 o'clock, P. M. Considerable damage must have been experienced north and south of the railroad; but from Dexter to beyond Franciscoville, the wheat and corn were prostrated, the marshes were all afloat, and considerable hay that was cut and cocked up on them was completely deluged. The oldest inhabitants in that region recollect of no instance of a parallel freshet.

Steamship Excursion.—The steamship Golden Gate, a very fine vessel recently built for the Pacific Mail Steamship Line, left New York on the 12th inst. and returned on the 18th, having made an excursion to Annapolis. She took out about one hundred guests, many of whom visited Washington. On her return she brought to New York Hon. Daniel Webster, his lady and neice; Mrs. Fillmore, the lady of the President; and several other distinguished individuals. The return voyage was enlivened by toast-drinking and speech-making to an extent unusual even on such occasions.

Wheat-Growing—The Weevil.—The Auburn (N. Y.) Advertiser says in relation to the weevil and the cultivation of wheat :—

Our readers are aware that the farmers of the eastern part of the State were forced, some ten years since, to give up the raising of wheat, on account of the weevil, whose destructive ravages rendered it unprofitable. We learn, however, that this year the farmers of Rensselaer and Columbia counties are looking forward with confidence to a yield of wheat which it is thought will average 25 bushels to the acre. The experiment was first tried last year, and it was found that the destructive insect had entirely disappeared. The wheat fields in this section, as we are informed by farmers from various parts of the county, look remarkably well, and where the weevil have not commenced their mischief, the prospect is very flattering that a heavy yield will be realized. In some localities we understand that the weevil have destroyed whole fields of wheat, so that the crops would not pay the expense of harvesting.

The Kaffir War.—The English brig Fliberty arrived at Boston, Monday, July 14, bringing dates from the Cape of Good Hope to the 15th May, being two weeks later intelligence. The intelligence is to the effect that the Kaffir War continues without any visible impression being made by the English. The property of the settlers is continually captured and carried off, and many Colonists murdered. At Tambookie's, Capt. Tylden had a battle with the rebels in which 216 of them were killed. The Dutch frontier Boors behaved with great bravery. The Winterbur is again infested with Kaffir and Hottentot marauders, who have taken up their old position in Waterkalof, and had a skirmish with a party of Colonists, in which two of the latter and eight or ten rebels were killed. A rebel Chief named Masosi had been attacked by Major Donovan and defeated—the Kaffirs lost 300, 64 of whom were drowned in an attempt to cross the river. Notwithstanding these victories, the Kaffirs still appear in force, and the industry of the Colony is at a complete stand still.

SUMMARY.

A company of ninety-eight emigrants recently arrived at Oregon City, having crossed with 25 wagons and about 250 head of stock. There are several families, among which are 16 females. They left Salt Lake on the 28th of March, and arrived at the Dallas, May 29, making the journey in 62 days. The health of the company has been good during the journey. They were attacked by the Indians on the Snake River, but lost none of their party. The Indians kept up a fire across the river upon them for two hours, which the emigrants returned, killing several Indians during the fight.

The following railroads in Illinois are in course of completion, and some of them in successful operation, viz: The Chicago & Galena Union Railroad; the Rock Island & La Salle Railroad, with its extension to Chicago; the Peoria & Oquawka; the Quincy & Meredosia; the Alton & Terrehaute, and the Illinoistown & Vincennes Railroads. We add to the above list the Sangamon & Morgan Railroad, already completed from Springfield to the Ilinois River, and the Alton & Sangamon Railroad.

A very interesting discovery has recently been made in Egypt. M. Mariette, a young French scholar, who was dispatched on a scientific mission to Egypt, has discovered the exact site of the ancient city of Memphis, which has heretofore been a matter of doubt. After careful search, he has found a great quantity of Egyptian and Grecian remains, buried under a deposit of sand, varying from six to forty feet in depth.

In St. Louis, during the six months ending with June, there were 1,894 deaths, of which 545 were by Cholera. Of the Cholera victims, about three-fifths are foreigners. The Clerk of the St. Louis Board of Health informed the editor of the Republican, that "of five hundred emigrants who arrived in the early part of June, he had, not a week after, ordered coffins for nearly one-half the number."

A dispatch dated Washington, July 14, says: General Chaplin not appearing in the Criminal Court to answer the charge of abducting the slave of Mr. Toombs, suits have been instituted against William Blanchard, David A. Hall, and Selby Parker, the sureties, for forfeitnre of recognizances.

On Saturday (Sabbath) afternoon, July 12, while Benjamin Howard, Esq., merchant on Central Wharf, Boston, was riding in his carriage with his wife, sister and neice, the horses ran away, and the party were all thrown out. Mr. Howard's sister died from the injuries she sustained.

On Saturday (Sabbath) afternoon, July 12, while Mr. Wm. H. Stogdill and his lady were enjoying themselves with a pleasant ride on the road a short distance beyond Harlem, the spirited animal became frightened, and ran away at the hight of his speed. Before he could be checked, Mr. S. and his wife were thrown out of the vehicle and severely injured.

Wm. Devoe, a notorious bank robber, was arrested at Woodstock, Vermont, on Saturday, July 12. He was passing money of the Dorchester and Milton Bank, stolen some time ago, and snapped a pistol and drew a knife on the officers, but was secured and locked up.

The Trinity Catholic Church in New Orleans, which was seized by the Sheriff in consequence of some difficulties between the Bishop and Pastor, has just been destroyed by fire. The well known facts of the case suggested that it was possibly the work of an incendiary, a party to the quarrel. Loss $25,000.

In New Orleans, the other day, a duel was fought between Dr. Thomas Hunt and J. W. Frost, of the New Orleans Crescent, in which the latter was killed, having received a ball through the heart. The weapons used were guns.

A severe hail storm passed over Kittery and York, Maine, on Sunday before last, doing great injury to buildings and vegetation. 5,000 panes of glass were broken in Kittery, and the corn, grain, fruit, and potatoes in the range of the storm were generally destroyed. Trees were stripped of leaves, and many of them of their branches, while some were torn up by the roots. Geese, turkeys, chickens, and birds, were destroyed and lay dead upon the ground. A piece of ice was picked up in Kittery, measuring two feet square and two inches in thickness.

A correspondent of the Bangor Democrat states that the hail storm of the 6th inst. was very destructive in Patton, Me. Small hail covered the ground in most parts of the town as white as winter, but the scene of destruction was about half a mile wide, where the hail was about the size of hen's eggs, of the hardest ice, in a round form, and pouring down in such quantities, with a furious tempest of wind, shaking and clattering of the houses, that windows were not heard to break, although the glass was strewn in all directions.

The Toledo Blade is informed that there is now in store at that place 270,000 bushels of corn and 110,000 bushels of wheat, being 50,000 bushels more than has ever been in store in that city at any one time before. The warehouses are said to be filled, and vessels are very scarce, causing an advance in freights. The receipts for 48 hours previous to July 3d, were about 40,000 bushels corn, 14,651 do. wheat, 5,200 do. oats, and 614 bbls. flour.

In Cincinnati, the result of ten days' experience proves an increase in the business of the Post-Office of fifty per cent. There is a general disposition among the business men to adopt the custom of pre-payment in all cases, and where an answer is expected, to inclose a stamp, so that the Department will be secured against the immense losses heretofore accruing from dead letters.

The Western Reserve friends of Freedom, at their Mass Convention at Ravenna, resolved to call a National Anti-Slavery Convention to meet at Cleveland, September 14, for the purpose of consulting together as to the next Presidential canvass, and to harmonize and unite all the sentiment of the nation opposed to slavery and the slave power.

The Boston Traveler states that the Lane Seminary has the refusal of the splendid library of Dr. Neander, of Berlin, for thirty days. It consists of nearly 5,000 volumes, most of which are standard works, and many of them very rare and of great value. The price demanded is only $3,000.

A destructive freshet has occurred on the Juniata River and Canal. In many places they are one stream. Several Railroad and Canal bridges have been carried away, and the Canal is greatly injured. A family consisting of the mother and six children, were drowned by the flood in Huntingdon county.

During fifteen days in the month of June, nearly one million baskets of strawberries were brought to New York city over the Ramapo and Paterson Railroad and Jersey City Ferry. Most of these were gathered within a district of about eight miles square, contiguous to the Ramapo Road. At the average rate of four cents a basket, the return must have been about $40,000.

J. M. Morris, for several years teacher of the Marlboro' (Ohio) Seminary, was thrown from a fractious horse on Saturday, (Sabbath,) July 5, in the village of Marlboro', and so badly injured that he died in a short time. He had just returned from Cleveland, where he had been attending the Teachers' Convention.

In Providence, R. I., a few days ago, three persons were poisoned by eating some noxious seed, supposed to be henbane, which had been gathered with some greens, of which the family had partaken for dinner. They were all taken violently sick immediately after eating, and one of them has since died.

Clergymen's Sore Throat,

BY DR. W. W. HALL, New York, who devotes his whole attention to the treatment of the three diseases, Throat-ail, an affection of the top of the windpipe; Bronchitis, of the branches of the windpipe; Consumption, of the lungs themselves, which are little air cells, from the size of a pea down, at the ends of the branches of the windpipe, as leaves are at the ends of the branches of a tree. How do persons get Throat-ail, Bronchitis, and Consumption? How may this last be certainly distinguished from the others, and in its very earliest stages, when alone a cure is to be hoped for. Cutting out the Tonsils and Palate not necessary, and sometimes dangerous, always hurtful for life. Cod-Liver Oil, Nitrate of Silver alone, not efficient, often injurious. In Consumption, patent contrivances, braces, and supporters, absurd and mischievous. Secret and even known medicines long continued, shorten life. Pure air, pure water, appropriate nutriment, external means, these only reliable.

Are sea voyages, coast situations, going from home or to the South, desirable? Tables of Food, time of digestion, ease of do., per cent. of Nutriment, of Carbon, of Nitrogen; adapted to common readers. Price 50 cents full bound; 25 cents in paper; 5 cents in pamphlet form, only describing these ailments—in postage stamps to those at a distance. J. S. REDFIELD,

Central Railroad of New Jersey.

Summer Arrangements, commencing Monday, March 31, 1851.

THIS Road extends from ELIZABETHPORT, 35 miles, to WHITE HOUSE, N J, reducing the staging between the terminus of the Road and EASTON to 25 miles.

This line leaves New York by steamboat Red Jacket from pier No 1 North River, and connects with trains on the New Jersey Railroad, which leaves New York from foot of Cortland-st.

TRINS UP—Leave New York by steamboat Red Jacket, pier No 1 North River, at 9 A M, passenger; 1 P M, freight; and 5 P M, passenger; and by N J Railroad, foot of Cortland-st, at 9 A M, and 2 and 5¼ P M.

Trains leave White House and following places for New York as follows:

White House at 3¼ A M, freight; 5 40 A M, passenger, at 1 40 P M.

Somerville at 4 30 A M, freight; at 6 05 A M, passenger, at 2 05 P M.

Bound Brook at 4 50 A M, freight; at 6 15 A M, passenger, at 2 15 P M.

Plainfield at 5 20 A M, freight; at 6 35 A M, passenger, at 2 35 P M.

Westfield at 5 50 A M, freight; at 6 50 A M, passenger, at 2 50 P M.

Elizabethtown at 7 15 A M; freight at 10 30 A M; passenger at 3 15 P M.

Elizabethport at 7 30 A M; freight at 10 45 A M; passenger at 3 30 P M.

On Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, trains leave Somerville for Pespack, Lesser Cross-Roads, and Pluckamin.

STAGES will be in readiness on the arrival of the 9 A M train from New York at the White House to convey passengers to Easton, Wilkesbarre, Bethlehem, Allentown, and Mauch Chunk, Penn, and to Clinton, Flemington, Lebanon, Milford, and Belvidere, N J.

N B—All BAGGAGE at the risk of the owners until delivered into the actual possession of the Agents of the Company and checks or receipts given therefor.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress
Rev. J W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—

The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term. Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting,	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

Board, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

The Christian Review.

THE removal of this Quarterly to New York more than a year since, and its elevation in character, the Publishers are happy to say, have greatly increased its circulation. Seeing this readiness to appreciate and patronize their efforts, they are determined to spare no pains or expense in raising the work to the highest point of excellence, every way worthy of its position in the metropolis of the nation, and as the organ of one of the most numerous and respectable denominations in the land.

TERMS.

For a single copy, three dollars per annum. No subscriptions received for less than a volume commencing with the Jan. No. of each year.

Every person forwarding the subscription price of four copies, shall receive a fifth copy gratis.

POSTAGE PRE-PAID.

When paid in advance, the postage will be pre-paid by the Publishers; or, the postage will be pre-paid on all numbers issued after the payment of the subscription.

☞ NEW POSTAGE LAW. ☜

This offer of pre-payment of postage is of more importance in consequence of the new law. The postage under 500 miles is the same as before; over 500 and under 1,500 miles the postage will be double; over 1,500 and under 2,500 miles, treble; and over 2,500 and 3,500, quadruple.

☞ If, however, the postage is pre-paid it is only one-half the above rates.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

This periodical has at last taken its true position. It will now challenge comparison with the best religious Reviews—proving that the Baptists have intellectual power and diversity enough to maintain a denominational Quarterly of the highest standard. [Watchman and Reflector.

In tasteful and correct mechanical execution the "Review" is not surpassed by any of the Quarterlies. . . . Every minister should have it; and we wonder that more of our lay brethren, of educated mind, literary taste, and pecuniary ability, do not subscribe. [Michigan Christian Herald.

We take pleasure in commending the "Christian Review"—ever a visitor to many of our homes—to southern patronage. [Southern Baptist.

This is one of the best Quarterlies in the United States, and may, in fact, be regarded as a model of its kind. [Western Literary Messenger.

We have always regarded the "Christian Review" as an able, candid, and fearless exponent of truth, both in religion and literature. It is eminently catholic in its spirit, and comprehensive in its scope. We commend it, cordially, to religious readers. [Southern Literary Gazette.

Miscellaneous.

A Fortunate Kiss.

The following little story by Miss Bremer is furnished to Sartain's Magazine. For its truth and reality she says she will be responsible:—

In the University of Upsala, in Sweden, lived a young student, a lonely youth, with a great love for studies, but without means for pursuing them. He was poor, and without connections. Still he studied, living in great poverty, but keeping a cheerful heart, and trying not to look at the future, which looked so grimly at him. His good humor and good qualities made him beloved by his young comrades. Once he was standing in the great square of Upsala prating away an hour of leisure, when the attention of the young men became arrested by a very young and elegant lady, who, at the side of an elderly one, walked slowly over the place. It was the daughter of the Governor of Upland, living in the city, and the lady living with her was her governess. She was generally known for her beauty and for her goodness and gentleness of character, and was looked upon with great admiration by the students. As the young men now stood silently gazing at her, as she passed on, one of them exclaimed:

"Well, it would be worth something to have a kiss from such a mouth!"

The poor young student, the hero of our story, who was looking intently upon that pure and angelic face, exclaimed as if by inspiration, "Well, I think I could have it."

"What!" cried his friends in a chorus, "are you crazy? Do you know her?" etc.

"Not at all," he answered; "but I think she would kiss me, just now, if I asked her."

"What, in this place, before all our eyes?"

"In this place, before your eyes."

"Freely?"

"Freely."

"Well, if she will give you a kiss in that manner; I will give you a thousand dollars!" exclaimed one of the party.

"And I!" "And I!" cried three or four others; for it so happened that several rich young men were in the group, and bets ran high on so improbable an event, and the challenge was made and received in less time than we take to relate it.

Our hero—(my authority tells me not whether he was handsome or plain; I have my peculiar reasons for thinking he was rather plain, but singularly good-looking at the same time)—our hero immediately walked off to meet the young lady. He bowed to her, and said, "my lady, (min fröleen,) my fortune is in your hand." She looked at him in astonishment, but arrested her steps. He proceeded to state his name and condition, his aspiration, and related simply and truly what had just passed between him and his companions. The young lady listened attentively, and when he ceased to speak, she said, blushing, but with great sweetness: "If by so little a thing so much good can be effected, it would be foolish in me to deny your request;" and she kissed the young man publicly in the open square.

Next day the young student was sent for by the Governor. He wanted to see the man who had dared to ask a kiss off his daughter in that way, and whom she had consented to kiss so. He received him with a severe and scrutinizing brow, but after an hour's conversation, was so pleased with him that he offered him to dine at his table during his studies in Upsala.

Our young friend now pursued his studies in a manner which soon made him regarded as the most promising scholar at the University. Three years were not passed after the day of the first kiss, when the young man was allowed to give a second one to the daughter of the Governor, as his intended bride.

He became later one of the greatest scholars in Sweden, as much respected for his learning as for his character. His works will endure forever among the works of science; and from his happy union sprang a family well known in Sweden in the present day, and whose wealth of fortune and high position in society are regarded as small things, compared with its wealth of goodness and love.

Affecting Suicide.

The Cork Constitution gives the following romantic and affecting account of the suicide of a soldier in the frenzy of love: "Some weeks since a private soldier of the 40th Regiment, quartered in the garrison, named Alfred Winstanly, an Englishman about 28 years of age, became acquainted with a young woman named Mary Low, the daughter of a military pensioner. His proposal of marriage was accepted, with the proviso that he got leave to marry from his commanding officer. This he was reluctant to ask, for some cause which remains unexplained, and her parents, considering it imprudent to sanction the marriage of their daughter under any other condition, determined to conclude the intimacy between her and Winstanly by sending her on a visit to London. On June 25, he got leave to remain out of barracks until 11 o'clock, and visited Low's house, where he remained until 10½. During this time he learnt that Mary was to leave Cork the next morning at 7 o'clock, by the Ajax steamer for London. He returned to barracks within his leave, and after reporting himself scaled the walls and escaped, and again returned to Low's and entreated to be admitted, but was refused, though he threatened, if not, to throw himself into the river. Early the next morning he again endeavored to gain admittance into Low's, but was refused, and eventually left, declaring he would destroy himself. He then went into an adjacent house and borrowed a breakfast cup. From this he proceeded to the oil and color shop of Mr. Dennis Connor, in North Main street, where he asked for half-pint of oil of vitrol, for, as he said, removing stains from his cross belts. Having got the vitrol in the cup, he hurried along Kyrl's-quay to Levitt's-quay, where he met Mary Low with her mother and sisters on her way to the steamship. In a frenzied manner he asked her "If she would deceive him—if she was about to leave him who was so fond of her?" She moved on, and he followed, and, holding up the cup, said "Mary, you know I love you, and if you don't stop and marry me this will end my existence. You know I can't live without you, and this must put me out of pain." Her mother then pushed her from him, when he immediately drank the vitrol, threw the cup into the river, and leaped several feet from the ground screaming frightfully. At this moment a private soldier of the 84th Regiment came up, when Winstanly pointing after Mary Low, said, "There—there she is; she's the cause of it; it is she's to blame." Acting constable Edwards came up and removed the unfortunate man to the North Infirmary, where he was at once attended by Dr. Popham and Surgeon Gordon, who administered carbonate of magnesie and the usual antidotes, but the corrosive effects of the poison were so immediate as to render all efforts unavailing. Dr. Haverty, the surgeon of the 40th, subsequently saw him, and continued, with Dr. Popham, to attend him until his death, which took place at 2 o'clock yesterday morning, after indescribable suffering, which he bore with patience. During Thursday, although writhing with pain, he asked of of every person who entered the ward in which he lay, "Is she coming? for if I get but one glimpse of her, it will remove all my pain, and I shall die easy." Deceased had a medal and star for several engagements in India, where he had served with credit.

The Apple Tree Borer.

One of the greatest of all evils that the fruit-grower has to contend against is the apple tree borer, which also attacks the quince, mountain ash, white ash, locust, hawthorn, and the aronias. This borer is the larvæ of the two-striped saperda, (Saperda bivittati,) in its perfect state. This beetle comes forth from the tree in June, in the night, flying from tree to tree for food or companions, resting in the day-time among the leaves on which it feeds. In June, July, and sometimes in August, it deposits eggs on the bark of the tree, at or near the ground. The larvæ or young borers from these eggs are fleshy, round, whitish grubs, without legs. This grub eats through the bark, and remains there the first winter. The next season it penetrates the wood, throwing out dust or cuttings, like saw-dust, by which it may be traced, generally ascending as it proceeds, and boring deeper into the tree. Its whole passage is usually about twelve to fifteen inches. The third season, nearly two years from its entrance, it approaches the surface, where it undergoes its final transformation, becomes a beetle, and leaves the tree. Rarely the borer gets off the track, and descends; sometimes it enters the tree several feet above the ground, and seldom it enters the limbs of the tree.

Keep the trees well washed and the bark smooth, and keep the grass, weeds, and rubbish away from the trees, that they may be examined conveniently. During the time of depositing the eggs, wash the trees occasionally with a rather strong ley of wood-ashes, or a solution of one pound of potash to two gallons of water. A strong ley is liable to injure the trees. These and other corrosive substances may destroy the eggs or annoy the insects, but they are not always sure. The borers may enter between the roots that branch high, where washes do not effect, or the eggs may not be destroyed; therefore keep the trees smooth and clear of every thing around them, and examine them often; and when the young borers have just penetrated the bark, they are easily destroyed. So attend to them the first season.

Make a wash of two quarts of soft soap or whale-oil soap, half a pound of sulphur, and two gallons of water. Add also camphorated spirit asafœtida, tobacco, and other offensive substances, and wash the tree with it. A little clay or lime added will make a coating holding these substances, which may be offensive to the beetle, or young borers, and prevent their operations.

After the borers have penetrated the trees, they may be cut out with a chisel or gouge; or they may be destroyed by running a wire or other flexible substance into the hole. They have also been destroyed by putting a match of burning brimstone into the hole, or a piece of camphor, and plugging the hole.

The Art of Flying.

A French journal has a letter from Madrid giving an account of a successful experiment with a new apparatus for flying. The flyer was a Miss Juanita Parez, who, though rather fat and corpulent, moved through the air by the help of wings, with great ease and rapidity. She was advertised to fly a distance of above 1,200 feet, rising in the air above 600, but exceeded the programm both in hight and distance. No description of the structure of the wings is given. They have a spread of some fifteen feet, are fastened by ligaments of great flexibility, and arranged so as to move with great rapidity; they make a noise like a wind-mill. The astonishment of Madrid at so novel a phenomenon is described as immense.

A Mr. Thomas Darville, at Paris, also announces that he has invented a complete apparatus for flying, and he proposes to exhibit it at the Champ de Mars in the course of the present month, when he will fly from the Military School to Challiott. He will be accompanied by his two sons, of twenty-two one and the other of seventeen years. The preparation of three sets of wings has delayed the exhibition until now. The inventor has tried his apparatus privately, with complete success, having flown across the Seine at 1 o'clock in the morning. His wings have a spread of fifteen feet, and by their help the flyer can move up and down in the air with all the facility of a swallow, skimming along near the ground, or mounting upright to the sky at his pleasure. [N. Y. Tribune.

Architect of the Crystal Palace.

Some thirty years ago, a young man, a gardener, who worked for 12s. a week at a garden near the Duke of Devonshire's villa at Chiswick, five miles west of Hyde-park, said or did something which offended the master-gardener, and was turned off. He was standing unemployed one day near the Duke's garden-gate. His grace in passing spoke to him, entered into familiar conversation, ascertained that he was a journeyman gardener out of work, and walking into the garden, the young man with him, was pleased with his intelligence and manners—not the manners of a sycophant sneaking up to the side of a nobleman, with sycophantish words, but the manners of an intelligent man, who knew his profession, and could speak about it to another, no matter whom. The Duke asked him to call at Devonshire House the next day, and the young man did, and the call resulted in his being sent down to Chatsworth, in Derbyshire. There he soon made way, and reached, as a practical and scientific gardener, the very head of his profession, which position he had long maintained before he was known to the world as Mr. Paxton the designer of the Crystal Palace. Such was, according to the conversation now prevalent at Chiswick, and about the Horticultural Garden's, the origin of Mr. Paxton's connection with the Duke of Devonshire. [Man. Guard.

Writing Machine for the Blind.

In a recent notice of the proceedings of the Paris Society for the Encouragement of Arts &c., it was mentioned that a medal had been awarded to Foucault for an invention, by which the blind are enabled to communicate their ideas by writing, or rather printing. A gold medal was also awarded to M. Foucault, by the jury at the Paris Expositions, in 1849, on which occasion the instrument was first exhibited.

"In order fully to appreciate," say the jury in their report, "the great importance of this valuable invention, we have but to think of the great length of time which has elapsed since the want of such a machine has been felt, and the number of experiments which M. Foucault must have performed, to have enabled him to overcome the numerous difficulties with which he had to contend. Of all the methods adopted to give graphic expression to the ideas of the blind, M. Foucault has chosen the one which may be considered the simplest and most perfect. In fact, by the use of this machine, the blind are even more favorably circumstanced than those who are able to see, inasmuch as they are enabled to write without having formed a single letter. All that is required is to know how to read by the touch, in order to be capable of expressing their ideas in an eminently legible manner, since all the letters are in typographic characters.

"The process employed to obtain this interesting result is as follows: All the letters of the alphabet, executed in relief, and of larger dimensions, are fixed in the upper extremety of a metalic rod, made to slide longitudinally, with a suitable continuous canal; they are placed on the same plane, and in the form of a vane, each of them exhibiting on its lower part the same letter as on its upper part. This letter, of a small size, is exactly that of a printing character; the mechanical arrangement is such, that all the letters converge towards the same point, and on being successively pressed by the fingers, the impress of each becomes placed above, forming only a black mass; but whenever a letter is touched, the paper by the same movement, changes its place, and thus the writing, or rather printing is produced which is at the same time distinct, well arranged, and properly spaced—when the line is finished, the paper changes place in a perpendicular direction to the former, and the operation is renewed.

"In addition to this, a series of types, forming ciphers, and all the supplementary marks used in writing, is placed in the same way, and in a place convergent with the former; the general arrangement being, that all the types, whatever their order may have been at first, set their impress on the same point. M. Foucault prefers the use of tracing paper, such as is employed in copying machines. The manipulation is extremely simple, and admits of great rapidity of execution."

The jury concluded by complimenting M. Foucault, (who himself is blind,) on the great success which has crowned his long continued efforts to promote the great philanthropic object of teaching the blind to write. It appears that he has been engaged for several years in the construction and perfecting of his machine, which by his latest improvements, appears to have attained a degree of perfection almost unlooked for. M. Foucault's machine is shown in the French department of the London Exhibition.

From England to Australia.

A committee of the British Parliament has reported in favor of establishing a steamboat communication between England and Australia. At present, voyages out take, on the average, 119 days, and 138 back, making the course of post about eight months. The steam navigation company engage, should Parliament adopt the report, to perform the outward passage in 64 days, and the homeward in 68, being a saving in time of nearly one half. This is proposed to be done by auxiliary screw steamers of from 1400 to 1700 tons with 250 to 300 horse power, at an average rate of 8½ knots the hour. Three routes were before the committee. One was by Panama, via Tahita and New Zealand to Sydney; another by the overland Indian route, from Alexandria, Suez, and Aden to Point de Galle, and thence by Singapore, Port Phillips, or the Straits of Sunda; a third by the Cape of Good Hope. The latter route was adopted, as having the most advantages and the fewest drawbacks, there being no land transit or change of vessels, and the climate being comparatively free from the tropical heats of the other routes. The charges by the route adopted will be reasonable, viz., £70 for first class passengers, £30 for second class, and £12 for the steerage.

How Should Cream be Kept?

This question is often asked, and is answered in different ways. We say that cream is sweeter when kept out of a damp cellar or well than when kept in it. Cream is kept best in a cool back room above ground, or chiefly so, it ought to be stirred daily while it is kept, otherwise mouldy particles gather on the surface of the pots.

Milk also, set for cream, yields more cream when placed above ground, and it rises sooner also. Any one may prove this by a trial of both modes. Much is said about keeping cream sweet, but cream perfectly sweet is not easily churned. It should undergo a change in order to make good butter. The act of churning produces a chemical change in the cream, and though the cream may have a sour taste, the butter is not necessarily sour. The nature of it is changed on churning.

A room above ground on the north side of a large building, well shaded with trees is a better place for setting than any damp cellar we have seen. In such a room all the cream will rise in thirty-six hours that is really valuable. [Mass. Ploughman.

THE HOME AND GRAVE OF THE AUTHOR OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.—A correspondent of the Uniontown Democrat, who has recently visited Monticello, the residence of Jefferson, thus describes it:—

"The interior of the house is just as Jefferson left it, except the furniture which is all gone, save some paintings, mirrors, &c. The house, both outside and inside, bears all the evidence of neglect and decay, but it still retains all its fair proportions, and its venerable outline grown gray and mossy by time and neglect, perhaps adds, rather than otherwise, to its appearance, particularly to a stranger. And the venerable aspen trees growing around, throw a kind of melancholy over everything, that seems to whisper in your ear, and point you about three hundred yards down in the woods to the grave of him who planted them—to the humblest grave in appearance that ever held the ashes of human greatness. I made a sketch over it. I inclose you a little flower from a branch of vines said to have been planted by Jefferson himself, beneath the window of the room in which he died; they have spread all over the side of the house."

Curran's Ingenuity.

A farmer, attending a fair with a hundred pounds in his pocket, took the precaution of depositing it in the hands of the landlord of the public house at which he stopped. Having occasion for it shortly afterwards, he resorted to mine host for the bailment, but the landlord, too deep for the countryman, wondered what hundred was meant, and was quite sure no such sum had ever been lodged in his hands by the astonished rustic. After ineffectual appeals to the landlord, the farmer applied to Curran for advice. "Have patience, my friend," said the counsel; "speak to the landlord civilly, and tell him you are convinced you must left your money with some other person. Take a friend with you, and lodge with him another hundred in the presence of your friend, and then come to me." We must imagine, and not commit to paper, the vociferations of the honest dupe, at such advice; however, moved by the rhetoric or authority of the worthy counsel, he followed it, and returned to his legal friend. "And now, sir, I don't see as I'm to be better off for this, if I get my second hundred again; but how is that to be done?" "Go and ask him for it when he is alone," said the counsel. "Ay, sir, but asking won't do, I's afraid, without my witness, at any rate." "Never mind, take my advice," said the counsel; "do as I bid you, and return to me." The farmer returned with his hundred; glad at any rate to find that safe again in his posession. "Now, sir, I suppose I must be content, but I don't see as I'm much better off." "Well, then," said the counsel, "now take your friend with you, and ask the landlord for the hundred pounds your friend saw you leave with him." We need not add, that the wily landlord found that he had been taken off his guard, while our honest friend (whom one would almost wish to have tried the second time) returned to thank his counsel exultingly, with both hundreds in his pocket.

Another Jew Member of Parliament.

We cut the following from the Liverpool Mercury of July 1:—

The vacancy in the representation of Greenwich was filled up on Friday last. The candidates were Mr. Alderman Salomons and Mr. David Wire, the former a Jew, and the latter an old and energetic advocate of Jewish emancipation. Not only are they personal friends, but their political opinions are almost identical. Both are Free Traders; both are willing to extend the suffrage to every payer of rates and taxes; both are friendly to vote by ballot and to general education. Mr. Salomons was described as princely in his benificence, and one whose catholicity of spirit had induced him to found schools for the education of Protestant children; while Mr. Wire was spoken of as the multitude of charities. The supporter of Mr. Wire contended that their candidate could render better service to the cause of Jewish liberty than Mr. Salomons, seeing that the former could at once take his seat, and that the latter could not. Mr. Salomons denied that he was disqualified, and stated that if he was elected he would go down to the House of Commons and take his seat, instead of allowing himself to be bandied about between the two Houses of Parliament, as Baron Rothschilds had done. At the close of the poll, the voting stood as follows: For Mr. Salomons, 2,165; for Mr. Wire, 1,278; majority for the former, 887.

Antipathy to Spiders.

Few people like spiders. No doubt these insects must have their merits and their uses, since none of God's creatures are made in vain; all living things are endowed with instinct more or less admirable; but the spider's plotting, creeping ways, and a sort of wicked expression about him, lead one to dislike him as a near neighbor. In a battle between a spider and a fly, one always sides with the fly; and yet of the two the last is certainly the most troublesome insect to man. But the fly is frank and free in all his doings; he seeks his food openly, and pursues his pastimes openly; suspicions of others, or covert designs against them, are quite unknown to him, and there is something almost confiding in the way in which he sails around you, when a single stroke of your hand might destroy him. The spider, on the contrary lives by snares and plots; he is at the same time very designing and very suspicious, both cowardly and fierce; he always moves stealthily as though among enemies, retreating before the least appearance of danger, solitary and morose, holding no communion with his fellows. His whole appearance corresponds with his character, and it is not surprising, therefore, that while a fly is more mischevious to us than the spider, we yet look upon the first with more favor than the last; for it is the natural impulse of the human heart to prefer that which is open and confiding to that which is wily and suspicious, even in the brute creation. The cunning and designing man himself will at times, find a feeling of respect and regard for the guileless and generous stealing over him, his heart, as it were, giving the lie to his life.

A NEW REMEDY IN DIARRHEA, CHOLERA INFANTUM, AND CHOLERA MORBUS.—We have the following recipe, says the N. Y. Tribune, from the Professor of Chemistry in the N. Y. Hospital:—

"I would wish, through the medium of your paper, to give publicity to the fact, that I have seen instant relief given in cases of Diarrhea, by the use of Hydro Sulphuric Acid, a tea spoonfull of a saturated solution being mixed with four times its bulk of water. Also in a case of Cholera Infantum, in which the child was very much reduced, and the stomach in an extreme state of irritability, so that nothing would be retained, this remedy was administered with ease, and the child immediately improved, and has since recovered. Believing that this is a new remedy, and that there is no reason to apprehend any effects where it does not produce a cure, and believing that it has some specific effect in counteracting the cause, and immediately arresting the diseases.

I am, Yours respectfully,
LAWRENCE REED.

Watering Horses.

We see every summer hundreds of incidents of horses being killed by giving them water when over-heated while traveling. It would seem that drivers generally think that the preservation of the horse's life consists in having him watered at every tavern they come to. But we would condemn it as being a most absurd and unnecessary practice. A farmer who works his horses at a plow, harrow, or cart, never gives them water from the time they go to work, after breakfast until they come in at noon. In France, coachmen never water their horses except when they feed, and if you take the trouble to inquire into the effect of the system in that country, you will find it has a salutary influence. When the driver stops at an inn he washes the horse's nose with a little vinegar in a sponge.

A TREATY DEFEATED BY WIND-MILLS.—In a memoir of himself, written by Mr. Jefferson in 1821, he gives the following account (which we clip from the N. Y. Evening Post,) of the fate of a treaty with Portugal, which he and Mr. Adams had made in London, in the year 1786:—

"While in London we entered into negotiations with the Chevalier Pinto, Ambassador of Portugal at that place. The only article of difficulty between us was, a stipulation that our breadstuffs should be received in Portugal in the form of flour as well as of grain. He approved of it himself, but observed that several nobles of great influence at their court, were the owners of wind-mills in the neighborhood of Lisbon, which depended much for their profits on manufacturing our wheat, and that this stipulation would endanger the whole treaty. We signed it, however, and its fate was what he candidly portended."

HESSIAN FLAG.—There is now in Alexandria, Va., the first flag taken during the Revolution by Gen. Washington from the Hessians, at Trenton. It is composed of silk, beautifully embroidered in needle-work—the crown appears prominent, and the date 1775 on the front. Also, the identical flag surrendered at the battle of Yorktown. It was the flag of the seventh regiment, and now bears this inscription: "The surrender of Lord Cornwallis, being the crowning glory of the complete success of the American arms." The flag is of rich silk, well perforated with bullet holes. General Washington's body-guard flag is also there—silk, with the motto, "Conquer, or die."

ANECDOTE OF JOHN ADAMS.—When John Adams was a young man, he was invited to dine with the Court and Bar at the house of Judge Paine, an eminent Royalist, at Worcester. When the wine was circulated round the table, Judge Paine gave, as a toast, "the King." Some of the whigs were about to refuse to drink it. But Mr. Adams whispered to them to comply, saying, "We shall have an opportunity to return the compliment." At length, when John Adams was desired to give a toast, he gave "the Devil." As the host was about to resent the supposed indignity, his wife calmed him, and turned the laugh upon Mr. Adams by immediately saying, "My dear, as the gentleman has seen fit to drink to our friend, let us by no means refuse in our turn, to drink to his."

GUTTA PERCHA TYPES.—The Knaresboro' correspondent of the Leeds Times says:—We have now before us some impressions taken from gutta percha printing types, manufactured by John Burnistown of this town, the printer of a small monthly publication, called the Northern Luminary. The impressions are almost equal to those obtained from metal types, decidedly superior to wood, and the maker avers that they can be produced at much less cost. He intended to have exhibited specimens at the World's Fair, but his application for space has been rejected by the local committee.

Variety.

There is an exhibition at the warehouse of the Patent Merchandise Company, 240 Broadway, New York, a contrivance especially adapted for the babies. It is called the "Baby Walker," and consists of a handsome upholstered frame-work, elevated upon legs and castors, in which the child is seated upon a kind of saddle, and whereby it may wheel itself at perfect freedom and be secure from injury. The facility for exercise alone is an excellent feature of the invention, beside the inducements it offers by easy helps to teach a child the proper use of its limbs.

The Harlem Railroad Company have placed upon their city track a car of new and peculiar and elegant finish and furniture which seems to be a great improvement upon those ordinarily in use. The car has no platforms on the ends except sufficient for the driver to stand upon; the doors are in the sides of the center, and the seats form semi-circles at the ends, thus giving more room and better facilities for egress with additional comfort to passengers. The floor of the car is brought much nearer the ground.

The Camptown (Ky.) Journal says that a citizen of that place, lately took ninety head of beef cattle from that place to New York city by the railroad through this State, and returned home in eleven days with the proceeds of the sale. The expense per head was $14 43, and the shrinkage hardly anything. When driven by foot it required seventy-five days and cost $20 per head, and was attended with a heavy loss by shrinkage.

A writer in the San Francisco Picayune states, as a fact illustrative of the resources of of California, that in the building now being erected on Commercial street, by Moffat & Co. for the U. S. Assay Office, the bricks used have been furnished from the sources following: China, Liverpool, Australia, Sacramento, New York, New Orleans, Stockton, Mission Dolores, Boston, and Baltimore.

A trial of engines was made in England on the South-Eastern Railway, on the 14th June, in the presence of the officers of the road and several scientific men. One of Crampton's patent-engines ran from London to Ashford and back, eighty miles, at the rate of seventy miles an hour. The increased speed produced no increase of oscillation, the engine remaining much steadier than the ordinary ones.

A Cincinnati paper states that Dr. Muzzey was lately called on to perform a singular operation upon the head of a young lady residing in John street. It appeared that, she had been in the habit of twisting and tying her hair so tightly that the scalp had become parted from the skull, and it was found necessary to open the scalp to remove the matter which had accumalated beneath.

New Era for the "Best Youth's Magazine!"

☞ GREAT REDUCTION OF POSTAGE! ☜

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET,

STILL under the editorial charge of FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, commences a new series with the issue of the number for July, 1851. This number is now ready. Now is the time to subscribe.

The great reduction in postage goes into effect on the first day of July. From and after that day, the postage on a single number of the Cabinet (paid quarterly, in advance) will be, for any distance not over 500 miles, 1 cent; over 500, and not over 1500, 2 cents—it being a reduction to all subscribers within 500 miles from 42 cents to 12 cents per annum, to all other subscribers in the Union a reduction of almost one half from the old rates. The publisher anticipates, as the result of this liberal reduction, a large and immediate addition to his subscription list from every part of the country, as the former high rates of postage have deterred many from receiving the work by mail.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet, in its reading matter, in the number, variety, and beauty of its illustrations, and in its general costume, now stands at the head of all monthly publications for the young. "It is unqualifiedly the best youth's magazine in America."—Brattleboro Democrat. "It is a model for all works of its class. We cannot too warmly commend it."—N. Y. Tribune. "It gives us pleasure to recommend it to our southern friends."—Balt. West. Continent. "Best magazine for youth we have ever seen."—Christ. Adv. & Jour. "It is a little world within itself."—N. Y. Independent. "Best publication of its class that I am acquainted with."—Rev. Dr. Adams.

Each number contains 32 pages, and some 8 or 10 beautiful engravings. The reading matter is just such as is best adapted to amuse, entertain, and instruct the young mind.

☞ Please send on your orders at once. Specimen numbers can be seen at the office of this paper, or they will be forwarded, gratis, on application, (post paid,) to the publisher. Subscribers may send money by mail, at the publisher's risk.

Terms, (invariably in advance,) $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5.

Clergymen, postmasters, editors, and school teachers, who will form clubs of four or more, and who will forward the money, shall be allowed an additional copy for their trouble; or they are authorized to retain 25 per cent. on all new subscriptions, where the full price ($1) is paid.

Bound volumes, (of which there are now 5,) $1 25 each; the whole set, $5 50.

☞ Postage Free!—Subscribers at a distance, who will remit the full price ($1 25 each) shall receive the volumes postage free. These volumes contain nearly 500 pages each.

AGENTS WANTED.

The publisher wishes to employ several gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, Publisher.
118 Nassau-st., New York.

NOTE.—The publishers or editors of those newspapers to whom this advertisement is sent, MARKED, are requested to give it (not including this note) some half a dozen conspicuous insertions; for which they shall be entitled to receive a copy of the Cabinet, monthly, for two years, on their sending to the address of "Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet" copies of the papers containing the advertisement; or, if preferred, they shall receive one volume of the Cabinet bound in muslin, and a copy of "Woodworth's Stories about Animals," illustrated with 40 engravings. Those who prefer the latter, must signify such preference and inform us how the books are to be sent. D. A. WOODWORTH.

SABBATH SCHOOLS & BIBLE CLASSES.

A Report prepared by J. M. Allen, adopted by the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, and published at its request.

(Concluded.)

Let us now turn and consider for a moment the method of organizing and conducting Sabbath Schools, and our responsibilities in connection with them.

The Pastor has important duties to perform relative to Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. It is conceived to be his duty to take the general supervision of them, and see that every school district within the limits of his church, if no more, is well supplied with Sabbath Schools during at least the warm season of the year. He should see that the teaching talent of his church is called out and well applied. If there is a superabundance in one place, and a deficiency in another, let him transfer until the deficiency is supplied. Others, of course, can assist in this matter; but the pastor is supposed, from the very nature of his calling, to understand the wants of the various neighborhoods better than any other man. He also knows those of his congregation who are suitable for teachers. There are many neighborhoods which hold back from such an enterprise for want of a little encouragement and assistance on the part of their Pastor. There are many young men and women, willing and anxious to engage in such a work, but kept back by diffidence and the fear of giving offense, who might be brought out by a little timely encouragement. After these schools have been established, let him visit each school at least once or twice each season, to see how they are getting along, and to make such suggestions, and give such advice and instruction, as he may deem necessary. Let him, if possible, hold an annual examination of all the schools under his supervision. This examination may be of each school separately, or of all collectively—the latter would be better. These seasons should be spent in ascertaining the proficiency of the scholars, their interest and faithfulness in the study of the Bible, their moral deportment, and in giving addresses for the especial benefit of the young.

If this or some similar method should be pursued by Pastors generally, it would give character, permanence, and efficiency, to these schools, which cannot otherwise be attained, and supply a link that is greatly needed in the moral education of the young. When a Pastor has discharged his duty to the older members of his flock, the wants of the younger have not been met. Preaching from neighborhood to neighborhood will not entirely meet those wants. Visiting from house to house will not entirely meet them. Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes alone will meet these peculiar wants. That minister of the Gospel, if there should be any such, who thinks that these schools do not come within the scope of his duties, or does not feel a lively interest in them, has mistaken the extent of the duties of his office—does not rightly understand the importance and power of this system of Sabbath instruction. It is his duty to meet the cravings of the human mind after divine truths wherever such desires may be found. There is such a desire inherent in the minds of all, especially in the youthful mind. The Athenians had their thousands of altars smoking to as many and diverse gods, yet they were not satisfied until they had one dedicated to the unknown god. Thus man ever toils and struggles on, restless and unsatisfied, amid the various and conflicting theories and falsities thrown up by the workings of his own mind, until he reposes upon truths bearing the impress of direct revelation from Deity. For the purpose of supplying this demand of the human mind, revealing to man his own condition, and leading him directly up to the fountain of all light and truth, the minister preaches sermons, in which it is his object to concentrate the mind upon some particular principle or truth, collating different portions of revelation in reference to this one point, and enforcing its claims upon the hearer by argument and persuasion. For the same purpose, of leading mind to truth, and of preparing it in turn to instruct other minds, we have Theological Seminaries established, where the student is taught Systematic Theology, with the truths of the Bible, collected from their scattered positions, clipped, cut, and compacted into formal systems. For the same purpose, of instructing those whose minds are not so fully prepared for either of the other methods, we have Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes, in which the simple truths of revelation, the first principles of religion, are presented in a manner adapted to the capacities of the recipients. If it is the minister's duty to support and use the others, why is it not his duty to support the latter? It is, is the response of reason and religion. He that said unto his disciples, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God," marked out a broad and plain path of duty for those whose office it is to lead their fellow beings to Christ. If the principle here taught were reduced to practice, there would be fewer youthful sinners reposing beneath the very battlements of Zion; and the Pastor's heart would be less frequently pained by cases of church discipline, arising from the erratic propensities of youthful converts.

The Deacons of the church might very appropriately be appointed Superintendents of the Sabbath Schools in their respective neighborhoods. The Superintendent should ever be a man whose whole soul is in the cause, and who is willing to work accordingly. He should strive to cultivate habits of punctuality, order, neatness, propriety, and a love for the study of the Bible, among all of his pupils, organizing, arranging and conducting the school in a natural, easy, simple manner, so as to attract and delight those to be instructed. Let him see that all divisions and classes are well supplied with suitable teachers. Let him have a general exercise in which the whole school may unite. Their exercises should be, if possible, of such a nature as to interest and instruct all. For the purpose of beginning right early to cultivate the spirit and habit of benevolence, there should be regular periods for taking collections for benevolent objects. The frequency and amount of these contributions might depend upon circumstances and the discretion of those having charge of the schools; but they should, nevertheless, be systematic. At stated seasons, determined by mutual agreement, a part or the whole of the session should be devoted to a Sabbath School Prayer Meeting. At these meetings the general interests of Sabbath Schools should be remembered at the Throne of Grace. Prayers for all impenitent Sabbath School children—prayers for those just commencing a Christian life, or that are seeking such a life—prayers for heathen children that are deprived of like blessings—prayers for teachers, parents, pastors—for all of the great interests of humanity—should be offered. To add interest and variety, and to give instruction, occasional lectures should be delivered to the school by the pastor or some other person. For the same purpose, and for making readers and thinkers, the scholars should be well supplied with suitable reading matter. In this age of schools, of books, and of progress, the young are readers, and will be readers. An intellectual spirit is awakened, and it must be met, cherished, and directed in a proper manner. There is emphatically a youthful hungering and thirsting after knowledge, and the youth must be supplied with healthy, nourishing food, or they will feed on husks and deadly herbs; they must be led to pure fountains, where they may slake their intellectual and moral thirst, or they will drink at poisoned pools.

We hail with pleasure the beginnings which the denomination is making to supply this demand of the youthful mind. The little winged "Visitor," that has come to our Sabbath Schools for a few months past, has come as a messenger of richer things yet in store. Already have its monthly visitations left an impress upon those who have been favored with its calls. They have already learned to welcome it as a little friend, companion, and counselor. Already they begin to think its visits are like angels' visits, "few and far between." Already they begin to reckon time by its calls, and ask, "When will it be next month?" And why? "So that we can have our Sabbath-School Visitor." But this awakening is not enough. The impression must be followed up—the youthful demands must be supplied. We need good Sabbath School Libraries—those that are adapted to the wants of Seventh-day Baptist youth, from which they can draw and read from week to week.

The Teachers of the various classes have important and responsible duties resting upon them. Upon them devolves the immediate duty of imparting religious instruction to those in their respective classes. The eternal interests of souls depend upon the proper and faithful discharge of their duties. Those under their charge are most of them young and pliable, just beginning to receive the impressions of truth. Some of them, perhaps, coming from families where little or no attention is paid to religious instruction, are now to receive their first lessons in biblical knowledge. They are twigs of future oaks. Now, they may be easily bent, and but, if permitted to grow on, until they become rugged, gnarled oaks, they will defy all the powers of man to bend them. There is a downward tendency in the youthful mind, left to run its own course, unchecked, unguided, unguarded by the friendly hand of experience and love. That turbid river, swollen by reason of storms and tempests, until property, happiness, and life, yield to its wrathful sweep, had its origin high up in the mountain, from a little spring, whose pure, sparkling waters, as they came leaping down the mountain-side, could have been turned at pleasure by a man's hand. So, innocent, joyous childhood, can be directed at will into whatever channel you may please; but, if left to itself until it is rolled and tossed by the storms and passions of life, it will sweep on, regardless of opposing circumstances—regardless of the world's welfare and happiness. The Teachers step forward and assume the responsibility of directing the youthful mind into the proper channel. It is a fearful responsibility. Let them prepare to meet it. Let them pray for Divine wisdom and guidance. Let them study faithfully and prayerfully the lessons which they have impressed upon their classes. If possible, all of the teachers of each school should meet together and consult over their lessons, and over the interest of their schools. By this means, erroneous views may be removed, much light and truth gained, and measures for increasing the interest and efficiency of the school adopted. Thus prepared, let the teacher enter upon his labors, trusting in God for success, and he will most assuredly succeed. Returns from the various Sunday-School Societies of the United States, give the joyful intelligence that from fifteen to twenty thousand youthful converts are annually added to the church of Christ through the instrumentality of Sunday Schools. Add to this the probable number converted by the same instrumentality throughout the world, and what a mighty host of ransomed sinners present themselves to cheer the trembling teacher on in his labors! They are so many trophies of grace won in the name of Christ from the dominions of darkness. The oft-repeated shouts of the angels in heaven over the repentant Sabbath School scholar, are so many signals of success.

> "Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined;"

It is the duty of all to throw their influence in favor of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. All the interests we have mentioned require it; and, in addition, among many others, the interests of the Sabbath require it. How many hours of holy time are spent in listless inactivity? How many young men and women, boys and girls, are spending their Sabbaths in idleness, or worse than idleness who ought to be storing their minds with biblical knowledge for future use? How many fathers and mothers in Israel are letting their Sabbath seasons evaporate like the waters of a sluggish stream, who ought to improve each gliding moment in preparing the young to take their places? Thus days, months, years—yes, centuries—of precious Sabbath time is uselessly spent.

Sabbath Schools are of especial importance to the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. The rest of the world is continually acting upon our denominational characteristics like a vast sponge, tending to absorb our vitality. It is the pure love of truth alone, that will secure our youth against the seductive influences of riches, fame, and worldly happiness, more easily attained by falling in with popular opinion. The derelictions from right—from the Bible Sabbath—which have hitherto characterized some members of the denomination, can be prevented only by early and faithfully instructing the young in all of the great truths of the Bible, and especially in those truths which form our distinctive characteristics. They must be taught to cling to truth, and cherish it as they would their life-blood. They must not only love the truth, but they must be taught to contend for it—fight for it. Any great truth in advance of or in opposition to popular opinion, is maintained only by determined effort, and those adopting such truth must expect to lead a militant life. Those belonging to our denomination have got to lead such a life. They should, therefore, be instructed accordingly.

In conclusion, your Committee beg leave to present for your consideration the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That this Association recommends to our churches generally the establishment of Sabbath Schools in every portion of their respective districts where they can possibly be sustained.

2. Resolved, That we cordially recommend the "Sabbath-School Visitor" to every Sabbath School scholar, and that we will use our individual efforts to have it taken and read by all such.

3. Resolved, That this Association recommends to the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, not only the publication of periodicals, but also of books suitable for Sabbath-School scholars, and Sabbath-School libraries.

DEATH OF CHRISTIAN NATIVES.

I have great pleasure, says Mr. Mathews, writing from New Zealand to the English Church Missionary Society, in reporting the case of Arihia, the mother of a young man named Paul, who died a happy believer in the Lord. Some few years since, this woman was one of the congregation at Okahu, at the foot of the beautiful mountain range at the back of our settlement. She possessed a simple, lively, and strong faith in the Redeemer. She often said that she had been a wicked woman in her day, before the Gospel came; and she considered it to be "God's work of mercy" to spare her to hear the words of life. I had known her for many years, and, whether in health or affliction, I esteemed it to be a privilege to converse with her. She could not read, but her memory was well stored with Gospel truths, and her case, as well as numerous others that we have known, serves to show the lasting benefit of our incomparable church service, and also of duly and systematically instructing the native teachers. The last time I went to see her she repeated the first and second verses of the 23d Psalm. During my absence from home she died happily, conversing much with her teacher and others of her relatives. I inquired of her son-in-law, "What particular words did your mother leave for her children?" He said, "She talked much with her teacher; but her chief word to us was, that she had been formerly a great sinner, and that it was God's work of mercy which had made the difference." Her children fully understood this to mean that they were to attend to the same Word, which is able to make them also wise unto salvation.

An old man, named Nathaniel, died in our settlement about a month ago. This man embraced Christianity ten years ago, and was a constant attendant on the means of grace. He lived two miles off, but, though lame as well as old, nothing but very bad weather or illness would keep him from church. When he found himself poorly, five weeks since, he came to our settlement, and sent word to us that he was ill. In a little time his hands swelled fearfully, and he was told that probably this was the Lord's call to him to leave this world. He was quite resigned to it; two years before he had, feeling himself lonely, prayed the Lord to take him if it were his will. It was his delight to have the Word of God read to him, and to be prayed with. Three days before he died I visited him, when he said, "Satan is buzzing about me." He was asked what Satan wanted, when he said, "To trouble and darken me." On being asked what he must do, he replied, "I must fight the devil, when he will flee from me;" and he wished the Word of God to be read to him, and to be prayed with. He fought Satan with God's Word and prayer, and Satan left him. The Christian natives had a high regard for him. Two teachers were with him when he died; and they reported that his conversation was very edifying, and that he died very happy in Christ.

AFFLICTIONS.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

Let us be patient. These severe afflictions
Not from the ground arise,
But oftentimes celestial benedictions
Assume the dark disguise.

And though at times, impetuous with emotion
And anguish long suppressed,
The swelling heart heaves, moaning like the ocean,
That can not be at rest.

We will be patient, and assuage the feeling
We can not wholly stay;
By silence sanctifying, not concealing,
The grief that must have way.

We see but dimly through the mists and vapors
Amid these earthly damps;
What seem to us like dim, funereal tapers,
May be heaven's distant lamps.

There is no death; what seems so is transition,
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portal we call death.

In that great cloister's stillness and seclusion,
By guardian angels led,
Safe from temptations, safe from sin's pollution,
He lives whom we call dead.

TIDINGS FROM JERUSALEM.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

A devoted sister having recently returned from a visit to the Holy Land, and being encouraged from what she saw and heard to hope that great good might be done among the children of Abraham by Sabbath-keeping Christians in that most interesting portion of the world, has determined, with a number of families from Pennsylvania, who have volunteered for the purpose, to return to Jerusalem, with all the necessary agricultural implements for the establishment of an Agricultural Manual Labor School, or, rather, to join one already established by a worthy resident, Mr. Meshullam, who is a convert from Judaism, and a zealous Sabbath-keeper, and thus encourage the poor Jews to learn and practice the only means of independence and efficiency.

In a Journal recently published in Philadelphia, the sister in question has inserted a very interesting correspondence with Mr. Meshullam; and a few days since the following letter was received by her son, and published in The Presbyterian. To those who have read the Narrative, this will be especially interesting.

Jerusalem, May 21, 1851.

My Dear Christian Friends,—With full demonstrations of joy we received your welcome letter, (dated March 10,) in answer to which I resume our communications. Every thing tends to encourage me in this duty, while the facts to be related will convey some intimation of the steadfastness required in promoting every new and benevolent enterprise. The friends of Israel, on the other hand, could not have encouraged a more worthy sphere of Christian labor, which is well calculated to usher in the blessed events recorded in sacred history, "when the fullness of the Gentiles shall come in, and so all Israel shall be saved."

With expectations such as these, and as a laborer in common with my brethren, I am willing to clear the roads, and cut asunder the rocks, to prepare the "highway," and rejoice, though in so doing I should expire in view of their restored inheritance. In the glorious prospect before me, it would be no less than murmuring against the Divine Providence—who through afflictions will ever prepare the hearts of his true servants for his purpose—should I reluctantly repeat the disappointments I have endured since our last interview, as they conduce finally to the most salutary results.

I will now describe minutely the present state of Artoss, where every thing so abundantly prospers, that it leads me to conclude that my example and success will actuate my brethren to help in promoting this interesting labor. I have previously informed you that last winter my farm was immersed in a deluge of water, in consequence of the rains having been so unremitted and protracted, that my cot was nearly lost in the inundation. Although this was calculated to discourage the most enterprising, it was not long an obstacle to the interpidity which, in like necessitous emergencies, has marked my course of life. With the few laborers then about me, I set accordingly to work, contriving to recover what seemed to me the last fragments of my industry. However, by the assistance of Providence, I soon restored things to their former footing and pristine beauty. These incessant and long rains did no less havoc in the city, owing to which many houses crumbled to ruins, and every where about the town fragments of habitations strewed and closed the court-yards and open passages. But this season, however, was one of the rarest that has occurred in this country on the annals of history. Many aged and experienced citizens assured me, that for the space of eighty years no such rains fell. In May (the present month) the heat has been such, that throughout every valley and plain you may observe the strong, brown Arab, gathering and fanning the harvest, not usually ripe even in June, (doubtless occasioned by the late plentiful rains!) My farm, however, exhibits the most striking and lively feature in all the neighborhood; every thing is still in bloom, and from the summit of the mountains the valley displays the richest view of an earthly paradise. O that there were united hearts and hands to assist in making it indeed the seat of blessedness and charity! The pomegranate, fig, peach, and pear, enclose the sides in beauty, and the fair vine enhances the salubrious air of health and liberty. The productions of Artoss this year are in such abundance as baffles my dexterity in gathering, for want of reapers. The sun has had such a beneficial effect on the moist soil, in restoring its solidity, that every thing tends to promise a compensating harvest of wheat, which remains to be gathered. The Pools of Solomon have this year displayed a beautiful sight, overflowing from the mouth, and thus conveying the water down the valley to Artoss. Thus this spot is seen on every side to abound with the choicest grants of nature, the blessings of that beneficent Hand who first gave to man freely of the increase of his labor, to disclose the worthiest feature (love) of his extensive attributes.

As regards buying land, I am happy to inform you that plenty of ground can be moderately purchased, and that a firman from the grand Sultan has recently arrived to that effect. Indeed, political affairs do now constrain the Arab—he being unable to pay the annual taxes—to dispose of a land acquired by unworthy conquest. Thus there is not only full prospect of purchasing the soil, but also of hiring the proprietors to labor on it.

I would thankfully express my gratitude for the recent arrival of the £10 you mentioned as contributed by kind friends, and which I received through Messrs. Black & Co. of Beyroot. I have also received full information of your boxes [shipped from N. Y. March 1st, 1851,] being on the way to Jaffa. Let all those Christian friends, who are the donors of these liberal grants, rest perfectly assured that no innovation beyond what will best conduce to my poor brethren's welfare, and the extending of my consistent plans on their behalf, is the devoted aim of their humble servant, in my one desire, and self-same course of duty for them, omitting those secular and selfish views which compose the bane of the present age.

I humbly trust, dear friends, that you are convinced that I can never shrink from a purpose now become my duty, nor turn from a premeditated object, now, I trust, to be eventually established. I shall follow your directions respecting the mill, trusting it will fully answer the purpose for which it was benevolently intended.

About Jerusalem, I can afford you but a scanty description, things always assuming the same general character, although there is certainly a stir in the government highly favoring colonization.

* * * *

The Jews become more attached and friendly to my undertaking, and Artoss continues to prove a blessing to many of them, whom I allow full liberty to supply their households with vegetables, alluring them by benevolent disinterestedness to aid in promoting this prosperous cause. Notwithstanding the many fatal falls of this country into the hands of rapacious tyrants, and the desolations of the past, how endearing is the thought, that much that remains to be fulfilled is written in her favor, and to be accomplished in leading her ancient and despised sons to the industrial labor of cultivating and rebuilding their own fertile land. In glancing at the country in its present state, there is much to encourage and animate the disinterested laborer in the Lord's vineyard.

Such, dear friends, is the state of affairs, and my prospect is more encouraging when I confidently rely that one object animates you and me—a descendant of those whom your efforts have befriended in this sacred cause. Now, therefore, is the time of cheering the countenances of God's servants, and of sending, in anticipation of the blessed events, the heralds to proclaim, in the words of that admirable passage of holy writ, which inspires us to "rejoice with Jerusalem, and be glad with her," for "the Lord hath founded Zion, and the poor of his people shall trust in it."

And here, dear friends, I conclude with the united and best wishes of myself and family to you, and to all our American friends, assuring you that I am ever willing to spend and be spent for the service of my brethren, as your and their devoted brother in Christ Jesus.

A NOBLE AMBITION.

"I always thought that if I could contribute to the saving of a single soul, it would be a star, a crown, a glorious crown," said a very eminent servant of Christ. We are so constituted as to be influenced by the hope of reward. God has recognized this principle of our nature, and has adapted his religion to it. The hope of reward has its place as a motive to Christian action, though it is by no means the fundamental principle of such action. The Christian does not serve God because of the advantages which result from the service. The advantages are not the conditions which lead him to engage in the service; but serving God from a principle of love, he may be influenced by the rewards which a God of love graciously sets before him. Moses had respect to the recompense of reward; so may we.

The highest rewards are promised to those who are instrumental in the salvation of souls. They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever. Here then is scope for the exercise of that principle of action which looks to the hope of rewards; here is scope for a noble ambition.

"If you were an ambitious man," said one to a minister of talent and education, who was settled in a retired and obscure parish, "you would not stay in such a place as this."

"How do you know that I am not an ambitious man?" said the pastor.

"You do not act like one."

"I have my plans as well as others—the results may not appear as soon, perhaps."

"Are you engaged in some great work?"

"I am—but the work does not relate to literature or science. I am not ambitious, perhaps, in the ordinary sense of the term. I do not desire to occupy the high places of the earth, but I do desire to get near my Master's throne in heaven. I care but little for popular applause, but I desire to secure the approbation of God. The salvation of souls is the work he is most interested in, and to the successful prosecution of which he has promised the largest rewards."

Reader, have you any claim to the rewards connected with doing good to men? Have you been instrumental in the salvation of a single soul? Have you ever labored to save a soul? O! shall a redeemed sinner live all his appointed time without leading a single wanderer home—without leading a single soul to the Lamb of God? Are you neglecting the rewards of heaven for those of earth? And is it better to enjoy a brilliant reputation among your fellow men, than to shine as a star for ever and ever? [N. Y. Observer.

FEELING AFTER GOD.

The following relation of a heathen's experience before he came to a knowledge of the truth, not only presents the darkness of a heathen mind in an affecting light, but it shows man's absolute need of a revelation. It was addressed by Sekesa, a Bechuana, to a missionary from whom he had been hearing the Gospel.

"Your views, O white man, are just what I wanted and sought for before I knew you. Twelve years ago, I went, in a cloudy season, to feed my flock along the Tlotse, among the Malutis. Seated upon a rock, in sight of my sheep, I asked myself sad questions—yes, sad, because I could not answer them. The stars, said I—who touched them with his hand? on what pillars do they rest? The waters are not weary; they run without ceasing, at night and morning alike; but where do they rest? or who makes them run thus? The clouds also go, return, and fall in water to the earth. Whence do they arise? Who sends them? It surely is not the Barokas (rain-makers,) who gave us the rain, for how could they make it? The wind—what is it? Who brings it, or takes it away, makes it blow, and roar, and frighten us? Do I know how the corn grows? Yesterday, there was not a blade to be seen in my field. To-day, I return and find something. It is very small, I can scarcely see it, but it will grow up like to a young man. Who can have given the ground wisdom and power to produce it? Then I buried my forehead in my hands.

"Again, I thought within myself, and I said, We all depart, but this country remains, it alone remains, for we all go way. But whither do we go? My heart answered, Perhaps other men live besides us, and we shall go to them. A second time it said, Perhaps those men live under the earth, and we shall go to them. But another thought arose against it, and said, Those men under the earth—whence come they? Then my heart rose and spoke to me, saying, All men do much evil. Wo to thee! I recalled many wrongs which I had done to others, and because of them my conscience gnawed me in secret, as I sat alone on the rock. I say, I was afraid. I got up and ran after my sheep, trying to enliven myself; but I trembled much!" [N. Y. Observer.

CATCHING A MAN-CATCHER.

Several of the ministers ejected by the Act of Uniformity, in 1662, united with the eminent Richard Baxter in establishing a lecture in a private house. The time of worship being at a very early hour, Mr. Baxter one evening left home with a view of being there ready for the morning. The night, however, being dark, he lost his way, and after wandering for a long time he came to a gentleman's house, where he asked direction. The servant informed his master of this fact, who, thinking it unsafe that so respectable a looking man should be wandering on the common at so late an hour, invited him to stay. Mr. Baxter readily accepted the invitation, and was treated with great hospitality. His conversation gave his host a high opinion of his good sense and extensive information. The gentleman wishing to know the quality of his guest, after supper said,

"As most persons have some employment or profession in life, I have no doubt, sir, that you have yours."

Mr. Baxter replied with a smile, "Yes, sir, I am a man-catcher."

"A man-catcher, are you?" said the gentleman; "I am very glad to hear you say so, for you are the very person I want. I am a Justice of the Peace in this district, and I am commissioned to secure the person of Dick Baxter, who is expected to preach at a conventicle in the neighborhood early to-morrow morning; you shall go with me, and I doubt not we shall easily apprehend the rogue."

Mr. Baxter very prudently consented to accompany him. Accordingly, the gentleman, the following morning, took Mr. Baxter to the place where the meeting was to be held. When they arrived there, a considerable number of the people were hovering about; but, on seeing the Justice, they suspected his intentions, and were afraid to enter the house. The Justice now intimated to Mr. Baxter his fears that Baxter had been apprized of his intentions, and would disappoint them, and proposed to extend their ride, that the people might be encouraged to assemble, and give them an opportunity of fulfilling their commission. They did so; but on their return they still found the people unwilling to assemble. The magistrate, now supposing that he should be disappointed of his object, said to Mr. Baxter, that as these people were much disaffected to the government, he would feel obliged to him if he would address them on the subject of loyalty and good behaviour. Mr. Baxter replied, that as they met for worship, it was probable that such an address would not satisfy the people; but that if the Justice would engage in prayer he would endeavor to say something to them. The gentleman replied that he had not his prayer book with him, or he would readily comply with the proposal; but expressed his persuasion that Mr. Baxter was able to pray with them, as well as to talk to them; and requested him to begin with prayer.

They entered the house, followed by the people; Mr. Baxter prayed with great devotion and fervor; the magistrate, standing by, was soon melted into tears. The good divine then preached in his usual faithful and zealous manner, and when he had concluded he turned to the Justice and said,

"Sir, I am the very Dick Baxter of whom you are in pursuit. I am entirely at your disposal."

The magistrate, however, had felt so much during the service, and saw things so differently to what he had done before, that his enmity was changed into love, and ever afterwards he became the friend and advocate of the persecuted, and, it is believed, also, a sincere Christian.

CHURCH LIBRARIES.

As it comes within the line of our business to suggest any thing which might be for the furtherance of the cause of God and truth, we take the liberty of hinting the propriety of forming Church Libraries. We are not aware that there is a church in our denomination which holds, as its own property, any thing deserving the name of a library, unless it may be the small collection of books connected with the Sabbath School. Did it never occur to our ministers and leading brethren, that one of the best things they could do for the advancement of the cause of piety in their own vicinity, would be to secure the collection of a choice library, which should be the property of the church, and free to all its members? We desire them to think of it.

Let it be considered, in the first place, that there are in every church some families so poor that they cannot afford to buy many books. The Bible and Hymn Book comprise almost the whole of their library.

In the next place, let it be considered, that the pastor himself is often very destitute of this kind of property. We have known ministers, who could put all the books they owned in one end of their saddle-bags; and such was their poverty, that they could not afford to increase their stock. What an advantage it would be to one of this character, to be settled over a church which had taken the precaution to accumulate a valuable library! How gladly would he avail himself of the opportunity thus afforded him to enlarge his store of knowledge.

Would it not be well for every church in the denomination to proceed at once to take some steps towards accumulating a fund for this important object? A collection might be taken once a month for the purpose; and as fast as any considerable sum was obtained, it might be expended in the purchase of books. Some of the members who were already pretty well supplied, might perhaps contribute a few volumes for the sake of the general good; and there would occasionally be a friend, no doubt, who would remember the good cause in his will. Thus, in process of time, that which had but a very small beginning might grow into something of great value. If the older members saw no great results during their life-time, they would at least be laying a foundation for their children, and those who might succeed them.

Such a library ought to contain our standard denominational publications, at least one good commentary, and a variety of good doctrinal and practical works. We do not think that it should consist of religious books exclusively. Books of history and of useful information might be admitted, though undoubtedly an eye should be had mainly to the collection of those which would tend to form the religious character of the readers. Books of a devotional character, such as Baxter's Saints' Rest, the Pilgrim's Progress, Doddridge's Rise and Progress, together with a good variety of those which treat of missionary operations, and the biographies of holy men and women, would be very valuable. To these should be added some choice periodical works. Care, of course, should be taken to exclude every book of a doubtful or injurious character.

The location of the library should be in the building where the church regularly meets for worship; or, if that is impracticable, in some house so convenient of access that the members can without trouble avail themselves of it. In reality, every meeting-house ought to be considered incomplete without a room for this purpose, and another for Sabbath Schools and prayer meetings.

It is nothing uncommon for our churches in the country to be left destitute of any regular ministerial supply for months. What better substitute for pastoral instruction could be provided than a supply of such books as are filled with sound biblical instruction? Left without a guide, the young and inexperienced of the flock are in danger of being "led away with the error of the wicked." A false teacher comes along, and with the most insinuating sophistry persuades them that they have never before been instructed in the way of the Lord. They have no pastor to guide them in this perplexity, and the seniors of the flock are probably but imperfectly grounded in the faith themselves. In such a state of things, error gains a triumph. The church is broken, and its ranks thinned. The young people, instead of filling their places, have "turned away their ears from the truth, and are turned unto fables." The cause of God languishes, and the truly pious are filled with grief. What might not a library of good books have done towards preventing such a calamity? The inexperienced might have found in the collection something which would have given the proper turn to their investigations, at the time when they were most perplexed, and thus saved them from the ruin into which they fell.

But upon the various ways in which the thing which we propose might operate for good, it is needless to dilate. The good sense of every person will at once suggest a great many advantages as likely to grow out of it. Of one thing we are certain. If it could be proclaimed abroad, that every church in the Seventh-day Baptist denomination was furnished with a choice and well selected library, it would do more towards compelling the respect of the community at large, in this reading age of the world, than almost any other one thing that could be said of us. People who are known to be a reading people will be respected, and their influence felt. What church will make a beginning towards this object?

THE CATHOLIC BANQUET.

The complimentary banquet to Archbishop Hughes, on the occasion of his return from Europe, came off at the Astor House on the evening of the 21st inst. The price of tickets was ten dollars each, and the number of guests 240—rather an expensive affair, considering that the Archbishop, in his speech, represented the church over which he presides as composed of the poor, for the benefit of whom he has incurred many debts and much self-denial. "The fare," so says a daily paper, "was most sumptuous, and its discussion occupied the greater part of two hours."

After the cloth was removed, the chairman announced the regular toasts. The first was "Pope Pius IX.," which, we are told, "was received with moderate applause." The second—"The President of the United States"—was received with "applause and three cheers." The third was given by the Hon. Hugh Maxwell—"The Clergy of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States, who enjoin, as a sacred duty to every citizen, obedience to the law." The fourth toast—"Our illustrious and beloved guest, the Archbishop of New York, we reverence the prelate, we are proud of the man"—was received with great applause and nine cheers. Of course the Archbishop followed it with a speech. After expressing his feelings in view of the highly flattering terms in which his health had been proposed and received, he proceeded to state the general course of action he had pursued, and the motives by which he had been actuated. The following reference to his course upon the subject of education, we copy from the report of one of the daily papers:—

"From the first I was solicitous to obtain the means of providing education for the poor. In this, I have been misrepresented by hasty newspaper writers, who acted, most likely, from their prejudices. I say now, that my views never extended beyond the people for whom I am responsible to God in my spiritual capacity. That man is unborn who can say that I ever uttered a word intended to act injuriously on my fellow-citizens. In this, thanks to God, we have some consolation. I will say simply this: A Catholic is not satisfied with the education of the intellect alone; for he is an immortal being. Hence, though I do not find fault with others for differing with me, I say, Education ought not to be separated from Religion—Religion in its broadest possible sense. The men who inherit our free institutions should be men of conscience and principle, and I know no secret to create a conscience in a man, if not by means of a religious education. The religion of the most objectionable denomination in the country, blended with common education, is better than no religion at all. I know no religion which does not preach the existence of a God and the accountability of Man. I have labored in my humble way for the education of my people, and I intend to labor on; I have advocated a classic and collegiate education, but simply in order that cultivated intellect may not be without the balancing principle of Religion."

The fifth regular toast was "The Catholic Hierarchy of the United States." To this, Rev. Dr. Cummings replied. We make the following extract from the report of his remarks, because it indicates what results are expected to flow from this gathering, and also what estimate the Catholic clergy place upon their Archbishop:—

"The tidings of this banquet will go forth to the world, and when, after fifteen days, the news is read in England, it may not be without its moral, that while the English nation pours forth its abuse and hostility against the Catholic Church, citizens of every creed, in the Empire City, meet to welcome the head of the American Hierarchy. Perhaps it will not be lost on them, that on an occasion like this, sentiments of sympathy and friendship have been given by the leading merchants of the City, and letters been read from the principal dignitaries and statesmen of the Republic.

"According to the teaching of our Church, said Dr. C., we look upon our Bishop as the foundation, the corner stone of the whole religious edifice of the Church. It may sometimes be said that there is a kind of slavish submission in the Catholic Church in this subordination, but if you consult the feelings of the Catholic clergy, you might as well talk of the slavery of a captain under his commanding general, or a private under his lieutenant."

Passing over toasts to "Our Country," to "Civil and Religious Liberty," to "The Judiciary," to "The Army and Navy," and to "Ireland," we notice that the ninth in order was "The Catholic Hierarchy of England and Ireland—in the persecution to which they have been subjected, they have the sympathy of all the lovers of religious liberty." Archbishop Hughes made a long speech in response, which flattered the Americans sufficiently, especially the officers of the Navy, and also represented the Catholic clergy of England and Ireland as men of extraordinary worth, while it denounced the British Government, and intimated that if England were wise she would at least cultivate peaceful relations with her Catholic subjects.

In the course of the evening, letters were read from several distinguished individuals who could not comply with the invitation to be present. A sentence or two from each will indicate their sentiments, and show that if (as has been supposed) this banquet was arranged with a view of getting leading men to commit themselves in favor of the largest liberty to Roman Catholic movements, its object was in some degree attained.

Henry Clay says: "I should have been glad, by my presence, to have demonstrated my conviction that, while all sincere Christians are striving to arrive at the same state of future bliss—no matter by what different roads they may pursue their journey in this life—nothing should prevent those of one denomination from manifesting all proper courtesy and honor to eminence, piety, and devotion in another denomination."

Lewis Cass—"Other engagements will prevent my attendance; and I must content myself with expressing my gratification at this public mark of esteem to one who so well deserves it by the power of his intellect, the purity of his life, and the services he has rendered to the cause of religion and virtue."

Daniel Webster—"If I could be present, gentlemen, I should offer the following sentiment: 'Religious Toleration and Charity—Let all Christians remember that they have one Lord, one faith, one baptism.'"

R. J. Walker—"Regretting most deeply that circumstances beyond my control will deprive me of the pleasure of uniting with many esteemed friends and fellow-citizens, in this well-merited tribute of respect and regard for this most worthy and distinguished gentleman, permit me to offer, through you, to the assembled company, the following sentiment: 'The Christian Church—Established by almighty power and ineffable love, free from all schisms, like the unity of truth, it must in time be one and universal.'"

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday-keeping of the President of France—Sunday Observance in Scotland—Another Jew Member of Parliament—The Anti-Popery Bill—Archbishop Wiseman—Popery in the Church of England.

Glasgow, July 11th, 1851.

Last Sunday the President of the French Republic sanctified the day by "assisting" at the inauguration of a statue to the memory of "the heroine of Beauvais," a woman who lived about three and a half centuries ago. He had previously been complimented by the Bishop and Clergy, in their Cathedral, on his respect for the day—they themselves afterwards taking part in the fete—and also because that, under his government, the Pope had been reinstated in Rome.

The Sunday Observance Report to the Free Church Assembly, presented at their late sitting, is now printed. The Committee refer, in terms of severe reprobation, to existing practices of walking, bathing, and sailing, on the Sunday, and to "the unnecessary and excessive use of hackney coaches and private carriages, and the audacious practice," as they term it, "now so common on the part of the former, of standing on the public streets for promiscuous hire on that day." In the controversy as to Sunday Railway Trains, the church was often reminded of the numerous carriages to be seen at the church doors of some of the ministers who were most vehement in the denunciation of Sunday trains. For a long time no attention seemed to be given to the matter; and the inconsistency is, even yet, in no great degree removed.

Besides Baron Rothschild for London, another Jew, Mr. Salomons, has been elected M. P. for Greenwich; and the bill for modifying the clause in the oath, which an unbeliever in Christ cannot take, for relief of Jewish representatives in the House of Commons, has passed the third reading in that House, and is sent up to the Lords, where its fate is uncertain.

The Ecclesiastical Titles Assumption Bill, (as the proposed measure for repelling Papal Aggression is called,) was rendered more stringent, by the introduction of three amendments proposed on the third reading by Sir F. Thessiger in the House of Commons. The Papal members absented themselves from the discussion of these; so that, although the Government resisted the proposal so to improve the Bill, it was carried by a large majority. It has since been read the first time in the House of Lords, but the second reading, on which the discussion usually principally takes place, was deferred for a fortnight. The arrogance of the Pope does not, however, seem much abated by the resistance made to his assumptions. He has, last month, appointed Bishops for Southwark, Plymouth, Salford (a suburb of Manchester,) Shrewsbury, and Nottingham. It is true that his having failed to do so would have been unfavorable to his claim of infallibility, as this formed a promised part of the Aggression in September last. But he besides proposes the erection of a cathedral in London, and has proclaimed an indulgence to all who contribute to the required fund. The Rev. Dr. Cumming, Presbyterian minister in London, suggests a return of the Papal compliment by the proposal to erect a spacious Protestant building in one of the principal streets of Rome.

The Romish dignitary, Wiseman, was lately summoned to give evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons appointed to investigate the state of the law of Mortmain. He excused himself, but promised to send his solicitor, who would be able to answer any questions on the subject. It is, however, stated, that when the substitute, in his examination, was questioned upon points he preferred to reserve, he shuffled, and eventually refused to answer. Wiseman himself was, therefore, again ordered to attend; but, anticipating the result, he had left London. He proceeded, it appears, to Guernsey; but while he thus, for the time, escaped the summons of the Speaker of the House of Commons, he arrived upon the island July 5th, in time to learn that in the case of the Widow Butler, the court there had decided against him. The flight has, moreover, failed to serve his purpose; for the Speaker has issued his warrant requiring his appearance before the Committee. To show still farther the energy and determination of this apostate church to subjugate all under its control, and to quench all light but that which is darkness, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Malta has been constrained by his superior to issue a pastoral, threatening with excommunication the conductors of the newspaper press of Malta, unless they speak with more respect of his Popeship, and with more submission to his measures. The Frankfort correspondent of the London Daily News also says that Romish Priests in Upper Baden have been collecting and burning Bibles, or rather have urged the people to do so, on the ground that the latter could not understand them.

The reform of the English Episcopal Church from Popish leaven, makes little progress—while, from time to time, announcement is made of additional perverts, prepared for secession through the formula of a professedly Protestant church. The Bishop of London seems to have given only a change of performers, without a change of performance, at St. Barnabas, Pimlico. Its "histrionics" have undergone very little change by having received as minister the Honorable and Reverend R. Liddell, instead of the Rev. Mr. Bennett, who is, it is stated, at present in Germany. The Bishop of Exeter has also refused to admit into his diocese, the Rev. L. H. Gray of London, who has been nominated to a church in Plymouth, the ground of objection being, as in Mr. Gorham's case, that his views as to baptismal regeneration are unsatisfactory to the Bishop. This, as was to have been expected, was the most prominent topic of discussion in the diocesan Synod lately convened by the Bishop. Discussion, properly, there was none, care having been taken to prevent occasion or opportunity. The proceedings were wholly predetermined, but the decisions were arrived at without dissent or difficulty. Those opposed either to the object aimed at or the manner of attaining it—and there were no inconsiderable number of protesters against both the inutility and illegality of the proposal—abstained from attendance. At his triennial visitation at Exeter, shortly before, the Bishop scolded those members of the Church of England, both clerical and laic, who opposed the scheme. "They are not the laity," he said, "who dare attempt to raise agitation against their Bishop and their clergy in carrying into effect a measure which the Bishop and his clergy believe to be lawful in the exercise of powers which belong to them." It would seem from this, that the church are expected to exercise neither judgment nor faith relative to the truths of God's Word, but simply submit to whatever the Bishop and his clergy may prescribe. The Bishop's old antagonist, Mr. Gorham, addressed to him a long and pungent letter, on his "anomalous" act of calling a Synod. The declaration it was designed the Synod should make had been previously printed and circulated privately among those favorably disposed, but was not to be divulged to the newspaper press. It was, however, published by them all, and canvassed too, before the Bishop had opportunity of personally presenting it to that Synod for whom it was prepared.

QUESTIONS.

[Prepared for the Buffalo Christian Advocate, but refused a place in that paper.]

1st. Which day of the week did our Creator designate, bless and sanctify, and make the Sabbath or rest-day?

2d. Which day of the week does the Law of God, the Ten Commandments, expressly say "is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God?"

3d. When the disciples of Christ "rested the Sabbath-day according to the commandment," (Luke 23 : 56,) on which day of the week did they rest?

4th. Which day of the week does our blessed Saviour mean, when he says, "The Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath-day"—"The Sabbath was made for man"—"It is lawful to do well on the Sabbath-day?"

5th. Which day of the week does the New Testament call the "Sabbath" some fifty-five times?

6th. Which day of the week did the Gentiles mean, when they wanted Paul to preach to them "the next Sabbath?" Acts 13 : 42. The seventh day.

7th. Which day of the week would the people of Buffalo mean now, if they should ask a man to preach for them the next Sabbath? The first day.

8th. Does not this show that Papal Rome (or some other power) has "changed times and laws," (Dan. 7 : 25,) so that the word Sabbath now means something entirely different from what the same word meant when the Acts of the Apostles were written?

9th. To which day of the week does the Apostle Paul refer when he speaks of "every Sabbath day," some twelve years after the resurrection of Christ? Acts 13 : 27.

10th. To which day of the week did Luke refer by the expression "every Sabbath," some twenty-one years after the resurrection of Christ? Acts 18 : 4.

11th. Is there any place in the New Testament where the term Sabbath or rest is applied to the first day of the week?

12th. Which day of the week do the Scriptures call "The Lord's day"—"My holy day"—"My Sabbath"—"The Sabbath of the Lord thy God"—the same which the Son of Man is now Lord of?

Darien, July, 1851.

Inasmuch as the above fair, simple, and candid questions could not find a place in the Buffalo Christian Advocate, I will here add a few quotations of Scripture which, in my humble opinion, are applicable to the case.

David says, "Thy law is the truth; all thy commandments are truth." Paul says, "They shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables." They have turned away their ears from this truth which says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath," and are turned unto one of the greatest fables that ever was taught in the name of the Christian religion, viz., that the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath. Well hath Ezekiel prophesied, saying, "Her priests have violated my law, and profaned my holy things; they have put no difference between the holy and profane, and have hid their eyes from my Sabbaths, and I am profaned among them." They have violated the law in saying, "One day in seven" is the Sabbath, instead of "The seventh day." They have put no difference between the holy and profane—between what the Lord calls "my holy day," and a profane Sabbath, made by man. They have hid their eyes from the Lord's Sabbath—are not willing to examine the subject—no, not willing even to read a Sabbath Tract. Well hath Isaiah prophesied of these, saying, "The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof; because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant; therefore hath the curse devoured the earth." (Isa. 24 : 5.) The words of our Lord Jesus Christ would seem to apply here, when he says, "Howbeit, in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. For, laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the traditions of men."

Two Executions in a Day.—In New York, on Sixth-day last, Edward F. Douglass and Thomas Benson, convicted of the murder at sea of Asa Havens, mate of the bark Glen, were hung in accordance with the sentence which had been passed upon them. The execution took place within the enclosure of the Tombs, and was witnessed by some five hundred persons. Two or three clergymen, who had attended upon the prisoners during the few days previous, were present at the concluding scene. One of the prisoners, Douglass, remarked on the gallows, that he was now receiving the wages of sin, which is death—that he was an example of the effects of small indulgences in evil, and that he hoped all would be warned by his fate. Benson declared that he was innocent of any positive violence to the murdered man. Another young man, named Clemens, was to have been hung at the same time and for the same crime, but the President of the United States had respited him for a short time. Let their sad fate be a warning against the beginnings of sin.

Sailing of the Liberia Packet.—On the 19th inst., the Maryland Colonization Society's bark "Liberia Packet" sailed from Baltimore for Monrovia, Africa. Among the passengers were Eli and Sybel Jones, who go out under the direction and support of the Society called "Friends," on a sort of missionary exploring tour. They are said to be the first American Quakers who have ever visited Africa for the purpose of preaching peace, love, and good will. The number of emigrants was smaller than was expected. Instead of 150, there were only 54, of whom 42 were from Baltimore. It is said that more than two thousand free negroes assembled on the wharf from which the vessel sailed, endeavoring to dissuade their friends from going away to a land which they consider full of disease and death.

Hamilton College.—The Commencement of this institution, located at Clinton, N. Y., was held last week. From the reports published in the daily papers, we conclude that the occasion was one of interest. There were nearly forty graduates, who received the usual title of A. B. Rev. Eli Noyes of Providence, R. I, and Rev. Frederick Cannon of Geneva, N. Y., were made Doctors of Divinity. The title of LL.D. was conferred on Senator Fine of this State, and Prof. Stephen W. Taylor of Madison University.

Return of Missionaries.—Among the passengers in the bark Osmanli, which arrived at Boston last week from Smyrna, were Rev. W. Goodell and wife, missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M. at Constantinople, and two daughters. Mr. Goodell and wife have been absent about 29 years. Miss S. A. Danforth and Miss E. Howard of Pittsfield, Mass., who have been engaged as school teachers at Smyrna, were also passengers in the Osmanli.

Anti-Slavery among the Methodists.—The Methodist Church at Painsville, Ohio, has passed the strongest kind of Anti-Slavery resolutions, denouncing the Fugitive Slave Law in unmeasured terms, and refusing compliance with its mandates; also complaining of the lethargy of the Church and its Conferences with reference to Slavery—refusing support to any minister who should be stationed there, who was not of the real Anti-Slavery stamp. So says an exchange.

Danger and Escape of Dr. Bacon.—The New Haven Palladium says that Dr. Bacon, of that city, who is now traveling in the East, came near losing his life by the hands of assassins in June last. It appears that he and his son, and the Rev. Mr. Marsh, the latter a missionary of the A. B. C. F. M. at Mosul, were pushing their way between Mosul and Ooroomiah, when they were overtaken or met by a party of warlike Kurds, who captured them, and made them all prisoners. A conspiracy had been formed for the purpose of murdering the whole party—but they were happily delivered from the hands of their enemies, and returned in safety to Mosul.

Letters to Archbishop Hughes.—Rev. N. S. S. Beman, D.D., has commenced in the Troy Whig a series of Letters to Archbishop Hughes, in which he proposes to animadvert upon some portions of the sermon lately delivered by the Archbishop in this city; to submit to a critical analysis some of his recent speeches made in England; and conclude with a few strictures on his extraordinary discourse, "on the decline of Protestantism," delivered in New York, on the eve of his embarking for the holy city in quest of the PALLIUM. His object, he says, will be to notice in a very plain and undisguised way, as becomes a Protestant and a Republican, certain sentiments, oft-repeated in these productions, both political and religious, which are palpably at open war with the rights of man and the liberty of conscience.

Convention of Colored People.—A National Convention of Colored People was held in Albany last week, at which resolutions were offered on the subjects of Colonization in Liberia, the Fugitive Slave Law, the Education of Colored Children in Common Schools, and Equal Suffrage in this State, to be obtained by amendment of the Constitution. These Resolutions (as we learn from the Albany State Register) elicited much discussion, and the Convention expressed itself opposed to the colonization scheme, claiming the right to remain here and follow respectively whatever business pursuits the colored man may choose. They came out strong against the Fugitive Slave Law, and adopted a resolution to petition the Legislature to amend the Constitution so as to grant the right to vote at elections to the colored man. They also claimed the right to have their children educated at the same common schools which educate white children. Resolutions were also offered and adopted, endorsing the McGrawville College, and pledging to it aid and encouragement; and favoring the settlement upon the lands granted to colored people by Gerrit Smith.

Church Burning in Jamaica.—The Morning Journal, published at Kingston, Jamaica, says that there is much excitement among the inhabitants on account of the trial and conviction of twenty-seven members of the Baptist Society for attempting to destroy the Mission House. It appears that their Minister, a Mr. Philippo, became obnoxious to them, and they endeavored to make him give up their Chapel and Mission house. This he steadily refused to do, whereupon they attacked the house with the intention of demolishing it, and were only prevented by the interference of the authorities, who called the troops to their assistance. The prisoners were sentenced to terms in the penitentiary, varying from three to nine months. The families and friends of the prisoners, who were present when the sentence was delivered, gave vent to their feelings by loud cries and lamentations. Mr. Philippo's house was again attacked in the excitement of the moment, and all the furniture destroyed.

Slaves owned by Christians.—President Blanchard, of Knox College, Ill., says that by calculations based upon the United States census and the statistics of religious bodies, it is estimated that Methodists in the United States own 219,563 slaves; Presbyterians, (Old and New School,) 77,000; Baptists, 115,000; Campbellites, 101,000; Episcopalians, 88,000; other Protestants 50,000—making a sum total of 650,563 slaves owned by ministers and members of Protestant Churches in the United States. At $400 (a low estimate) for each slave, this makes a property fund vested in human bodies and souls of $570,225,200, owned by the American Protestant churches. The influence of this fund must be met, resisted and overcome by the influence which shall remove Slavery from the Church.

An Accident last Sabbath.—On Sabbath afternoon last, the sloop Rebecca Ford, owned and manned by the Oneida Community, was capsized and sunk near Hyde Park, on the North River, while on her way from Kingston to New York. Four men and two women were on board. The men happened to be on deck at the time, and managed by the aid of articles from the vessel to keep themselves from sinking until they were rescued by a schooner. The women were in the cabin, and were both drowned. It is said that one of them, Mrs. Cragin, two hours before the accident was reading aloud to part of the crew the eighth chapter of Romans, and directing attention, with much vivacity, to the last verses.

Was it a "Sabbath Accident?"—The following paragraph from the Little Rock (Arkansas) Gazette very naturally raises this question:—

"On Sunday morning last, eleven young men crossed the Arkansas river eight or ten miles below Dardanella, for the purpose of gathering plums. While they were thus engaged, a thunder squall arose, when they all retreated under a tree for protection. In a few moments the tree was struck by lightning, and seven of the eleven were stricken lifeless by the subtle element. The drenching they received from the shower, however, had the effect of restoring all of them."

Educational Convention at Cleveland.—The next meeting of the friends of Education who have united under the title of the "American Association for the Advancement of Education," will be held at Cleveland, Ohio, on Tuesday the 19th August. This organization was permanently effected at the meeting in Philadelphia last year, and the ensuing Convention will serve to establish it on a secure basis. The sessions will continue four or five days. A circular issued by Bishop Potter announces that generous arrangements have been made by the citizens of Cleveland to relieve the members of expense, and a reduction of fare has been obtained on several lines of communication, in order to insure a general attendance.

An Old French Anchor.—The schooner Fly, of Hull, says the Boston Traveler of July 22d, yesterday fished up, opposite Fort Independence, an anchor weighing nearly three thousand pounds. About eight feet, including the ring, was gone. Some three years since, an anchor was found by Solomon Dill, of Hull, weighing 5,000 pounds. They are supposed to be anchors lost by the French fleets, which for several years after our Revolution made Boston harbor their rendezvous for the winter season. The anchor found three years ago was sold to Mr. Alger of the South Boston Iron Works, who worked it over into one of the posts of Minot Light House. These anchors are made entirely different from those of the present day. The rings are three feet in diameter for passing through the hempen cable. Chains were not used in those days. The palms or ends of the flukes, measured two feet and ten inches across the center.

The Presbyterian Church at Bound Brook, N. J., was struck with lightning, and very badly damaged, on Sabbath, July 19.

European News.

By the steamer America we have later news from Europe; but there is not much worth copying.

Concerning the Exhibition, we have the stereotyped announcement that it continues thronged. The prizes are not to be awarded till after the close, the period for which has been fixed for about the middle of October. It is intended that arrangements shall be made for lighting up the building in the evenings.

Cardinal Wiseman has been worsted in an action at law in Jersey.

Accounts from Ireland announce that the potato disease has reappeared. The extent is only partial.

A grand fete was to have taken place on the 11th, on board the United States steamship Atlantic.

The bill for the Emancipation of the Jews has passed the Commons and been sent up to the Lords. It is hoped that it will not, for the third time, meet an untimely fate in that branch of the Legislature.

There is little news from Germany, except fresh reports of arrangments concerted at Warsaw for the military disposition in Germany, so as to suppress any revolutionary attempt.

From Italy, there is an unusual number of reports of assassination. The assassin of Marco Evangelisti is said to have been arrested.

Accounts from Constantinople, to the 24th ult., state that Cartel, a village on the Asiatic shore, opposite to Prince's Islands, had been completely destroyed by fire.

Accounts from Comorn, Austria, state that violent shocks of an earthquake were felt there on the 1st. The shocks were accompanied by violent claps of thunder. The clocks in all the church towers struck; scarcely a single house remains uninjured, numerous chimneys fell in, and the furniture and utensils in the rooms were overthrown and broken. Many accidents had occurred, but, providentially, not any of a fatal nature are yet known. The inhabitants, who were compelled to flee from their houses, are nearly all encamped in the open fields.

Insurrection in Cuba.

Intelligence has been received, and is generally credited, of a serious insurrection at Puerto Principe, in Cuba. It seems that a Pronunciamento for Independence was made on the 4th of July, on which day the first real battle for liberty took place. The Government troops previously sent out to make prisoners of the revolutionists came up with the guerilla party of Joaquin Aguero y Aguero, at the foot of the Cascorro mountains, and about four or five miles from the village of that name. The Cubans numbered 200 men and the Spaniards 300 men, consisting of 100 lancers and 200 infantry. After a sharp engagement the Spaniards fled, their captain and 20 others being killed, together with 18 wounded. The Cubans had only two or three wounded and none killed. Twelve Spanish soldiers came over to the Cuban side. This battle inspired very great confidence among the people, and immediately the numbers of the insurgents increased rapidly. At the last accounts they were known to number 1,000 men and more. These were divided into five guerilla parties of 200 men each, under the commands of Joaquin Aguero y Aguero, Francisco Aguero y Estrada, and Ubaldo Arteaga y Pina. These parties are stationed around in the strongholds in the vicinity of Cascorro and Puerto Principe, drilling and augmenting their numbers.

A dispatch from New Orleans, dated July 25, says:—

"By the arrival of the steamer Falcon, today, from Havana, we learn that the patriots had several engagements with the government troops. In one battle, it is reported that not less than three hundred of the latter were killed. Many of the government troops had joined the revolutionary movement. The Governor of Matanzas states, in a communication to the Captain General, that the citizens are coming forward promptly to defend the city against the insurgents."

A letter from Havana, dated July 22d, and telegraphed from Charleston, says:—

The patriots attacked Col. Conte, who was rafting his troops across a river near Puerto Principe, and killed three hundred, and took the Colonel and other officers prisoners. The Gaceta announces another outbreak in the Vuelta Arribu. Several companies have gone over.

From the St. Paul (Min.) Democrat.

News from the Selkirk Settlement.

Our readers will remember an interesting account we published in February last of the arrival of a dog train and mail, under charge of two voyageurs, from Selkirk, away up North in the British Possessions, between five and six hundred miles from St. Paul. One of the voyageurs, James McKay, a very intelligent and noble specimen of a Northman, arrived here on Saturday, 20 days from Selkirk. He brought down Capt. V. Foss, of the British Army, who has been three years at Fort Gray and now returns to England. They came with two Red River carts and six horses. The crops at Red River looked remarkably well when they left. The spring had been earlier than usual. There had not been an excess of rain nor high waters like those of last season. They raise large crops of barley, oats, spring wheat, potatoes, cabbages, turnips, beets, melons, onions, and all kinds of garden vegetables that grow in temperate latitudes. The corn crop is not relied upon—it is a precarious crop, though raised in every garden for table use.

The Scotch Presbyterians are erecting a church building. They expect a clergyman from Canada. Mr. McKay will take him up. He is expected here shortly.

The population of Selkirk Settlement is about 7,000, including Indians. They enjoy good health and are rapidly improving in circumstances.

Capt. Foss thinks that if the facilities for emigration to that region were greater, the population would increase rapidly from that source. The ice in the rivers disappeared early in April. They plant early in May. They usually have frosts till the 1st of June, and again in September. The season is long enough to mature the crops. The rivers usually freeze over by the middle of November.

JENNY LIND AT AUBURN.—Mad'lle Lind made her appearance on foot in the streets at Auburn several times, while in that city—and because she could do so without the annoyance of a train of followers. She visited the prison also, and was conducted through the shops, occasionally speaking encouraging words to the convicts, who were permitted by the keeper, under a relaxation of the rules, to reply. In one of the shops, a convict, aware of her presence, sent round a shaving among his fellows, on which her name was written with chalk. The kind interest she exhibited in their behalf, seemed to touch the hearts of not a few of them. Mad'lle Lind also visited Owasco Lake, famous for its echo. She sung the echo song there, and was enchanted with the precision with which her own notes came back to her. [Alb. Argus.

LONGEVITY.—There are now living in Newark and its vicinity, seven brothers and sisters, the youngest of whom is in his 56th year. The last death was an infant, in August, 1798; consequently there has not been a death in the family in nearly 53 years. The mother of this family died in her 73d year, the father in his 85th—his mother in her 89th, and his two sisters each in their 92d—one in Newark, the other in Elizabethtown recently. One of the seven lives with a married daughter, herself past 50, whose husband is one of nine children, the youngest in the neighborhood of 50; the oldest died in infancy, 57 years ago. All are married, and but two are living with the second connection. Most of them reside in and near Newark. Their mother is in her 80th year. [N. Y. Tribune.

BALLOONING.—Mr. Wise, the æronaut, made a very successful balloon ascension from Philadelphia on Monday afternoon. The voyagers were Mr. Wise, his wife and son, Miss E. Denton and W. R. Stockton, of Spring Garden. The balloon rose gracefully to the height of over one hundred feet, and remained stationary for a few minutes. It was then drawn down by means of a windlass, to which the end of the rope was affixed. At half-past six o'clock the rope was cut, and the balloon, with the same persons, shot upwards, and continued to rise to a great height, perpendicularly. It afterwards took a northeasterly direction, and was perceptible to view for nearly an hour.

SUMMARY.

The Norwich (Conn.) Aurora mentions a very remarkable case of the effects of fright upon a horse which occurred in Franklin a short time since. A horse belonging to Mr Palmer was grazing in the yard near the fence, when the elephants belonging to a menagerie were passing along. The horse did not observe them till they were quite close to him, when looking up and seeing the huge animals, he started back in a fright, ran to the opposite side of the yard, stood for a moment quivering, and then dropped dead. He was literally frightened to death.

One of the Trustees of the State Bank of Illinois states, in reference to the late sales of lands belonging to it, that previous to the sales the lands were valued by competent judges, and all such parcels as commanded bids to two-thirds the amount of the valuation were sold, payment to be made one-third down, and the remainder in six and twelve months, in the notes of the Bank. The amount realized was more than one hundred thousand dollars. The sale of a small portion of the land, valued at about twenty thousand dollars, was postponed until October, to await the location of the Central Railroad.

Prince Demidoff has purchased the estate of San Martino, on the Island of Elba, formerly belonging to Napoleon, and has received permission from the Tuscan Government to establish there a Napoleonic Museum. The Prince already possesses many thousands of articles, which have either belonged to the Emperor, or have some interesting relation to him.

The Kölnische Zeitung says: The Countess Bocarme, who is a remarkably fine pianist, has received a proposition, accompanied with the most favorable terms, from the agent of Barnum in New York, to give a series of concerts in the United States. This proposal she has, nevertheless, declined.

The Lake Superior Journal advocates the subject of constructing a railroad from Lake Superior to Lake Michigan. The distance from the bay of Noquet, on Lake Michigan, to Carp River, on Lake Superior, is fifty miles, and a level country intervenes. This project is destined to benefit the iron mines.

Twelve students of Dartmouth College, some of them members of the senior class, and one a son of President Lord, have been dismissed for riotous conduct at St. Johnsbury, Vt., where a large number of them went to witness a display of fire-works on the Monday following the 4th.

In the harbor of Boston, last Sixth-day, David Crosbie, aged 15 years, fell overboard from the yacht "Alice." Mr. Caleb S. McClennen, Assistant Engineer in the Boston fire department, jumped in to rescue him, but they sunk together, and were both drowned.

The department at Washington has suspended Capt. Frazer from the Revenue Service in the Pacific, in consequence of the charge of his having flogged one of his crew at the gangway, in violation of the act of Congress abolishing corporeal punishment, and of the general order of the Department issued in pursuance of that law.

At Portland, Me., Charles W. Child has been committed to the County Jail for 30 days, for having in his possession ardent spirits contrary to law, and refusing to pay a fine. The liquor was ordered to be destroyed.

The Erie Methodist Conference recently held its annual session at Warren, Ohio. Not having the fear of the Union Safety Committee before its eyes, it gave expression to its earnest hostility to the Fugitive Slave Law.

A Porcelain Manufactory is about to be established in Stockton, California, by the Chinese. The feld-spar of which this beautiful ware is made is found in large masses in the San Joaquin Valley.

The Evening Post has private advices from Kentucky, to the effect that Cassius M. Clay will probably poll at least 10,000 votes for Governor in that State, as the Emancipation candidate.

One day last week an accident occurred on the New Haven Railroad from the giving way of a break, which occasioned the death of one man, and wounded many others.

An iron bell-tower, to be 100 feet high, is now being erected in 32d street, near the North River, New York. The bell for this tower will weigh 20,000 pounds, being about double the weight of any other bell now in use in the State. The foundation is laid 14 feet below the surface of the ground, and is supported and braced with iron shafts sunk in solid rock. The tower will command a view of the whole city and island, and a watch will be kept in the observatory for fires, under the direction of the fire Department.

A riot occurred at Saco, Me., on Friday, July 18th, growing out of the arrest of Mr. Gurney, for selling liquor. James Tuttle, a friend of Gurneys' struck one of the witnesses named Evans, and a general fight ensued. Tuttle was arrested, and subsequently rescued from the police, but when the fight was over he gave himself up. Several of the police were badly beaten, and a large extra force has been sworn in, in anticipation of more trouble. Three arrests of rioters have been made.

The following is a statement of the amount of duties collected at the principal ports for the year ending June 30, 1851: New York, $31,756,199; Boston, $6,577,540; Philadelphia, $3,667,838; Baltimore, 1,047,278; New Orleans, 2,296,636; Charleston, $600,712; Portland, $209,030; Savannah, $208,994; St. Louis, 213,832; Cincinnati, 105,191; New Haven, 102,139; Mobile, 76,184; Louisville, 66,572; Oswego, 91,557; Richmond, $70,235.

We learn from the White Mountains, that on Tuesday night the venerable patriarch of the mountains, Abel Crawford, Esq., departed this life. He died after a lingering and painful illness, at the advanced age of eighty-six years. Mr. Crawford was one of the earliest settlers in those wild and secluded regions, having resided for about sixty years on the spot where the Mount Crawford House now stands, about six miles below the Notch Valley.

Recent excavations near Western Row, between Pearl and Second streets, in Cincinnati, have led to the belief that the channel of the Ohio River ran there centuries ago. Old inhabitants of the place remember that there was a lagoon on the site above named, and that until recently there were ponds near the foot of Fifth street, nearly as deep as the bed of the river.

The following statement shows the whole number of vessels belonging to the United States Navy: Ships of the Line, 11; Razee, 1; Frigates, first class, 12; Frigates second class, 2; Sloops of war, 21; Brigs, 4; Schooners, 5; Steamers, 14; Store ships and brigs, 6; Total ships 76.

The Annual Meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science will be held at Albany on Monday, the 18th August, and probably continue through the week. It is expected that the attendance on this occasion will be larger than ever before, on account of the central position of the Capital and the easy access thereto by Railroad from the East and West.

The splendid new clipper ship "Racer" is said to be a beautiful craft; she is 1,800 tons burden, built in the most substantial manner by Currier & Townsend, at their yard in Newburyport, and was launched on the 18th of June. She is the largest ship that was ever launched into the Merrimac River. The "Racer" is owned by David Ogden of New York, and will be employed between this port and Liverpool. She cost about $120,000.

The following statistics of the progress of Des Moines County, Iowa, are interesting, as indicating the rapid advance of that young State. There are 229,942 acres of land and 14,488 inhabitants. The total value of real estate is $2,130,924, and personal property $477,672. Burlington has 5,129 inhabitants. The population of the County has increased 1,500 during the past year, and the average valuation of entered land is $5 87 per acre.

The Ogdensburg (Northern N. Y.) Railroad Company are rapidly extending their piers the additional space into the Lake at Rouse's Point authorized by the New York Legislature. The act recently passed allows them to dock out until the distance left between the two wharves is just fifty feet shorter than the length of the float already launched.

During the storm on Saturday evening, July 19, a schooner lying at the wharf at Hoboken had her mainmast shattered by lightning. The captain and crew were in the cabin at the time, but experienced no effect of this shock. It is supposed the fluid passed down the center-board pit, as no traces of it could be discovered on deck.

The Stockbridge Indians are about purchasing two townships of land in Minnesota, on which to locate. For 25 yea s these Indians have resided at Green Bay. They number about 300, and are descendants of an ancient tribe of that name often mentioned in the history of the early settlement of Massachusetts.

Archbishop Kendrick, of St. Louis, has purchased a half block of ground in that city, lying on Pine street, between Sixteenth and Seventeenth, for the site of a splendid Cathedral, which is to be the Metropolitan Church. Mrs. Anne L. Hunt has made extensive donations of lands and money for the sake of the cause.

Since the new dog law went into operation in New York, about the 1st of last month, 1,080 dogs have been caught running at large, for which 50 cents each have been paid, making the sum of $540 up to the present date. During the same period last year, under the old law, only 480 were caught and killed.

Extensive preparations are being made for the next Exhibition of the Rhode Island Society for the Encouragement of Industry. The rooms rented for the purpose, says the Providence Journal, are the finest for such purposes in New England, and steam power will be provided in case machines of such value and interest are offered as to justify the expense.

Two brothers named Dudley, and a young man named Brown, on their way home to Maine from California, were robbed at the Adams House, Boston, of $3,000 in gold dust. The gold was their joint stock property, kept in a leathern bag, and stolen from the room they occupied at the hotel.

The Albany Journal says: The Hudson River Railroad, it is still confidently asserted, will be completed through early in October. The section to Tivoli will be opened, it is said, as early as the 10th of August. This will leave but thirty miles of steamboating.

On the 22d inst., as the express train on the Utica and Syracuse Railroad was coming East, when about a mile West of Canestota, an old lady about fifty years of age, said to be deaf, and carrying a parasol over her head, stepped out from some bushes, (where she had been gathering berries,) upon the track, and walked directly against one of the passenger cars, which hit her upon the temple, throwing her a distance of about twenty feet, and killing her instantly.

An Association in Baltimore, entitled the "Balance of Power," have determined to contribute a beautiful block of Maryland marble to the National Washington Monument. It will be three by four feet in length and breadth, and bear in embossed work the following inscription: "The Balance of Power will Preserve the Union." The word balance is to be symbolized by a pair of handsome scales.

An eclipse of the sun was to occur (and probably did) on Second-day morning of the present week. It had peculiar interest for astronomers from the fact of its being the only total eclipse which will occur on the Northern portion of the earth until the 19th of August, 1887. It was to be only partial in this country, the depth of the shadow at New York being 3½ orgits, or less than a third of the sun's surface.

A dispatch from Chateaugay, N. Y., Tuesday, July 22, says: Five young people, named James Ayres, Garret Persey, Jr., Sophronia Persey, Mary Crippen, and Enied Daley, went out on the mill-pond of the Chateaugay River for a sail last night. The night was quite dark and by a sudden movement the boat was upset and all five were drowned. The bodies were found. Their ages were from 17 to 20.

Joseph Fisher, first mate of the whaling ship Planter, has been arrested at Boston upon a charge of being concerned in the death of William Clark, one of the crew, off Pitt's Island, in the South Pacific. It appears that the captain shot the sailor, having first declared the ship in a state of mutiny. He afterwards abandoned the vessel at Hobart Town, probably to avoid the responsibility for the deed.

On Sixth-day last, the Coroner of New York held an inquest at the house 26 Spruce street on the body of Amelia Serratius, aged 22 years, born in Germany, who died from inhaling an over dose of chloroform. It appears the deceased had been afflicted with the teethache, and to allay the pain administered to herself the dangerous medicine.

Three men belonging to Roxbury, Mass., while digging at the corner of Ruggles and Parker streets, at the depth of three or four feet, discovered a box or trunk containing a large amount of money, supposed to have been buried there by a notorious character named Walker, who occupied a cottage in the vicinity some time since.

The first semi-annual report of the new Marshal of Police in Philadelphia shows that the number of arrests made by the Police since the new organization, is 7,131, of which number 135 were for fighting in the streets, 151 for inciting to riot, 91 for gambling, 80 for interfering with officers.

Wasby Dallon was the name of a young man killed on Saturday before last by falling from the roof of the building 49 Maiden lane, New York. Deceased was 29 years of age, a native of the North of Ireland, the chief support of a widowed mother, to whom he was a most fond and doting son.

Dr. Tyng of New York is reported to have stated lately, that of the six hundred members of his (St. George's) Church, he did not know a single person who either drank liquor, or offered it to others; and he never saw in any of their dwellings, any of the paraphernalia of liquor drinking.

A small collection of pictures belonging to Ralph Fletcher of Gloucester was lately sold at auction in London. Landseer's "Lion and Stag," painted in 1820, brought about $810; an Italian Landscape by Claude, $700; a landscape by Cuyp, $1,700; "Canal in Holland," by Ruysdæl, $750, &c.

DIED.

In Brookfield, N. Y., on the 18th inst., Mrs. ABIGAIL BROWN, widow of the late Mr. Jabish Brown, in the eighty first year of her age. Mrs. B. was a long-standing member of the First-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, and has left satisfactory evidence of her happy change.

In Brookfield, N. Y., on the 19th inst., Mrs. REBECCA BROWN, widow of the late Isaac Brown, aged 65 years. She was a member of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield. By her consistent walk as a Christian, and her exemplary patience and submission through a long season of extreme suffering, she has exemplified the genuineness of her faith in Christ. She was much endeared to her family and numerous connections. She made hospitality an avocation, and many strangers and distant friends have shared in her kindness. "The memory of the just is blessed." W. B. M.

At West Edmeston, N. Y., July 20th, Mrs. CLARISSA MAXSON, consort of Dea. Ephraim Maxson, aged 51 years. Sister Maxson professed religion in early life, and united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield, with which she remained till dismissed to unite with the 3d Church at its organization. She continued a worthy member of said third Church until dismissed to join the church triumphant. Sister Maxson's complaint was pulmonary consumption, with which she lingered a number of months, bearing her sickness with much patience and resignation, and she died as a Christian. She has left a large circle of friends to mourn her loss.

In Albion, Wisconsin, July 6th, of congestion of the brain, LOUISA L., adopted daughter of Paul S. and Susan EDWARDS, aged 16 years, two months, and twenty days.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress
Rev. J W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—

The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3, " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term. Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting,	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

The Christian Review.

THE removal of this Quarterly to New York more than a year since, and its elevation in character, the Publishers are happy to say, have greatly increased its circulation. Seeing this readiness to appreciate and patronize their efforts, they are determined to spare no pains or expense in raising the work to the highest point of excellence, every way worthy of its position in the metropolis of the nation, and as the organ of one of the most numerous and respectable denominations in the land.

TERMS.

For a single copy, three dollars per annum. No subscriptions received for less than a volume commencing with the Jan. No. of each year.

Every person forwarding the subscription price of four copies, shall receive a fifth copy gratis.

POSTAGE PRE-PAID.

When paid in advance, the postage will be pre-paid by the Publishers; or, the postage will be pre-paid on all numbers issued after the payment of the subscription. ☞ NEW POSTAGE LAW. ☜

This offer of pre-payment of postage is of more importance in consequence of the new law. The postage under 500 miles is the same as before; over 500 and under 1,500 miles the postage will be double; over 1,500 and under 2,500 miles, treble; and over 2,500 and 3,500, quadruple.

☞ If, however, the postage is pre-paid it is only one-half the above rates.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

This periodical has at last taken its true position. It will now challenge comparison with the best religious Reviews—proving that the Baptists have intellectual power and diversity enough to maintain a denominational Quarterly of the highest standard. [Watchman and Reflector.

In tasteful and correct mechanical execution the "Review" is not surpassed by any of the Quarterlies. . . . Every minister should have it; and we wonder that more of our lay brethren, of educated mind, literary taste, and pecuniary ability, do not subscribe. [Michigan Christian Herald.

We take pleasure in commending the "Christian Review"—ever a visitor to many of our homes—to southern patronage. [Southern Baptist.

This is one of the best Quarterlies in the United States, and may, in fact, be regarded as a model of its kind. [Western Literary Messenger.

We have always regarded the "Christian Review" as an able, candid, and fearless exponent of truth, both in religion and literature. It is eminently catholic in its spirit, and comprehensive in its scope. We commend it, cordially, to religious readers. [Southern Literary Gazette.

Miscellaneous.

The World is Round.

BY PROF. LOOMIS, OF THE N. Y. UNIVERSITY.

I have been requested to prepare for the Literary World a short notice of the new experiment for demonstrating the rotation of the earth. While yielding to this request, I must disclaim all pretensions to originality. The following notice only claims to exhibit in a connected form principles and illustrations which have already appeared in various papers.

The doctrine of the rotation of the earth upon its axis has been so long taught—it has become so extensively incorporated into the text-books for elementary instruction—that we rarely meet a person who has the hardihood to call it in question. Nevertheless it is remarkable, that this doctrine, so fundamental in the science of Astronomy, and so generally admitted to be true, has attained to this distinction rather in virtue of the explanation it has afforded of certain observed phenomena, than as the result of any direct experiment. There was, indeed, one experiment performed many years ago for the purpose of demonstrating the rotation of the earth. I refer to the descent of bodies falling from a great height. Laplace has shown that a body beginning to fall from a state of rest at a point considerably elevated above the surface of the earth, will, on account of the rotary motion of the earth, deviate sensibly from the vertical line towards the east; and he has given the theoretical explanation for this deviation. Several experiments upon the fall of bodies have been made in Italy and Germany, which agree with the theoretical results, but in the opinion of Laplace, these experiments, which are very delicate, ought to be repeated with greater care.

M. Foucault, of Paris, has recently proposed a new experiment for demonstrating the earth's rotation. It consists in suspending a heavy ball from a firm support by a fine flexible wire; then causing it to vibrate as a pendulum; and observing carefully the plane in which the vibrations are performed.

In order to comprehend the philosophy of this experiment, it is necessary to understand clearly one preliminary principle, viz., that if a pendulum, such as we have supposed, be put in vibration in a vertical plane, this plane of vibration will not change its position, even though the point of support of the pendulum be made to revolve through an entire circumference. As this is the fundamental principle of the experiment in question, it should not be left unverified. Any one may verify it for himself by a very simple arrangement. Suspend a metallic ball by a string or some flexible substance, and let the upper end of the string pass through the axis of a small cylinder of metal or wood which is fitted to a corresponding cavity in a supporting frame, so that the cylinder may be made to revolve about its axis in a vertical position, and a corresponding rotation be given to the pendulum. Then, if the pendulum be put in vibration in the plane of the meridian, for example, and the cylinder from which the pendulum is suspended be revolved ninety degrees, some might anticipate that the plane in which the vibrations of the pendulum are performed, would be changed by the same quantity, and would now be found at right angles with the meridian. Such a conclusion is contradicted by experiment. The plane of vibration still coincides with the meridian. We may revolve the support of the pendulum through an entire circumference, without sensibly changing the position of the plane of vibration. The string will indeed be twisted, and the ball will revolve about its axis, but the plane of its vibrations will remain unchanged.

Having formed a clear conception of this fundamental principle, we will proceed to consider what effect would result from the rotation of the earth, if a pendulum were suspended directly over the North Pole. We will suppose the pendulum to consist of a heavy metallic sphere, suspended from a fixed point by a slender, cylindrical wire; and let us first suppose it to have no vibratory motion. The pendulum will revolve slowly upon its axis once in twenty-four hours, copying exactly the motion of the earth; although when compared with the earth's surface it will appear to have no rotation. Suppose now the pendulum to be put in vibration in a vertical plane. In conformity with the principle above enunciated, the position of this plane will not be changed by the rotation of the point of support. The plane of vibration, when referred to the distant stars, maintains an unvarying position. But objects on the earth's surface in the neighborhood of the pendulum are continually changing their position with reference to the stars. A table placed beneath the pendulum, and firmly secured to the earth, would in one hour be made to revolve through an arc of fifteen degrees with reference to a fixed line upon the table. It would be most natural for us to regard the position of the table as fixed; and we should, therefore, say that the plane of vibration of the pendulum had changed. In reality the plane of vibration of the pendulum has remained unchanged, and the table has revolved. Each moment, a new meridian comes into coincidence with the plane of vibration, and at the end of twenty-four hours, the table has made a complete revolution under the pendulum.

If the same experiment be tried at a station a short distance from the pole—so near that it might be regarded as situated in a plane touching the earth's surface at the pole, the results will be essentially the same as already described. The pendulum will now be carried in twenty-four hours around the pole in a small circle—the directions of the pendulum at the different points of this circle may be regarded as parallel to each other—the plane of vibration will constantly move parallel to itself—but a table placed under the pendulum, and firmly secured to the earth, will make an entire revolution in twenty-four hours. It is true that a meridian traced upon the table will always continue to be a meridian, but the direction of that meridian with respect to the stars will change fifteen degrees every hour. It seems most natural for us to regard the position of the table as fixed; and when we see the plane of vibration of the pendulum change with reference to a fixed line on the table, we should say that the plane of vibration had changed. In fact, however, the plane of vibration constantly moves parallel to itself, and it is the table which revolves.

Fairmount Water-Works.—The Philadelphia Ledger says that the new reservoir of the Fairmount Water-Works is fast approaching completion. At present, an altitude of 14 feet has been gained in the embankments, which are to be 19 feet high, capable of containing 15 feet of water, or about 18,000,000 ale gallons. The distance from the works is nearly 4,000 feet, and the main to be used is thirty inches in diameter. The reservoir, when completed, will be 15 feet higher than Fairmount, and will make the total capacity of the several basins, 40,500,000 ale gallons of water, when full. At Fairmount, a stand pipe of cast iron, 40 feet high and 4 feet in diameter, will be erected, into which the water will be pumped by the present machinery, and will flow over to the new reservoir by its own gravity. The greatest quanity of water ever pumped in one day was 8,250,000 ale gallons, during the month of June. The average daily supply for the year, thus far, was as follows: January, 4,079,563 gallons; February, 4,873,664; 4,285,122; April 5,581,308; May, 6,080,178; June, 7,486,624.

Death of a Royal Daughter of the Mogul Race.

The princess Alina d'Eldir, a royal daughter of the Mogul race, expired in Paris, recently, at the advanced age of 89. Born in Delhi, in the Imperial Palace, her childhood was surrounded with all the splendor of Eastern sovereignty. Being one day at play upon a terrace of the palace garden, which overhung the river, she slipped from the embankment and fell in. Carried by the swiftness of the tide soon beyond reach, she was mourned by her family as lost. She was, however, picked up by fishermen, who, at sight of her rich attire, and the jewels with which she was adorned, immediately seized her as their prize, and bore her off to Chandernagor, where she was given into the hands of the French, to be held as a hostage to secure the neutrality of her relatives in the war then going on between the French and English. Meanwhile the recall of the Captain Bouchaud de Lafontaine, to whom she had been con fided, caused her to be brought to France, where every honor was paid to her, and every care taken of her education. She was taken to court, and became an especial favorite of Maria Antoinette, under whose auspices she was placed in the convent of Mount Calvary, and where she was baptized, the whole court, with the King and Queen, assisting, in state, at the ceremony.

During the reign of terror, she was imprisoned for daring to belong to an aristocratic race, and condemned to be guillotined, having had her hair already cut for the purpose, when the overthrow of Robespierre restored her to life and liberty once more. The Empress Josephine took especial delight in her society, and Napoleon would often declare his intention of proceeding through Egypt to the conquest of India for the express purpose of placing her on the throne of her ancestors. On the restoration of the Bourbons, when intercourse was re-established with the East, a petition was presented to Louis XVIII. for an inquiry into the existence of her family. The result of this inquiry was the arrival in Paris of the Sheik Goolam-Mou-hi Oud-Din, sent by Fei-iaz Alli-Khad, with express commission to claim her at the hands of the French King, and to bring her back with royal honor to Delhi. But here arose an unexpected difficulty. The religion she professed, and in which she had been brought up, precluded all idea of her ever being admitted back as a member of her family. In vain was every promise, every inducement held out; nay, every threat resorted to, in order to obtain even a semblance of change. Her high soul rejected with scorn the most alluring temptations, and she preferred to live in the poverty and obscurity to which both England and France, with the basest meanness and injustice had condemned her, rather than swerve from the Christian faith. The East India Company, whose spoil her rich heritage has become, has suffered her to die without one single manifestation of interest. [Atlas.

Restitution of Conjugal Rights.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was occupied on Saturday last with an appeal in the case of restitution of conjugal rights, on the part of Rev. Pierce Connelly against his wife, Cornelia Augusta Connelly. The parties were married at Philadelphia, according to the rights and ceremonies of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and five children had been born to them. Rev. Pierce Connelly, at the time of the marriage, was a priest of the Church of England in America, and was a rector of the Church of Natchez, in the State of Mississippi. In the year 1835, the parties became disposed to become Roman Catholics, but the husband was anxious first to proceed to Rome. They quitted Natchez and went to New Orleans, where they were accidentally delayed six weeks, during which time the wife, who was unwilling to proceed to Europe until she had professed the Roman Catholic faith, was received into the Church of Rome. On the 24th of February, 1836, they reached Rome, and on the 27th of March the reverend gentleman, on his abjuration of the Protestant faith, was also received into the Roman Catholic Church.

In January, 1838, they left the continent, and settled at Grand Coteau, in the state of Louisiana, where they continued till May, 1842. Whilst resident there, the Rev. Pierce Connelly proposed to his wife that henceforth they should live in constant and perfect chastity, in order to the more fully devoting themselves to the service of God, and with a special view to the declared wish and intention of the husband to take holy orders in the Roman Catholic Church. The wife consented, and, in furtherance of this object, she took up her residence at the Convent of the Sacred Heart at Grand Coteau. The husband then took another journey to Rome in July 1842, returned to Philadelphia, where his wife joined him from the convent where she had been residing during his absence. On the 7th of December 1843, husband and wife again reached Rome, where they lived together in the same house, but observing perfect chastity.

Their visit to Rome was to obtain the sentence of separation from each other, which was necessary to enable the husband to take holy orders, and the wife to become a nun. The sentence of separation was pronounced, the wife was placed in a convent in Rome, and the husband entered a college to prepare for holy orders. It became necessary, before the husband took orders, that his wife should take a solemn vow of perpetual chastity. Before doing this, she represented to her husband the nature of the obligations to which he was about to bind himself irrevocably, and offered to release him from all those difficulties and trials by returning to their previous mode of life, and thereby sacrificing any wish or will of her own. The husband persisted in his determination, and took holy orders. He then came to England and officiated as private chaplain to the Earl of Shrewsbury.

Mrs. Connelly went to a Convent in Paris for three months, and then came to England, where she founded at Derby a community of religious women, since removed to Hastings, in Sussex, (and of which she afterwards became, and now is, the Superioress,) under the title of the "Congregation of the Holy Child Jesus." In January, 1848, the husband went to Rome, but returned in May, and then went to the Convent to see his wife. She refused to see him, although he had commenced an action against her for the restitution of conjugal rights. The case will again be taken before the Court of Arches, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, after having reformed some technical legal defects, having decided to remit the case to that Court. From the Friend of Youth.

Liberty or Death.

Many winters since, when the Ohio river above Cincinnati had been for some time closed, a sudden thaw brought down the ice in large quantities, forming a gorge opposite the mouth of the Licking. For some days the ice was so firm as to admit of a free passage by pedestrians; but at length it became soft and porous, and in some places disappeared beneath the surface of the stream. The passage was now considered unsafe, and had not been used for several days, when one evening, near twilight, a poor fugitive, hard pressed by her pursuers, rushed down the bank of the Kentucky side, and plunged fearlessly into the dark mass of ice and turbid water. A child of two years old, thrown across her shoulders, clung to her neck, leaving both her hands free to aid in the fearful struggle.

For a moment she paused. Before her rolled the angry river, chafing against the masses of ice that obstructed its course, every moment sweeping away broken fragments, and rendering the passage more perilous; behind her, close on her track, were her merciless foes, with eager gestures and loud threats warning her not to proceed. She heeded them not. Better perish in the dark mass of water than live a slave. Her child, the only tie that bound her to life clung, to her neck, and she felt that it were better to die thus than return to hopeless bondage. On the dauntless woman rushed, each step a struggle for life, sinking to her knees in the water as the frail ice bent beneath her weight, and breaking off as she sprang forward, was swept away by the flood. On, still on she pressed, leaving at each step an impassable gulf between her and her pursuers. She reaches the shore—she is safe! her enemies were completely foiled. A boat would have been crushed in a moment in the whirling masses of ice, and they stood baffled and irresolute, hoping that some kindred spirit on the opposite side would seize her as soon as she landed. But no! those who, under ordinary circumstances, have no pity for the slave, were softened at the sight of the weak woman venturing where even the strong heart of man might well quail, and staking life against the hope of freedom. She was protected and sped onward to a a land of liberty, where she with her child found a refuge.

Negro Raffle.

In my tour through the Southern States, says a correspondent of the Louisville Journal, I have met with many amusing incidents, but do not remember anything that created so great an excitement for the time being as a "negro raffle," in the town of ——, in the State of Mississippi. Mr. ——, the owner of the boy, having a note to pay that day, and not having the wherewith to do it, was compelled to do what he gladly would not have done. The boy to be raffled was a smart, intelligent lad of about 18 years of age. He went by the name of Bill. There were 80 chances, with "three dice," at $10 per chance. I was present when the affair came off; there remained one chance, which I took and gave to Bill upon the condition that he would throw the dice himself, and "shake like oxen." Bill rolled his eyes in an astonished and astonishing manner, and after a hearty wha! wha! wha! in which he displayed two frightful rows of ivory, opening a mouth "like the break of day from east to west," with a low bow, said: "I'll try, massa." As may be supposed, the scene became highly exciting.

The raffling commenced. Bill looked on unconcerned at anything but the idea of leaving his old master. When the chances were all raffled off but the last, Bill took the box; previously to his throwing, however, he was offered $100 for his chance, the highest throw yet made being 46 which stood "a tie" between two individuals, but Bill was no "compromise man;" he refused the offer, saying "the whole hog or noffin," and made his first throw, which was 13, his second throw was 16; Bill stopped, scratched his head, threw again, and up came 18. It was declared off that "Bill was high and free;" and such a shout I never heard in my life. Bill hardly knew what to do with himself. In a moment, however, he asked the whole party to drink.

Bill's success induced him to try another speculation of the "same sort," believing that he could do, as a free man, as much as he had before done; he proposed to set himself up again in a "raffle," and as he had won before, he thought it would be no more than fair that he should put the price at $600 this time. The chances were soon taken, Bill reserving but one chance to himself. He pocketed $590, and the sport again commenced. Bill's original owner and himself were the two highest again, and, in throwing off, Bill lost. It proved a speculation for Bill and his master both. The master had made $800 clear, and Bill had cleared $500, and remained with his kind master. They started for home together, the master declaring that no money could induce him to part with Bill again, unless he was willing to leave, but promised him, if he would be as faithful to him as he had been, until he was 21, he should have his freedom.

Case of Self-Emancipation.—Rev. J. M. Pease, Agent of the Colonization Society, gives an interesting account of a self-emancipated slave named John Ballows, who came from Congo, Africa, to one of the Islands in the West Indies, when 13 years old. He finally came with his master and family to Savannah. In 1818 he purchased himself, paying $550; a few years ago he purchased his wife for $500, and this season he has finished paying for his son, $700. Himself, wife and son now desire to go to Liberia. He is a fine looking man, with strong marks of sterling character, both moral and physical. He is well known as a most virtuous and industrious man. Himself and wife are members of the Church. How many such men, nobly endowed by God, are grinding in the prison-house of Slavery.

"But woe for those
Who trample o'er a mind—that deathless thing!
They know not what they do."

A Man of Business.

At the Greene County, New York, Agricultural Fair, an address was made by Col. Zadoc Pratt, from which we take the following passage:—

"And now I will show you the advantage those dreary hemlocks have been to the farmers of our mountain towns. Since I first engaged in farming it has been my lot to employ over fifteen thousand year's of other men's labor; an army of thirty thousand men have I employed, and I have paid those men, for their labor alone, over two million five hundred thousand dollars. I have cleared over ten thousand acres of land, used over two hundred thousand cords of hemlock bark, and paid over half a million of dollars for it. Used and worn out five hundred horses, and one thousand yoke of oxen. Used two hundred thousand bushels of oats, one hundred and twenty thousand tons of hay; thirty thousand barrels of beef and pork, and nearly one hundred thousand barrels of flour, and potatoes without number or measure. I have tanned one million two hundred and fifty sides of leather; my usual disbursement is over five thousand dollars per day, and I have used in my business here over ten millions. Every laborer received his money, yea every man his penny, in peace; and to the credit of this community be it said, that I never had a side of leather stolen, and never was chosen de fendant in law on account of my business transactions, during my residence among you. The great object of my living is to be useful. Live with your neighbor, and not on him. Allow me, gentlemen and ladies, to conclude by congratulating you upon the rich blessings of health, power, and prosperity, which surround you; and may succeeding generations do as much as you have done toward national wealth and industry, which are the safeguards to our independence."

Emancipation of Ninety Slaves.

Mr. Wm. Ragland of Caroline County, in Virginia, died a bachelor in the summer of 1849, leaving about 90 slaves and about $50,000 in other property after the payment of all his debts.

He left a will, which provides that all his slaves shall have their freedom, and remain upon his plantation to enjoy the fruits of their own labor, and of the property which they helped him to accumulate, with this alternate provision, that if the settlement of his emancipated slaves upon his plantation under trustees should be contrary to the policy of the law which requires that emancipated slaves shall be carried out of the State, then his executors shall convert his estate, real and personal (slaves of course excepted) into money, pay his debts, and with the balance of the money, probably $50,000, settle his slaves in some free State. This will has been contested by the relatives of Mr. Ragland in the Court of Caroline, and was recently established in favor of the slaves, by the Supreme Court in the city of Richmond The case was argued with great ability on both sides, and the decision meets the general approbation of the community. There are a few, however, who think that a will which provides for the emancipation of slaves as Mr. Ragland's does, is quite conclusive proof of the insanity of the testator.

These slaves, who thus become free by the justice and humanity of Mr. Ragland, will be removed as soon as practicable to some free State of this Union, or to Liberia. May the Lord dispose many other masters to follow the example of John Randolph of Roanoke, whose will commences thus: "In the name of God, Amen. I, John Randolph of Roanoke, do give and bequeath all my slaves their freedom, heartily regretting that I have ever been owner of one." [Cong. Jour.

Fanny Wright in Trouble.

The Cincinnati Commercial gives the particulars of a law suit just commenced by Frances Wright D'Arasmont against her husband. The case is a curious one in itself, and it derives additional interest from the circumstance that the once famous Fanny Wright is one of the parties. It appears that the case comes before the Court in the form of an application for an injunction, the appointment of a receiver and an allowance in the nature of alimony, expenses of litigation, &c. It was shown by the petition that Madame D'Arasmont was born in Scotland, and became possessed by inheritance of considerable property; that in 1830 she visited this country, invested a portion of funds in the purchase of estates in Cincinnati and in the South, and in 1831, visiting France, she there married W. P. D'Arasmont, by whom she had one daughter. The petitioner had between that period and 1845 paid several visits to the United States, where she had desired permanently to reside, and had also visited Scotland, where a valuable property had fallen to her as heir at law. She had about this time changed funds vested in her own name, to that of her husband, trusting in his honor; and the bill charges that a portion of this property had been sold by W. P. D'Arasmont, and that this respondent had deprived her by chicanery, not only of her property, but of the love and companionship of her daughter now grown to womanhood. The case will occupy at least a week.

Tobacco in Onondaga.—The Syracuse Journal states that the cultivation of Tobacco has been undertaken there to a considerable extent—a thousand acres being devoted to that plant. It wears at present a very promising appearance, and the weather has been favorable for its growth. The Tobacco lands are principally located in the towns of Salina, Clay, Manlius, Pompey, Skaneateles, and Marcellus. There are about 200 acres in the vicinity of Liverpool, where the soil seems to be well calculated to grow this crop—a warm, quick, sandy loam. Heretofore it has been yielding a very handsome profit—about $100 the acre. The land requires heavy manuring yearly, and the investment for sheds to dry the tobacco in is considerable.

"Let not the Rich Man Glory in his Riches."—The host of the St. Charles Hotel was conducting his brother over that immense establishment, the annual rent of which was $35,000; the furniture and stores were worth some $60,000 or $80,000. "Never," said he, "since we have been here has everything been in such perfect order. Here are the extensive purchases which you recently made at the North. All is ready for the coming of Jenny Lind." While he was yet speaking, the destroying element was yet consuming the building. They were called off from the survey by the cry of fire, and in a few hours all was burnt to the ground. [Amer. Mes.

"The Little Leaven."—The Puritan Recorder gives the appended illustration of the power of truth in extending its influence from small beginnings. It is from a notice of the London Tract Society:—

"I was present at one of its auxiliaries the other day, when one of the officials stated the following facts: A neighbor left a tract in the house of Richard Baxter, which was made useful to his conversion. He wrote the Saints' Rest, which was blessed to the conversion of Philip Doddridge. Dr. Doddridge wrote the Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, which was made instrumental to the conversion of William Wilberforce. Mr. Wilberforce wrote his Practical View, which was sanctified to the saving of Leigh Richmond's soul. Leigh Richmond wrote The Dairyman's Daughter; and the Tract Society has in its books 1539 instances of conversion to God through the instrumentality of that single tract! What an encouragement to tract distribution! What an illustration that the excellency of power to save is in God!"

Singular Case.—The Hudson Republican of the 22d inst., contains an account of a singular case which has occurred in that place. In 1842 Samuel Rankin was murdered at Austerlitz, in Columbia Co, and Michael Galligher, who had for years before lived in the county, was indicted for the murder. He ran away, however, and all attempts to arrest him failed. Last week a man of the name of Michael Galligher was arrested at Carbondale, Penn., and brought to Hudson and committed to jail as the person who stood indicted for the murder of Rankin. His counsel sued out a writ of habeas corpus, and upon being taken before the Recorder it was clearly shown that the prisoner was not the Michael Galligher who had been indicted for the murder of Rankin, but another person, of very respectable character, who has lived for more than twenty years in Carbondale, Penn., during all which time he has had a wife and family there and other relatives and friends. He was, moreover, never in the county of Columbia until brought under arrest week before last.

Flax Cotton.—The Utica Herald has an article from an eye-witness, who gives the following account of the manufacture of this article. He says it is "strong and fine as silk—white as snow, bright as silver; receiving the strongest color or the most delicate tint with equal permanency. It is stronger, cheaper, and much more beautiful than cotton. It is worth at least twice as much as cotton of the finest grade—will last twice as long; can be procured from the plant, after pulling, for six cents per pound, as fine as the specimen I give you, in six hours, no rotting, no anything. Put it through the machinere, and out it comes perfect. You may think this a tough story, but it is so."

Tobacco and Tight-Lacing.—Mrs. Swisshelm, noticing Dr. Shew's work on Tobacco, says: "It would be well enough for folks to read this little volume; but of course the lovers of the weed will not pay any attention to it. We are not sure, after all, that tobacco is not a blessing in the same sense tight-lacing is. This kills the silly, ignorant woman, and that the lazy, loafing men; and it is scarcely worth while wasting ink and paper on either class, trying to persuade them to live longer in a world from which they can be so well spared."

Variety.

The ship "Reindeer," which arrived at New York recently, after a long voyage from Canton, has the following variety of seamen, which will give an idea of how crews are made up now-a-days: 2 Americans, 2 Frenchmen, 1 Cape de Verd Islander, 1 Azore, 1 Portuguese, 1 Italian, 1 Spaniard, 1 Manilla man, 2 Englishmen, 1 Irishman, 1 Scotchman, 1 mulatto (American,) 2 Sandwich Island Indians, 2 Chinese (cook and steward,) 1 Swede, 1 Welshman.

Southey, in his "Omnia," relates the following: When I was last in Lisbon, a nun made her escape from a nunnery. The first thing for which she inquired, when she reached the house in which she was to be secreted, was a looking-glass. She had entered the convent when only five years old, and from that time had never seen her own face.

The Worcester Spy states that a machine has been invented in Leicester for measuring and folding cloth of every description at one operation, at the rate of eighty yards a minute, in yard folds. It is simple in construction, and does the work in a neat and perfect manner.

Experiments with chloroform as a propelling power, in the place of steam, are now making in the port of Lorient; and there is reason to hope, from the success which has already attended them, that they will result in causing a considerable saving to be effected in cost and in space.

In Alexandria, Va., R. P. Andrews, an eminent lawyer, slapped with the back of his hand his slave boy in the mouth; one of the teeth wounded the hand between two of the knuckles, and from the effects of that wound Mr. Andrews died in a few days afterwards.

A new system of posting the names of streets has been patented in London, and is on trial by the authorities. The name is blown or stamped in the glass on the street-lamps, and is thus seen equally well by night and day

Bell's Life in London recently stated that a lady had lost no less than £20,000 on the Derby Races. The Limerick Chronicle says the lady is the only daughter of the poet, Lord Byron: "Ada, sole daughter of my house and heart."

Several farmers in Maine and New Hampshire have publicly endorsed the remedy of Mr. Flanders of Lowell, of sprinkling slacked lime upon potato vines, to kill the insect which causes the rot. It is stated that the plagues have appeared earlier than usual this year.

In Ann street, New York, on Tuesday of last week, a young lady connected with a book-bindery was killed by the giving way of a trap door on which she accidentally fell. Another young lady was badly injured.

Letters received in Boston from Calcutta, dated May 15, mention that the ship Ariel, Capt. Burch, from Calcutta for China, had been destroyed by fire at Sands Head. No lives were lost.

An Illinois editor, speaking of an old offender, says that he has broken every bank, and jail, and Sabbath which they have had in that city for the last five years.

New Era for the "Best Youth's Magazine!"

☞ GREAT REDUCTION OF POSTAGE! ☜

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET,

STILL under the editorial charge of Francis C. Woodworth, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, commences a new series with the issue of the number for July, 1851. This number is now ready. Now is the time to subscribe.

The great reduction in postage goes into effect on the first day of July. From and after that day, the postage on a single number of the Cabinet (paid quarterly, in advance) will be, for any distance not over 500 miles, 1 cent; over 500, and not over 1500, 2 cents —it being a reduction to all subscribers within 500 miles from 42 cents to 12 cents per annum, to all other subscribers in the Union a reduction of almost one half from the old rates. The publisher anticipates, as the result of this liberal reduction, a large and immediate addition to his subscription list from every part of the country, as the former high rates of postage have deterred many from receiving the work by mail.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet, in its reading matter, in the number, variety, and beauty of its illustrations, and in its general costume, now stands at the head of all monthly publications for the young. "It is unqualifiedly the best youth's magazine in America."—Brattleboro Democrat. "It is a model for all works of its class. We cannot too warmly commend it."—N. Y. Tribune. "It gives us pleasure to recommend it to our southern friends."—Balt. West. Continent. "Best magazine for youth we have ever seen."—Christ. Adv. & Jour. "It is a little world within itself."—N. Y. Independent. "Best publication of its class that I am acquainted with."—Rev. Dr. Adams.

Each number contains 32 pages, and some 8 or 10 beautiful engravings. The reading matter is just such as is best adapted to amuse, entertain, and instruct the young mind,

☞ Please send on your orders at once. Specimen numbers can be seen at the office of this paper, or they will be forwarded, gratis, on application, (post paid,) to the publisher. Subscribers may send money by mail, at the publisher's risk.

Terms, (invariably in advance,) $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5.

Clergymen, postmasters, editors, and school teachers, who will form clubs of four or more, and who will forward the money, shall be allowed an additional copy for their trouble; or they are authorized to retain 25 per cent. on all new subscriptions, where the full price ($1) is paid.

Bound volumes, (of which there are now 5,) $1 25 each; the whole set, $5 50.

☞ Postage Free!—Subscribers at a distance, who will remit the full price ($1 25 each) shall receive the volumes postage free. These volumes contain nearly 500 pages each.

AGENTS WANTED.

The publisher wishes to employ several gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, Publisher,
118 Nassau-st., New York.

Note.—The publishers or editors of those newspapers to whom this advertisement is sent, MARKED, are requested to give it (not including this note) some half a dozen conspicuous insertions; for which they shall be entitled to receive a copy of the Cabinet, monthly, for two years, on their sending to the address of "Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet" copies of the papers containing the advertisement; or, if preferred, they shall receive one volume of the Cabinet bound in muslin, and a copy of "Woodworth's Stories about Animals," illustrated with 40 engravings. Those who prefer the latter, must signify such preference and inform us how the books are to be sent. D. A. Woodworth.

A SABBATH DISCUSSION.

We are indebted to our friend Rev. Wm. H. Black, Pastor of the Sabbath-keeping Church in Mill-Yard, London, for eight consecutive numbers of "The Church," (a monthly, magazine published in London by the Baptists,) containing a series of articles on "THE SABBATH QUESTION." As an illustration of the varied and conflicting views which nominal Christians entertain upon the subject, we have seen nothing better. Presuming that our readers would like to read the discussion, we shall copy it entire.

The Sabbath Question.

We shall be glad to receive communications on the subject named in the following letter. Articles written with sufficient ability, and in a proper spirit, will be inserted without reference to the views advocated.

SIR,—Will you permit me, through the medium of your valuable magazine, to request an answer from some of your correspondents to the following questions in regard to the Sabbath? I have read with interest the letters on John iii. 5, and as that subject has been allowed by you to be discussed with candor, so I hope you will permit this question (which so seldom is allowed to come before the public on both sides) to be examined with equal liberality; especially in these times, when the public mind is engaged with disputes as to the expediency of making laws for the greater sanctification of the Lord's day, it might be well to raise such inquiries as these:—

Is the day for which they seek to enforce such sanctity, the true Sabbath which God has commanded? Is it the day which our Saviour and his apostles, and Christians for the first three or four centuries, observed? And does it behove Christians, and especially those who believe that man has no right to legislate on matters of religion, to seek to obtain such stringent laws for the sanctifying the first day of the week?

Trusting that you will give the subject an impartial examination,

I am, Sir, yours truly, T. W. B.

The Sabbath Question.

DEAR BRETHREN,—In writing on the subject proposed by your correspondent, T. W. B., I desire to start with seriousness and godly fear, feeling strongly the importance of the day, commonly, but as I think improperly, called the Christian Sabbath, in relation to the general good of the community, and especially to the interests of true godliness. The importance and advantage of it in both relations cannot easily be overlooked by sober-minded, intelligent, and good men, the true friends of men's souls and bodies, who care for their interests in both worlds. Let this, then, be clearly understood and borne in mind by my readers as a settled point.

The name Sabbath, meaning rest, as applied in Scripture to one day of the week, certainly means the seventh in order, reckoning from the Sunday, and is the Saturday. This was the case at first, when used in Genesis, and continued so till the book of God was finished. The proof of one part of this position is, that the Creator, having made the world in six days, rested on the seventh, and for that reason pronounced it happy, and sanctified it, and set it apart from the other six in memory of his resting upon it; and the proof of the other part is, all the passages, too many to quote, in which a specific day of the week is so called, both in the Old and the New Testaments, without a single exception. The same name is given to other days, but they are given days of months, not of the week, and may be distinguished from the Sabbath, properly and primarily so called, just as easily as the weekly Sabbath is known as different from the sabbatic year, so called, not merely because the rest year, but as being the seventh in the order of years, like the other is in the order of days.

That God intended the seventh day to be distinguished from the rest in grateful remembrance of the creation, there can be no reasonable doubt; and it is well, as often as it returns, to call to mind the work from which God, in condescending language, is said to have rested, and pay him a tribute of praise for the wonders of creation. This day, some two thousand years afterwards, he COMMANDED the Israelites to keep holy. Whether this was a repetition of a law given at the creation, but not expressed in the record, or a new law given to Israel, the people he had chosen for himself out of the nations, that he might govern as their king, as well as be served as their God, I cannot shew to my own satisfaction. It is enforced by the consideration that on it God rested from the work of creation (Ex. xx. 11;)but as a question bearing on the obligation of the Sabbath, I do not think it of the great importance some have attached to it. Certainly another reason is used to enforce it on Israel, which is peculiar to themselves—their deliverance from slavery in Egypt, and is put forth as the foundation of Sabbath-keeping equally as the other (Deut. v. 15.)

The law of the Sabbath was enjoined in a very solemn way at Sinai, and it is repeated with great care and frequency in the books of the law, perhaps more frequently than any other precept, except that against idolatry, and stands pre-eminent as a part of the national covenant. What did this law require of them? Rest from all sorts of work in all cases and of all persons (the priests and Levite's work excepted.) This is stated with great minuteness, and death was the doom of all who did any work on it, even to the gathering of a little wood for the fire (Num. xv. 32—36.) In addition to rest from labor, a double sacrifice was to be offered both morning and evening; but no demand was made for a congregation of the people to attend it, any more than on ordinary days, in this respect differing from the great feasts at which a holy convocation was commanded to be made. Beyond this rest nothing was enjoined on the people in general in relation to the day. And when Nehemiah reformed abuses, he followed up the standing law by forbidding carrying of burdens, and buying and selling on the Sabbath (Neh. xiii. 15—21.) The sanctification of the day mainly consisted in rest from all secular employment; the very strong language in Isaiah lviii. 13, 14, goes no farther. In any sense of the word, it was not a day of public religious worship. It was simply a day of rest; at least, beyond this point the law is silent. The synagogue service in the time of Christ, and subsequently, cannot be alledged in objection to this position, for that was of modern date. The use of synagogues has not been proved of higher origin than the time following the return from Babylon, and after the completion of their canon of Scripture, the last books of which make no mention of them, and therefore they have not the authority of divine revelation, but were probably the offspring of pious, but not inspired men.

Such was the Sabbath of the Jews. It appears to have been of the nature of positive institutions rather than of moral rules—of moral obligations during the pleasure of God that it should continue, but alterable or repealable at the same pleasure, and thus different from moral laws which cannot alter—an ordinance of a commemorative character given to a nation which was under a covenant peculiar to itself, to keep in mind two great facts, the creation of the world in six days, and the deliverance from the bondage of Egypt. It is no objection of any force against this statement, that the seventh day precepts is one of the ten commandments; for the decalogue, though a noble part of the law given by Moses, is but a part. It is often called the covenant; still it is but a part of it, and called so by the rule by which a part is put for the whole. And if spoken in the first instance, audibly by God himself, and written by the finger of God on tables of stone, the reason is plain. He did not so impress the people with awe, and to sanction the whole ministry of Moses. When he had spoken them, "he added no more," evidently because the people were terrified, and about to seek the mediation of Moses, instead of direct communication with their King; and he wrote them that they might be laid up in the ark, not as being of more authority or of a different character from the subsequent laws, but as a voucher for the authority of the whole. It is common to speak of the decalogue as the moral law, and as containing the whole rule of morals; but the accuracy of this is called in question. The Sabbath precept is a positive one, or all but its observers on the Saturday are guilty of its breach, and language must be put on the rack to make it set forth all morals, or forbid the opposite vices, though it affords general principles to guide us to a great extent. To this I will just add, that, as if to prevent this part being exalted above the other parts of the law, because of its containing so much of what is of eternal obligation, and being more directly given by God, the Apostle Paul, when declaring the abolition of the whole of the institution of Moses, names only a part of it, and that part the ten commandments, "the law written and graven on stones" (2 Cor. iii. throughout.) All the moral principles it or any other part of the law contained, are embodied in the New Testament; but in vain should we look for the seventh day precept in in that complete code of morals. The conclusion is irresistible, that it is "done away" with the ministration of which it was a part, and to which it was peculiar and ready to vanish away, with the national covenant and distinction, at the coming of the reign of the Son of God, and the introduction of more spiritual institutions, fitted for a spiritual people rather than national one.

Those who hold the precept to be still binding, commonly say that it is enough if we keep it in the spirit of it, one day in seven, one day of rest after six days of labor. But is this the way to treat the laws of God, in which not only the design is divine, but the words that express it are, as originally penned, "the words which the Holy Spirit taught?" And why not treat the other laws the same, and so set the letter of his laws aside altogether! But to support this plea, we are told that we know that in all countries, some of which are the antipodes of others, the same day exactly can not be kept, for it is night in one while day in the other. The reply is easy. It is the same numerically and ordinally in all places, though the sun which rules it rises in some a few hours later than in others; and that the same objection, if allowed, would operate equally against the first day of the week, or any given day, so that to name a day would, to some extent, be useless. This plea therefore for keeping the precept in the spirit of it only, is of no avail.

I hope that the chief question of you correspondent has now been met with a clear answer in the negative. The Sabbath, the only weekly Sabbath God ever appointed, is not the first day of the week, but the seventh. Then it follows that to call the first day the Sabbath is not scripturally correct, and that to use the argument belonging to the seventh day to enforce the keeping of the first has not the support of Scripture. But here one is met by a large number of good men, who say that from the beginning of Christianity the day has been changed from the seventh to the first by divine authority, at least this seems to be their meaning, and, otherwise, the observation would be useless. Here, I think, is the resting-place of the main part of these good men among Protestants who have thought on the subject, though they perhaps generally allow some relaxation of the old law. To this I reply by asking for Scripture proof. It is easy to search the whole of the New Testament, where alone it could be found, but it is not there. The Papist is fully aware of this, and candid to own it, and pleads, instead, the authority of the church, of course meaning his own church, and brings the fact as an argument against the Protestant doctrine of the sufficiency of Scripture, to force us back to tradition. And many sympathize with him, who refuse to go the whole length of his farago of traditional lore, limiting themselves to its use in this case and that of Pædo-baptism. I cannot see how those Protestants who hold the Sabbath to have been transferred by God from the seventh day to the first, can answer him. And I have seen no pleading for the transference among Protestants, but is the same in character with the plea for infant baptism from the Jewish circumcision; and those who plead one may with some consistency plead the other, though neither can be supported by the only proof the case can admit.

As to the Lord's-day—in strong probability the scriptural name for the first day of the week—the example of the apostles and the churches they planted, in conducting church affairs on this day (Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2;) together with the resurrection of Christ, and his repeated visits to the disciples in their assembly on it, and especially in the second week, their being no recorded appearance of Christ to them from the day he rose till that day week; and the giving of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost on that day, sufficiently point out the duty of all godly people to observe religiously this very day, without applying to it the severities of the Sabbath law. Let it stand on its own ground, and have its own character and appropriate employment, in accordance with the whole directory and benevolent design of the religion of Christ. Men of God will ever hail it with holy joy as the best day of the seven, and try to turn it to account, privately and publicly, and also for the public good. As to the day as a day of rest and social improvement, in relation to the community at large, let us be satisfied to support its necessity and importance just as we do that of food, clothing, health, and mental improvement, by expediency, and as a day for religious worship and instruction, by the same reasons by which we urge the claims of religion in general, especially by the consideration that in a busy state like ours, in which the greater number have to work hard, one day in seven for such purposes, is a wise and kind regulation, without which some would have little or no opportunity for such purposes.

So far as your correspondent asks about the example of Christ, the apostles, and the Christian churches for the first three or four centuries, a few words only may suffice. The practice of the inspired teachers, and those who lived in their time, alone is of importance in such a case; and in their day the case of the Jewish Sabbath stood in the same predicament as circumcision and other Mosaic institutions, which had by the gospel become indifferent. In the time of Christ, of course the first day of the week had not become the Lord's day; and after his death, both the Sabbath and circumcision appear to have been kept up side by side with the first day and Christian baptism among the Jewish converts, without opposition from the Apostles, except when these persons attempted to enforce them on the Gentile converts, or to make them matters of vital importance (Acts xv.; Gal. ii. 3—5; iv. 10, 11; vi. 12—15.) And as for the Sabbath services of the synagogue, the apostles attended there just as they attended other places of assembly, any time they had opportunity for the purposes of their mission, as long as they could do so with advantage, and without factious or violent opposition from the authorities of the multitude (Acts xiv. 1—6; xvii. 2; xvii. 4—7;) while they employed the first day of the week, or the Lord's day, for purposes of Christian fellowship, and the edification of the Christian body, as before observed.

With the regard to the third question, about the matter of legislation, all I am disposed to say is, that for ought I know it may be competent to the legislature to try to secure for all the subjects of the realm the peaceful enjoyment of the first day of the week as a day of rest, and thus prevent, as far as possible, annoyance and loss to those whose sense of duty leads them to cease from their daily avocations and secular concerns on it, and especially to afford to the public servants their full share of cessation from toil on that day—and what the senate may try to provide, the people may seek by petitions to obtain.

With best regards, I am, dear Sirs,

Yours truly, THOMAS OWEN.

THE SINAITIC INSCRIPTIONS.

It is well known, that in the neighborhood of Mount Sinai there have for many years been known to exist a variety of inscriptions in a character hitherto undecyphered, which presented an insoluble puzzle to scholars and travelers. They are found in the valleys and hills which run north-west from Mount Sinai, as far as the eastern shore of the Gulf of Suez. They are quite numerous, insomuch that the traveler taking almost any direction from the monastery of Mount Sinai will find more or less of them written upon the rocks. Similar inscriptions are likewise found in Mount Serbal, lying to the south of these routes. They are found in the greatest numbers and variety in the valley which stretches from the eastern shore of the Gulf of Suez, for six or seven miles towards the south. On the left of this road, on a chain of steep sand-stone, perpendicular as masonry, is a vast multitude of well-preserved inscriptions, the great number of which has given the road the name of "the Written Valley," (Wady Mokatteb.) Adjoining this is a hill called "the Written Mountain," also filled with the inscriptions. They are intermingled with images and figures, executed in a very rude style, and evidently of the same age.

A recent English traveler, Rev. Dr. Forster, has succeeded in decyphering them, by which they are proved to be probably the work of the Israelites, during their passage through and sojourn in the wilderness. This theory has been often suggested, but never before demonstrated. The process of discovery we have not time to indicate, but the results of some of the translations are highly interesting. On the rocks are recorded several of the principal events of the exode, precisely as they are narrated in the Pentateuch. The hurried flight of Pharaoh from the returning waters of the Red Sea; the healing of the bitter springs of Marah; the miraculous supply of winged fowl; the uplifting of Moses' hands at the battle of Rephidim, with the names of Aaron and Hur as their supporters; the miracle at the waters of Meribah; the plague of the fiery serpents, with many others, are clearly deciphered by Dr. Forster. In several instances these descriptions are accompanied by pictorial representations of men and animals.

The language in which these inscriptions are written, Dr. Forster pronounces to be in effect a very primitive dialect of Arabic, written in a character totally different from that now in use, yet containing words which, though obsolete, are still preserved in the old Arabic lexicons. This language Dr. F. considers the "one primeval language," when "the whole earth was of one language and of one speech." If this discovery shall ultimately bear the test of thorough examination, it will form a highly interesting addition to the admirable circle of proofs of Scripture verity, which the explorations in Egypt and Assyria and other places in modern times have furnished. LIBERTY—EQUALITY—BROTHERHOOD.

[Written for the recent Anniversary of Alfred Academy, by Miss Elizabeth C. Wright, of Ceres, Pa.]

When morning broke bright o'er the darkness that shrouded
The sleep-shackled world in a mantle of night;
When the wild winds had chased the dun vapors that clouded
The blue deep of ether, obscuring its light;
When no prison confined, and no walls were around thee,
Hast thou never then felt thou wast not yet free—
That the bondage of custom so closely had bound thee,
That other men's thoughts were a dungeon to thee?

Hast thou never grown sick in thy spirit with fearing
The laugh of some worm, crept up higher than thou,
Or some pitiful fool, who had borrowed his sneering,
To whose broadcloth and gold all the multitude bow?
Yet thou dared not turn back, and with pride answer pride,
And with scorn spurn the scorn that fell heavy on thee?
Thy locks have been shorn, and thy hands have been tied—
False customs have bound thee! thou canst not be free!

Burst forth from thy bondage, proud spirit, and utter
Those truths that shall set other souls in a glow;
Let the lightning bolt strike ere the deep thunders mutter—
Be free first thyself—then help all to be so!
Is not thy soul human, and life everlasting
A heritage free—by thy birth-right thine own?
Who heirs an estate thine in grandeur surpassing?
Or who has a less, that thou ever hast known?

The laborer crushed in the dust shall awaken
From the sleep where he lost his dread portion of toil—
And the King shall leave Earth when Death's sceptre shall beckon,
Then the slave shall be peer of the lord of the soil!
No more shall the lordling, in luxury silken,
Use the labor in which he has taken no part;
No more shall grieved Echo sob back from the welkin
The sigh of the starved—in mind, body, and heart.

For the grave owns but equals in dust it is 'tombing,
And souls find but equals beyond the dim shore
Whose dark shrouding shadows, forbidding, lie glooming,
Around Death's deep waters, we all must pass o'er.
Must the soul, then, forgetting its own mighty powers,
Supine in the dust, put its birthright away,
'Till the grim King of Terrors shall roll round the hours,
That close up life's wintry and wearisome day?

Or shall it stretch forth its free wings ere the dawning
Of life in the realms of the beautiful sky,
To meet the slow coming yet glorious morning
Whose steps are approaching—whose advent is nigh!
When hand clasped in hand shall acknowledge its brother,
When peasant and prince shall be titles unknown,
When none shall claim rights he denies to another,
And all bow to one Father—one Monarch—one Throne.

PERSONAL CHARACTER OF DR. JUDSON.

From the Commemorative Discourse of Rev. Wm. Hague.

The leading features of Dr. Judson's character, when we regard him as a public man, have an aspect of such stern and simple grandeur that they throw into the shade those delicate traits which disclosed themselves to the eyes of all who knew him in social and domestic life. Indeed, the higher qualities of which we have spoken are rarely found in intimate union with the gentler virtues, with that child-like tenderness, that genial sympathy, that nice regard for the sensibilities of others, which throws a charm around the scenes of home, and the circles of friendship. We are never surprised to learn that these are wanting in men of iron sinew, formed for daring and endurance. Just as when we gazed on some lofty mountain that towers sublimely to the skies, it seems not strange, if, on a close survey, the fine proportions and the beauty of outline shall have vanished, so that we can touch nothing but rugged rocks and tangled thickets. But to find the ascent of an Alpine hight enriched with sheltering vines, refreshing springs, and singing birds, must fill the breast of every beholder with a sentiment of pleasing wonder. A kindred emotion has, doubtless, been awakened in the hearts of many who have long contemplated Dr. Judson from a distant point of view, and have afterward been favored with opportunities of personal intercourse. Then it has been seen that the elements of his nature were admirably balanced, that his social affections were commensurate with his intellectual powers, and that his many-sided mind filled a wide sphere of being. Of him it could not be justly said, as it once was of an eminent moral philosopher, that he loved man in general, but no human being in particular; nay, his heart was a well-spring of tender affections, his eye took within its scope the whole wide range of human relationships, and he was sensitively alive to the happiness of all around him. In this respect he resembled his Divine Master, who, while on earth, although he was employed in a mission that involved the eternal destinies of a fallen race, could find congenial joys in the friendship of Martha, Mary, and Lazarus, and who, amidst the agonies of the cross, could commend the temporal welfare of his mother to "that disciple whom he loved."

In this connection it may be proper to observe that in regard to the social qualities of Dr. Judson, his susceptibility of the pleasures of friendships, his powers of conversation, his combination of mental energy with the most winning gentleness of expression, many of us received impressions, during his sojourn in this country, which could have been imparted by no study of his history, by no sketch, however vivid and graphical. Whensoever we see a man who is distinguished for singleness of aim, we are often struck with a certain eloquence of manners which cannot be described, and which, when found to be in keeping with the tenor of his life, discloses the heart more truthfully than the best efforts of the pencil or pen. The Evangelist Luke seems to allude to the impression of character made, by the personal appearance of our Lord, in a single phrase which Dr. Campbell has translated, "he was adorned with a divine gracefulness." The soul reveals itself not only in words, but in the tones of the voice, in the animated countenanae, in the kindling eye, in every feature, in every movement. Although it may not be safe to judge of men by the outward appearance merely, yet there are signs of character which are seldom mistaken, which no art can counterfeit, and which make impressions that we can neither resist nor erase. And no one, probably, has been permitted to enjoy Dr. Judson's society, and especially to kneel with him while conducting the worship of a family, who has not left his presence with some new conviction of the depth of his piety, of the breadth of his philanthropy, of his childlike humility as a Christian, and of his real greatness as a man.

From the Watchman and Reflector.

CAME HOME TO DIE!

He went to California to get gold, spent a year in the attempt; then came home to die! It was a sad case, and yet more fortunate than that of many. He reached his native village, and died in the arms of his wife, with his childred by his side. Many are denied that privilege. Many have died alone, amid the glittering dust they have coveted, or among strangers have fallen asleep in death, wearily watching their hoarded treasures, with few to heed them, and none to know their agony of soul. The ocean's restless wave, the raging storm, and the roaring billow, have chanted the death song of others as they passed from this life away; but his was another fate.

He left his quiet, happy home, to seek for gold. It was somewhat strange that he did so. Poverty did not press him; by careful industry he had acquired a competency, and still was doing well, had enough for all his wants. Nor was he intensely selfish, nor was avarice a ruling passion with him; though still 'tis true, "like most, he wished for more." No was he one of those restless, adventurous men, who are ready for every wild enterprise, where there is novelty to attract, or some stake to venture; he was a very quiet man, steady and uniform in his habits, and apparently contented in his station. Yet was he not one of those without friends, or home, almost without affection; to whom each place is equally dear, and every one equally a friend; who have little to gain, and nothing to lose. He had a home and friends—a home and friends that he dearly loved. He had a family; a fond and faithful wife, to share his toil, and enjoy his society; children for his care and his comfort. The friends that surrounded him were many and dear; the scenes in the midst of which he lived had cherished memories. Nor was he a reckless rover, seeking license from the restraints of virtue, in the wild foment of lawless society. He was a Christian disciple. He welcomed joyfully the Sabbath's sacred rest; he went with delight to the house of God, and took pleasure in the services of the sanctuary.

Why then did he go to California, seeking for gold? Why did he sacrifice so much with prospect of gaining so little in return? I do not know. It is, indeed, a mystery! Ask the thousands whose condition was so nearly like his that this picture will apply to all alike, why they went.

When the excitement from the Pacific shores swept, like one of its storms, over the land, and the mines of vast wealth allured the cupidity of the world, he resolved to go, and procure some gold. It was no wild enthusiasm, no absorbing, irresistible impulse; perhaps it was a combination of motives. But he made up his mind to venture the attempt, and if possible, get some gold. He did, indeed, count the cost; whether he counted it rightly, let others judge.

He left his home and friends, bade farewell to the sanctuary where he had worshiped, and the saints with whom he had taken sweet counsel; he kissed his wife and children, whose cheeks were wet with tears of sorrow, and whose hearts were filled with feareful apprehension. He turned away sadly from his threshold, and the home where life's brightest hours had been passed, and with attempted gaiety, said he would bring them back large heaps of gold; then hurried to the dock, while fond eyes dimly watched him, and fond heart yearned painfully after him.

California is reached, and gold is near, but home and comforts are far away. Now you may watch him in his search for wealth. Days are spent in anxious toil; his food is coarse and scant; at night, the cold earth is his resting-place, a blanket his chief covering. An attempted speculation fails of success, and he starts for the mines, and there digs for hid treasures. His anticipations begin to be realized, while he grasps the precious dust, and calls it his own. Nerved anew by the prospect of success, he gives every energy to the eager pursuit. Now he thinks of his distant home, and believes he shall be able to keep the promise so gaily given to his wife and children, and present to each a bag of gold as a holiday gift.

But alas for waking dreams! Fortune deals with him as with others of her votaries. Severe labor and constant exposure impair his health, and he is reluctantly compelled to abandon mining for a time. His expenses are great, his income nothing, for it costs something to be sick in such a land; and his riches go faster than they came. He sells out his right and with partially recovered strength seeks a new placer and begins again; and again success attends his endeavors. He gets gold!

But this is not long to continue, and again his strength fails; languor and disease invade his frame, and soon he is a sick man among strangers, with few of the necessities, and fewer still of the comforts that minister to the wants of the feeble and sorrowful; make a sick bed sufferable, and beguile the heavy hours of disease and pain.

A twelvemonth had passed since he set his feet on this land of promise. He was again able to walk about, and had gold enough left to pay his passage home—perhaps a little more: He felt that his strength was gone, and life itself could hold out but little longer, at least in that enervating climate Could he reach home, kind care, the faithful ministry of love, might recruit his wasted system. But should he die! Oh, then came the strong yearnings for the home he loved. Could he die among strangers? Oh, no! Let his own wife and children watch by his dying bed, minister to his last wants, and close his eyes when life had fled. Let friendly hands lay him to rest, where his fathers slept; and the voice of prayer from familiar lips, be breathed over his coffin and his grave!

Of living godliness he had seen but little, felt but little there. Indeed, he did not come to seek communion with God, or find access to a mercy-seat. That he could have had at home. He came for gold; and who does not know that gold seals up the sacred fountains of the soul.

Again you might have seen him stand upon the vessel's deck, as she dashed bravely out into the Pacific tide, and turned her prow toward the home of his heart. Hope dispelled the sadness of his soul, and restored to his eye the light of life as he scanned the distant horizon. Again the Southern breeze fanned his pale and wasted cheek, and the sluggish pulses of his heart quickened, as he neared his native shore. With each rising sun he was more cheerful and joyous; with each morning he declared himself better and stronger. And yet, as each evening came, he sought his couch more weak, and worn, and wasted than before.

It was a bright December morning when the ship came in sight of the port of her destination. For a week he had not left the cabin; but as the joyful cry reached his ear, which announced the near approach to home, the current of his ebbing life quickened with a tumultuous flow; and he staggered up to the deck, impatient to behold again what he had so long waited to see.

But the effort was too great. For a moment his soul drank in the beauties of that scene and its associations; then he fainted, and was carried down to his berth. What a contrast to that morning, as fair and bright, when, two years before, he had sailed from that same port, outward bound, for the land of gold!

The ship reached the dock; and then came the bustle and confusion of such an occasion. The tramping of busy feet; the discord of many voices; the greetings, or anxious inquiries of friends; the crowding and questioning of the idle and inquisitive. He remained below nearly unconscious, but no inquiring friends sought him out, for no one dreamed of his return.

At length reviving, he crawled from his resting-place to the cabin stairs, where attracting the attention of those who had partially forgotten him in the excitement of landing, he succeeded in giving directions where to be taken.

How would it have saddened your heart to see him then, as they lifted him into the coach, in hope and life, the shattered wreck of what he was? So did he recross the threshold he had left so gaily.

Words cannot tell the meeting! The wild surprise, the mingled joy and anguish of that hour! He was too weak to return the fond embrace of wife and children, or wipe the the raining tears from his palid cheek.

"O, Henry, have you come home so?"

"Yes, Ellen, come home to die!"

It was too true. But his fond prayer was answered; he died with his wife and children at his side. The next day they closed his eyes forever; wife and children followed him sadly to the grave, where he sleeps with the dust of those he loved. But the little that remained of the gold that had lured him from his home had fled. His person had been rifled, he knew not how, or where or when; but it was gone—all gone. He had indeed come home to die! ECTOH.

FLAX COTTON.—Rev. Mr. Gordon, Editor of the Free Presbyterian, having recently passed through Northern Ohio, writes to his paper as follows:—

I called on Hon. John F. Beaver, who is engaged in the erection of a large establishment for the preparation of Flax Cotton. Mr. B. is sanguine of the ultimate success of the scheme for the substitution of a portion of flax in place of cotton. He showed me a specimen of the cotton after the third process. It resembles in color and texture the common lint, made by tearing up a piece of old linen cloth. Five processes are necessary to prepare the flax cotton for the spindles. I learned from Mr. Beaver that twice as much flax had been raised in the neighborhood of Newton Falls this year as there was last year. In passing from there to Ravenna, beautiful fields of flax, in full bloom, were common along the road.

SWIMMING.—Elizur Wright gives the rationale of swimming as follows: No branch of education has been so much neglected as this. Man is the only animal which does not swim naturally. He sinks in deep water from the size of his brain when not properly exercised. That is to say, the weight of his brain above his nose sinks that organ a little beneath the surface, when he is in an erect position, before his body displaces its weight in water, and thus finds an equilibrium. With the nose under, one must breathe water and drown. But when the brain comes to be exercised enough to throw the head back and the nose up, pointing to the very zenith, and keep the hands and feet carefully under water, then by the eternal laws of hydrostatics, the nose will continue above water, and the person will float like an empty bottle which is so balanced as to keep its mouth uppermost. No human being can sink in still water, of any depth, lying on his back, with hands and feet under water.

AUTOGRAPHS.—We are anxious, (says an exchange,) to collect and preserve the autographs of all our subscribers, and therefore request all, whether in city or country, to enclose the amount due for the second year [$2] in a letter, with their several signatures, before the first of July. Our thanks are due to those who have already anticipated us by advance payment.

RELATION OF RELIGION TO POLITICS.

It is often said, that "politics have nothing to do with religion." We do not know that they have; but we are very certain, that religion ought to have something to do with politics. Every man who exercises himself in the affairs of government, whether in discharging the duties of an office with which he is intrusted, or in voting to put others into office, ought to be actuated by the principles of religion, as taught in the Bible, to such an extent as always to act righteously. 'Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you,' is a maxim as applicable to politicians as to any other class of persons. It is a maxim, which ought to be engraved as a motto upon the desk of every legislator in the land, just where his eye would rest upon it when called to give his vote upon any measure affecting the rights and interests of his fellow creatures. Had it been engraved upon Daniel Webster's desk at the time the late Fugitive Slave Law was passed, it might have restrained him from the wickedness of casting his influence on the side of oppression. It certainly would, had it been engraved upon his heart. But alas! he forgot, as too many do, that while he was a statesman, he was at the same time a man, bound by a "higher law" to "do justly and love mercy." Politicians too often forget that God's law of accountability embraces the whole of their existence, as well the time spent in legislative halls, as that spent in other places.

Some people quite scout the idea, that a nation or state may be guilty of sin, and bring down upon it the judgments of God. Nevertheless, it is an idea that receives too much countenance from the Book of Inspiration to be set aside lightly. A government, as such, may be irresponsible, it is true. Being a mere piece of political machinery, moral character can no more be predicated of it than of a clock, or a printing-press. In the persons of its rulers, nevertheless, it may become guilty before God, and be held to account accordingly. That is, every ruler, ever legislator, every one concerned in administering the affairs of government, will be held personally responsible for the part which he acts in directing the movements of this machinery. Even a clock, though in itself possessing no moral character whatever, may be made the means of doing immense wickedness. If one comes into our office, and says that he has a matter to attend to involving important interests, the issue of which depends upon his attending to it at precisely such an hour, and, while his attention is otherwise called, we slyly put back the hands of the clock half an hour, it may be said, figuratively, that the clock ruined him. But the guilt was not in the clock, but in the person who used it as the means of deceiving. So is it with government. It is an engine, by which those who manage it may act for good or evil upon mankind. It is an engine of tremendous power. He, therefore, who avails himself of it to oppress his fellow creatures, or to invade their rights, accomplishes infinitely more than if he undertook the same thing single-handed and alone. His guilt, therefore, is vastly greater, and national sins, so called, do in this way become the giant sins of the land. They are the most God-provoking sins that are committed. What a fearful responsibility is incurred by the absolute monarch, who, knowing that the operations of the entire machinery of government depend upon his own pleasure, uses his power, not to benefit and bless his subjects, but to oppress them! He speaks, and the mighty engine under his control is made the instrument of impoverishing and afflicting thousands. Did monarchs but cherish a just sense of their awful responsibility, there is not one of them who would not gladly divide his power with the people.

In a republic, where the sovereignty resides in the people, there is not a man of mature age who does not lie under responsibility. If government become an engine of oppression, every man is personally guilty who lends his influence, either directly or indirectly, to make it so. The Senator or Representative in Congress, who brings forward and advocates a law which shall, in its operation, wrest from a portion of the people their 'natural and inalienable rights,' and then casts his vote for the same, is personally guilty before God, and will, at the day of judgment, have to answer for it. The voter at the polls, who casts his vote for the man who, he knows, will use all the power with which office may clothe him to crush in hopeless bondage three millions of human beings, incurs a fearful responsibility, which he must meet at the day of reckoning. In short, all our political acts involve direct personal accountability to Him who will judge every man according to his deeds. And so far from a man's guilt being the less because he acts as a politician or statesman, and through the medium of government, it is on that very account the greater, if he does not act righteously. For, besides his own individual power, he avails himself of that tremendous power which government by the strength and perfection of its machinery can exercise.

That God visited his wrath upon the nations of antiquity for their sins, is a fact most plainly declared in Scripture. It was because they had provoked him by their wickedness, that he destroyed the Canaanites, and gave their possessions to the children of Israel. It was because of their wickedness that Babylon, and Egypt, and Tyre, and other kingdoms, were prostrated in ruin. But because personality and accountability cannot be predicated of kingdoms, except in a figurative sense, it is sometimes said that God judges kingdoms and nations, as such, only in this life. And it is to be feared that rulers and statesmen too often deceive themselves into the notion, that such judgment as God inflicts upon the nation, as such, is all that he will ever visit upon them. But let them not cherish this delusion. Strictly speaking, God never punishes a nation, as such, either in this world or the next. They are the rulers, always, upon whom punishment falls in their own proper persons. It is nevertheless a fact, that in order to impress upon the minds of the guilty more deeply the aggravation of their offense, and to take away their power of offending in like manner any more, God sometimes requires that the very instruments which they have employed be given up to destruction. So government, being the instrument or machinery by which wicked rulers accomplish their wickedness, God in his wrath may bring about its destruction. But the rulers themselves he will hold personally responsible "in the day when he shall judge the secrets of men by Christ Jesus."

Reader, you are one of those in whom the sovereignty of this great Republic is vested. If not a Congressman, or a Governor, or a Justice, or a Commissioner, you are perhaps a voter. Is there no responsibility resting upon you in regard to the course which our Government shall pursue, and the destiny which awaits it? Will you allow the dust of party politics to blind your eyes to the great principles of righteousness? Is it not your duty, as a Christian, and as an accountable creature, to aim at making government, and the administrations of government, what they ought to be?—the media of blessings and happiness to those who repose under their shadow?

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Jewish Disabilities Bill—Episcopal Bishops—Houses of Convocation—Regium Donum.

Glasgow, July 18th, 1851.

The telegraph announces that the Bill for modifying the Abjuration Oath, omitting the words "on the faith of a Christian" in the case of Jews chosen as members of Parliament, was last night again rejected in the House of Lords by a majority of 144 against 108. It is stated, that Mr. Salomon, the lately elected Jewish M. P. for Greenwich, intended, in the event of the Bill being rejected, to present himself to the House of Commons; but we do not see that he could be received in the circumstances.

In times when Puseyites, and other high-churchmen, as they are called who would repudiate that name, contend that those only are churches which have their Episcopal Government and Apostolical Succession, it is something to have to record that the Bishop of Durham lately subscribed £15 towards the erection of an enlarged place of worship by the Independents at Newcastle. His knowledge of the spiritual destitution of the town, is the apology—for an apology was required for so un-bishop-like a respect for the souls of perishing sinners. The enormous revenues of some of the English Bishops, and the unfair means used to obtain them, have been discussed in the House of Commons. The Marquis of Blandford's moving an Address to Her Majesty, on the spiritual destitution of England, and the means by which it should be supplied, was the occasion for adverting to the manner in which church property is managed. The Marquis proposes that there should be new Bishops appointed, (who should not have a place in the House of Lords,) and that 600 new churches be erected at an expense of £2,100,000, one half to be raised by the sale of a half of the advowsons in the gift of the Lord Chancellor; the other half he expected could then be raised by private individuals. The motion for an Address was agreed to—Sir G. Grey, on the part of Government, acceding, on condition that the sale of the livings should not be required—but the discussion led to remarks very unfavorable to some of the Bishops.

In the House of Lords, on the 11th instant, Lord Redesdale urged the revival of the ancient Houses of Convocation for the government of the Church of England. He adverted to the danger likely to arise in such a case from the difference of opinion in the Church itself, but strangely spoke of her strength as, he said, her "only resort to which she went for ultimate decision was the Word of God." It were well, indeed, if this were true; but his Lordship afterwards reduced very much the measure of this strength, and came nearer to the truth, when, alluding to those who seek personally to draw their own conclusions from the Bible, without reference to Bishops or Councils, he said, "That was not what the Church of England allowed." For while she did not, like the Church of Rome, admit the principle of development, she took her stand "on the Bible as interpreted from the earliest times in all sound churches." Keeping in view that his Lordship's "sound churches" are those in which Paul prophetically discerned as to come the great "falling away," his latter statement is not so far from the truth as his first. The Archbishop of Canterbury, judging from the experience of former Convocations, differed from Lord Redesdale as to the result. Supposing, he said, the great technical difficulties lying in the way were removed, great disappointment, accompanied by great excitement, would result. If, for the purpose of settling disputes, "the Prayer Book were touched, even with the lightest hand, a flame would be lighted up from one end of the country to the other." The history of Convocation during the reign of Queen Anne is a history of altercation between the Upper House and the Lower. They were prorogued in consequence; and since 1777 no Governments had deemed it wise to issue a license. The Archbishop of Dublin said he had never advised the restoration of Convocation, because he knew it would not be tolerated. He wished that there were some method by which dissatisfied members could make their views known; but "he would not have the church governed by the clergy exclusively." The Duke of Argyll said he believed that Convocation, which was composed entirely of clergy, was first called together not to regulate ecclesiastical affairs, but to give the assent of the clergy to taxes. He did not think it was possible to have Convocation now without the laity; while the differences as to doctrine would render the proceedings of a governing body in the church all but impossible. Even the Bishop of Oxford said he was "desirous to see the Church of England duly represented in the Synod by the Bishops, clergy, and laity, in their due places. We do not, however, believe it to be at all probable that the proposal, (which comes from the Puseyite party,) to revive a system of self-government in the Episcopal Church, will receive favor from Parliament, even if the laity were included.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is reported by telegraph to have stated, that the grant called Regium Donum would not be continued after this year. This is a grant of money given to the Presbyterians in Ireland, and some poor congregations in England unconnected with the Established Church. Should this be true, we may look for its being followed, at no distant date, by a withdrawal of means from the Episcopacy also.

ADVERTISING FOR MINISTERS.

The "children of this generation" understand very well, that newspaper advertising is the highway to notoriety, if not to fortune. And it would seem, from the following advertisement which we find in one of our Baptist exchanges, that "the children of light," (those, at least, who ought to be such,) are learning the lesson.

A Pastor Wanted.—A minister of the Baptist denomination, of sterling piety, possessing fair talents, and good preaching gifts, wishing an extensive field of labor and usefulness, in an important and pleasant location, and will obey the high mandate of Heaven, "Go preach my gospel," instead of reading his sermons, would ensure the approbation of God, and a fair remuneration for his labors of love, from the Baptist church of Warsaw, Wyoming county, N. Y. None others need apply.

R. B. Crispen, Clerk.

Warsaw, June 21, 1851.

A man of "sterling piety" and "good preaching gifts"—"none other need apply!" We should like to see the man who, on the strength of this notice, applies to the Baptist church in Warsaw for a situation. Perhaps there would be no great impropriety in a preacher's recommending himself as one who posesses "good preaching gifts;" for those who really have such gifts generally know it as soon as any body; and indeed we have heard of persons who knew, or thought they knew, that they had preaching gifts, when such an idea had never occurred to their most intimate acquaintances. But for a man to praise his own "piety"—to claim that it is such as may properly be denominated "sterling"—is carrying the matter a little farther, and implies peculiarities of make-up which, it is to be hoped, are not often found in the ministry, but which, if they do really exist, it would be a curiosity to see. Somewhere we have read of a talkative upstart who reproved an aged minister for his comparative reserve, and asked him if he thought he possessed any religion; to which the venerable man replied, with an accent that gave force to his words, "None to speak of." Such a man would not answer for the Warsaw church; but if they could find the upstart, probably a bargain might be struck. "Like to like."

THE SABBATH-SCHOOL A SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST INSTITUTION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I have read with much interest the Report adopted by the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, on the subject of Sabbath-Schools and Bible-Classes, and am pleased with many of its suggestions. While it ascribes, very properly, the origin of the first Sabbath-School to the early efforts of Ludwig Hœcker, there is a want of definite credit due to him as a Sabbath-keeper, and to the denomination, for introducing and sustaining it. The Sabbath-School at Ephrata was not only "patronized by the Seventh-day Baptists at that place," but was essentially a Seventh-day Baptist Institution—established and sustained for upwards of thirty years, by them, before any other similar institution was introduced. Ludwig Hœcker was himself a Seventh-day Baptist, not merely the common-school teacher, but a member, and an active member of the Society. In my "Historical Sketch of Ephrata," I distinctly say, "that Ludwig Hœcker, or Bro. Obed, as he was designated, who was the teacher of the common school, projected the plan of holding a school on the afternoon of the Sabbath, and who, in connection with some of the other brethren, commenced it," &c., &c. From the Report, it might be inferred, that Ludwig Hœcker may have been there casually, and that the Society of Ephrata merely "patronized it," while the credit of the origin of the institution is due to the denomination. Ludwig Hœcker was not only a prominent and consistent Sabbath-keeper, but his wife and daughter, Petronella, a lovely and beautiful girl, not only comely in form, but lovely and beautiful in her Christian character, (which may hereafter form the subject of a sketch for your paper,) were all ardent, active Sabbath-keepers, and were alike ardent and active in the Sabbath-School, as they were in every Christian virtue. More anon.

A RHODE-ISLAND PICKNICK.

On the 23d of July, (as we learn from the Literary Echo,) the good people of Potter's Hill, R. I., treated themselves and their friends to a delightful picknick in the beautiful grove adjoining the village. The idea was a good one, and if it were more frequently carried out in the neighborhood of every manufacturing town in New England, the result would be an improvement in the countenances, if not in the morals, of the inhabitants. On this occasion the exercises seem to have been well adapted to promote a renovation of both body and mind. Of course there was a banquet; otherwise there would have been no picknick—no picking of knickknacks. But the intellectual part of the entertainment appears also to have occupied a prominent place. Eld. A. B. Burdick introduced it by brief and appropriate remarks; after which Eld. Lucius Crandall addressed the company. The singing is said to have been remarkably good. Among the pieces sung was an original one, prepared for the occasion by Lucius Crandall, which we copy from the Echo:—

We're met where the blue sky of summer spreads o'er us,
And the sun in full glory lights the glad scene,
Where we list to the choir of the wood in full chorus,
And press with our feet earth's soft vesture of green.

We have come where sweet odors are borne on the breezes,
Where the spirit of Nature inspires to be free,
Where each object around us the inner heart pleases,
Thus wooing to goodness, while prompting to glee.

This brings to the mind what we've read of a garden,
Where a bless'd pair in holiness, happiness dwelt,
And fed on the fruit of the trees of their Eden,
Where together they walked, talked, worshiped, and knelt.

But farther that record this sad thing narrated,
That they highly offended the Lord of that place,
By listening to one who their happiness hated,
And their King drove them out from beholding his face.

Then with sword and with cherubim guarding their egress,
He doomed them mid thorns and in sorrow to pine,
Because they had ventured thus even to transgress
His laws, though most holy, his rights most divine.

While then we are here where these charms are combining,
And calling away from earth's passions and strife,
May we learn of the birds, as their wild notes are chiming,
And seek the dear shade of the blessed tree of life;

Where, feeding on fruit which is there ever growing,
We shall live ever more in that Eden above,
And walk through the vale where life's river is flowing,
Where are bright ones, sweet pleasures, and He who is love.

THE VIRGINIA ASSOCIATION.

On the 12th of January, 1851, delegates from the Seventh-day Baptist Churches in Virginia convened at New Salem and organized an Association to be known by the name of the Virginia Seventh-day Baptist Association, which is to hold its first Annual Meeting with the Church at New Salem, commencing on the fifth day of the week before the first Sabbath in September, 1851, at 10 o'clock A. M. Eld. Azor Estee is to preach the introductory discourse; Bro. Ezekiel Bee alternate. A full delegation is desirable, and friends from the sister Associations are invited to meet with us.

Perhaps it would be proper to say, that the minutes of the meeting in January to organize the Virginia Association, were sent for publication in the Recorder, but did not reach the office.

Education in Rhode Island.—From the annual report for 1850 of the Hon. E. R. Potter, Commissioner of Public Schools in Rhode Island, it appears that every town in that State voted last year the necessary amount of tax entitling them to receive their proportion of the School appropriation from the State Treasury. The population of the State under fifteen years is 47,857, of which number 13,898 are under four. Under fifteen and over four the number of inhabitants is 33,959. Of these 28,331 have attended school within the year. Of those who cannot read and write there are 3744, the largest portion of whom are supposed to be foreigners.

Union Theological Seminary.—The Court of Appeals, during its recent session at Elmira, decided a case in favor of the Union Theological Seminary in the city of New York, by which the institution recovers the entire amount (not small) of the legacy left by the will of the late James Roosevelt. The next term of the Seminary begins on Fourth-day, Sept. 17. Students are received from all evangelical denominations. Suitable testimonials of religious character are required, and the candidate must also bring the parchment evidences of having pursued a regular course of collegiate study, or submit to an examination upon all the studies usually embraced in such a course. The Faculty is now complete, consisting of Rev. Edward Robinson, D. D., LL. D., Prof. of Sacred Literature; Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, D. D., Prof. of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology; Rev. Henry B. Smith, Prof. Church History; Rev. Jas. P. Wilson, D.D., Prof. of Systematic Theology.

Anti-Slavery Political Conventions.—A National Liberty Party Convention is to be held at Buffalo, N. Y., on the 17th and 18th days of September next, for the purpose of nominating candidates for President and Vice President of the United States. During the following week another National Convention, called by Anti-Slavery men, is to be held at Cleveland, Ohio. Gerrit Smith, who is a leading man in connection with the Buffalo Convention, has written to Samuel Lewis, a leader of the Cleveland movement, urging him and his friends to attend at Buffalo and learn what the Liberty Party is—what it is not "hopelessly intolerant and obstinate." Mr. Smith has also published a lengthy Address to the Voters of the United States, setting forth the doctrines of the Liberty Party, and its claims to coöperation.

Jenny Lind and the Sunday.—When Jenny Lind was coming North from New Orleans, she refused, it is said, to start on Sabbath afternoon, lest she should be kept out over Sunday. This circumstance was chronicled by all the newspapers, and furnished a text for numerous homilies on Sunday-keeping in general, and Jenny Lind's piety in particular. Now it is announced, that Miss Lind left Albany on Sabbath evening last, about 9 o'clock, and came by steamboat 160 miles to New York, arriving at 6 o'clock on Sunday morning; after which she went down to the dock of the steamer Atlantic, to welcome Capt. West. Putting this by the side of that, there is room to question whether the Nightingale keeps Sunday more strictly than common people.

Petition for Cheap Postage.—A petition has been laid on our table, asking "our National Legislature to establish the rates of Postage on letters (all to be prepaid) at one cent per half ounce for any distance by sea or land, and the conveyance of newspapers and periodicals free of charge." This may seem at first glance a very radical change to ask for; but the reduction is less by far than has already been made, and that too with profit. Who knows but this change also would prove profitable? And what if it should not? Government may better spend some of its money for a few years on this object than in prosecuting Mexican and Indian wars.

The Christian Review.—Several numbers of the Christian Review have lately fallen under our notice, and have impressed us favorably. Though published under the auspices of the Baptist denomination, the work contains articles from distinguished representatives of other denominations, and breathes throughout a catholic spirit. For the variety of its topics, and the vigor and urbanity with which they are discussed, few if any quarterlies excel the Christian Review. We very cheerfully commend it to patronage.

A Paternal Government.—The Roman Government has condemned one Pietro Ercoli to the galleys for twenty years, for "having tried to dissuade a fellow citizen from lighting a cigar he was about to smoke." The Freeman's Journal, the Catholic paper published in this city, admits the fact, and gravely sets to work to show that such a punishment for such an offense was "the act of a mild and paternal Government." The Commercial Advertiser winds up its announcement of the facts, and their attempted justification, with the significant and appropriate exclamation, "Oh!"

Missionaries Returned.—The ship Minstrel, from Singapore, arrived at Boston July 29, bringing home Mr. J. H. Chandler and wife, of the American Baptist Mission at Siam. It is said that Mr. Chandler returns to assist in obtaining on behalf of the Siam Mission funds to replace its losses in the late destructive fire.

Lutheran Missions.—Two missionaries of the Lutheran Missionary Society, Rev. Messrs. Cutter and Snyder, with their wives, are about to sail for Madras, where a station of this Church exists. The Society has also recently adopted one of the missionaries of the German Luthern Society in India, and now supports him.

The Press Denounced.—The Archbishop of Rhodes, Malta, has uttered his Episcopal denunciations against three newspapers in his diocese, which are anti-Catholic in their tone, and he says that unless they mend their manners he shall pursue them with this spiritual weapons.

Religious Liberty in Italy.—The Recorder has already chronicled the facts connected with the imprisonment at Florence of Count Guiccardina and five others for reading and commenting upon a chapter of the Gospel by St. John. The following remark upon the case is copied from the London Economist:—

"In Tuscany—the state in Italy which, till lately, we considered the most liberal and advanced—whose government used always to be quoted for its mildness and beneficence—in Florence, the city of Dante, of Machiavelli, of Galileo, of Michael Angelo, of Alfieri—the city which the wise liberality of Cosmo and Lorenzo surrounded with a halo of intellectual glory which can naver fade—the descendant of the great Italian historian has been imprisoned and exiled for having ventured to read a chapter of the Gospel in a private house to five friends. Three things strange in this transaction may astonish us—that the Pope should have dared so far; that the Grand Duke should have sunk so low; and that neither should have been ashamed to publish his dishonor."

New Translation of the Scriptures.—Prof. Conant, formerly of Madison University, one of the ripest scholars of the age, is engaged in preparing a new translation of the Scriptures, which is to be published by Lewis Colby of New York. The character and design of the work are thus set forth by the author:—

"It has long been a favorite object with me to furnish a translation of the holy Scriptures for unlearned readers, which should accurately express the meaning by the original aids of modern scholarship, in the style and manner of the early English versions. This translation is intended, therefore, for the benefit of the common reader of the Scriptures, to aid him in more clearly understanding them, wherever our present version is for any reason obscure. In other words, it is intended to do directly by a translation what has long been attempted by the awkward and circuitous method of a commentary, viz: to make the Scriptures plain to the unlearned reader."

The Sunday in Germany.—In a notice of the Autobiography of Bretschneider, the eminent German Theologian, one of the editors of the N. Y. Tribune gives the following account of his Sunday habits:—

Though an effective preacher and most industrious student, he also took care to give exercise to the body, and for this purpose was exceedingly fond of bowling. At Gotha he was employed to preach in the forenoons, and as the bowling-alley was near the church, would go from divine service and spend the rest of the Sunday at his favorite amusement. This was noisy, and distracted the congregation, who in the afternoon were edified by another clergyman. They presented Bretschneider with a petition, not to leave off bowling on Sunday altogether, but to postpone it till after the services in the afternoon. The story, which is recalled to us by seeing the announcement of his autobiography, affords a curious illustration of the difference in the German view of Sunday from that of the more puritanic Christians of America."

Arrival of the Atlantic.—The U. S. Mail Steamer Atlantic arrived at New York from Liverpool on Sunday last, bringing 140 passengers and a very valuable cargo of goods. So deep and general was the interest in the event, that large numbers of people, (forgetful, perhaps, that it was Sunday,) assembled at her dock to welcome her with huzzas and the firing of cannon. Capt. West, who has remained with her while undergoing repairs, was heartily greeted by his numerous friends, and among them by Jenny Lind, who (forgetful also, perhaps, that it was Sunday,) had arrived from Albany the same morning. The Atlantic, after stopping three days at New York, was to sail for Liverpool again on Fourth-day, August 6.

The Right Spirit.—The Richmond Religious Hearld publishes several resolutions of a church in Virginia, passed on dissolving a pastoral relation of more than thirty years continuance. One of these resolutions reads:

Resolved, That we by no means feel ourselves absolved from the obligation to minister to his temporal wants by the cessation of those relations which have heretofore existed between us, but we feel ourselves bound by the fact that he has literally worn himself out in the service of the denomination, still to communicate to his necessities.

Sunday in New Orleans.—The New Orleans Crescent is strenuously urging a better observance of Sunday in that city; in respect to which day it says, that very few of the citizens of New Orleans go regularly to church, a few more go occasionally, but a vast majority never go at all.

Sailing of Missionaries.—We learn that on Sixth-day of last week, the bark Oriental sailed from Boston for Shanghai, China. Among the passengers were Mr. Alfred Hill, of Boston, Rev. Robert Nelson, wife, child and servant, and Rev. Cleveland Keith, of Virginia.

A Costly Smoke.—The other day, says the Boston Traveler, a young gentleman of this city was enjoying a fine cigar, near the corner of Court street and the square, in defiance of the by law in such case made and provided. A person near by, whom he took to be a police officer, tapped him on the shoulder, and informed him that he was breaking the law. The young man plead ignorance without avail, the pseudo-officer declaring that unless a $5 bill was forthcoming, he should find it necessary to commit the offender to jail. Very reluctantly, and after a good deal of talking, he took out a $10 bill, received $5 back, and was allowed to depart. It was not long, however, before he ascertained that his quandam captor was not only no officer but, that the $5 bill he received from him in exchange was a counterfeit, thus leaving him out of pocket just $10 by the operation.

European News.

Two Atlantic Steamships, the Washington and Niagara, have arrived since our last, bringing one week later intelligence.

The subject most discussed in the English papers is the disposition to be made of the Crystal Palace, Lord Campbell heading the assaulting party who insist on its demolition, while the Times brings its heavy artillery to the aid of Mr. Paxton and the Winter Garden plan. The latter seems likely to prevail. The Exhibition is more popular and profitable than ever.

News from all parts of the Kingdom represent the crops as in a flourishing condition, especially the potato crop, which will be unusually large.

The Orange clubs of Liverpool celebrated Monday, July 14, (the anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne,) by a procession. Between two and three thousand persons took part in the ceremonies. The procession was attacked by the Irish inhabitants of Liverpool, and a fight ensued, which resulted in three persons being killed and a large number dangerously wounded.

In France the great topic of interest is the debate on the Revision of the Constitution, which was in its third day when the mail closed.

A letter dated Rome, July 10, says that Grafini, Chancellor of the Criminal Tribunal of Imola, has been assassinated in the streets at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The Monsignor de Moltza, keeper of the Vatican Library, has committed suicide, by cutting his throat with a razor.

A letter from Naples of the 2d, in the Constitutionale of Florence, states that forty-six persons have now been arrested on account of the part they took in the affair of the 15th of May, 1848. Among these persons are: Archdeacon Cagnozzi, aged 97; the ex-minister Pietro Leopardi, who was at Turin on that day; Vicenzo Tavizza, aged 86; and Guiseppe Solidati, aged 83.

The Austrian Government is proceeding very mildly against the Hungarians, says the London Globe. The sentence against Col. Csuha, who commanded the fortress of Peterwardein as insurgent general, has been published, and merely condemns him to dismissal from the service, without further punishment.

Athens journals state that the village of Velitza, in Atalanta, had been pillaged by a powerful band of brigands, under the command of a notorious leader named Calamara. Houses were burned, peasantry murdered, and women massacred after horrible usage. Among the women killed was the sister of a merchant established at Athens, of the name of Malandrinos, and the capital was in a state of consternation.

We receive distressing accounts from Bosnia. It being supposed that Ali Kedics, who has been outlawed, is concealed among the Christian population, a certain Mujaza Adzic has been sent out with 30 guards in search of him. The unfortunate rajahs who are suspected by the Turkish officer are hanged by their feet to the branches of trees and cruelly flogged with whips. The poor rajahs are determined to seek refuge from their merciless persecuters on this side of the frontier, and by a dispatch of the 10th, from Agram, we learn that a family consisting of eight persons has already done so.

Letters from Odessa of the 25th of June, in the Allgemeine Zeitung, announce the destruction of a detatchment of Russian troops by the Turkomen of Steppe. These troops occupied an island of the harbor of Astrabad. They were attacked and completely annihilated by the Turkomans, who also burnt five Russian vessels. This sudden attack is thought to be the result of a league between Shamil Bey and the Turkomans of Chiwa and Bockhara.

The overland mail brings advices and journals from Singapore to June 1st. The cholera, which had broken out some weeks previously, is estimated to have swept away nearly one thousand persons, Malays, Chinese, and natives of India. At the date above mentioned the disease had subsided, but on the Malayan peninsula most fearful ravages were being made, especially among the inhabitants of Calantan, Tringanu, and Pahang. The cholera had likewise broken out at Siam and Cochin-China, where its ravages were unmitigated by medicine, reliance being placed in charms to stay its progress.

From China the news is unimportant. The insurgents in the Kwangsi provinces were still in force, and preparations were actively carried on at Canton against them. As many as 5,000 men (says the Friend of China) have been seen to pass up the river in boats all accoutered for immediate action.

Four Days Later.

At 6 o'clock on Sunday morning last the Steamer Atlantic arrived at New York from Liverpool, having made the passage in 10 days and 18 hours. She brings four days later news.

On Sixth-day, July 18, Mr. Salomons, the Jew recently elected a Member of Parliament for Greenwich, presented himself at the table of the House of Commons, and requested to be sworn on the Old Testament. This privilege was denied him, and after a good deal of talk and manœuvering, Mr. Salomons was expelled from the House.

Dr. Lingard, the celebrated historian of England, died at his residence, Hornby, on Thursday night. For some length of time he had been breaking up, and, for the last few weeks a fatal result had been almost daily expected. He was aged 81 years.

From France we learn that the much-talked-of Bill for the Revision of the Constitution has been defeated.

The execution of Count Hippolyte Visart de Bocarmé, condemned for poisoning the brother of his wife with essential oil of tobacco, took place at Mons, in Belgium, on Friday, July 18. It was not till the previous day that either the condemned or the public of Mons was made aware of the time fixed for the event.

Mr. Salomon's Case.

There was a singular scene in the House of Commons on Friday, July 18. The Speaker took the chair at ten minutes to four o'clock, at which time the House was unusually crowded, there having been about 300 members present. Mr. Alderman Salomon, the recently elected member from Greenwich, who is of the Jewish faith, presented himself at the table, and, having requested to be sworn on the Old Testament, he took the oaths of allegience, supremacy, and abjuration; but in the last named oath he substituted for the closing words, "On the true faith of a Christian," the exclamation, "So help me God." Having, as he stated, thus taken the oaths in the form and with the ceremonies binding on his conscience, according to the statute, 1 and 2 Victoria, c. 105, he demanded to be permitted to subscribe the oath of abjuration and to declare his property qualification. The Speaker informed him that, having failed to take the oath of abjuration in the form prescribed by law, he must retire below the bar. The honorable gentleman, however, took his seat next to Sir William Molesworth, immediately below the Ministerial bench, whereupon there arose loud cries of "Withdraw!" and "Order!" and considerable uproar, and the Speaker then plainly intimated that the Alderman must withdraw. Led by Mr. J. A. Smith, Mr. Salomons went below the bar; but this did not satisfy the House, and he ultimately obeyed the order to withdraw by going up the steps of the Lord's gallery and standing there during the discussion which took place relative to his case. Sir B. Hall then stated that Mr. Salomons was anxious to try, before the legal tribunals of the country, his right to sit in the House as the representative of the people of Greenwich; and the Hon. Baronet wished to know whether what had been done was enough to induce the Government to instruct the Attorney General to prosecute the Hon. gentleman, in order that the question might be fairly and fully tried. In the absence of Lord John Russell, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not prepared to reply to the question on the instant; and he suggested that in so grave a matter the House should take time for deliberation and inquiry, and postpone the subject until Monday. After a brief, but rather warm discussion, this suggestion was agreed to.

On the next Thursday, the Speaker announced that he had received a letter from Mr. Salomons, complaining that the minutes of Friday's proceedings contained no mention of the document which he attempted to read at the table of the House, and afterward handed in. The Speaker said that those minutes properly excluded mention of anything which had taken place after Mr. Salomons had been ordered to withdraw.

Sir. B. Hall asked whether Government would authorize a prosecution of M. Salomons for the acts he had done upon that occasion.

Lord John Russell replied that he did not consider that a prosecution ought at present to be ordered by Government.

Sir B. Hall said that the only course then open to Mr. Salomons was to take his seat in the House.

Upon this intimation Mr. Salomons who had been sitting under the gallery, came down into the house, and took his seat in the front of the Liberal benches, between Sir W. Molesworth and Mr. C. Anstey. This step was followed by very noisy manifestations of approbation and the reverse, which lasted for some time.

The Speaker ordered Mr. Salomons to withdraw, but that gentleman did not obey the order.

An excited discussion arose, which continued for several hours. Mr. Salomons persisted in keeping his seat, and in voting on three different motions that came up, subjecting himself to £500 fine each time. At length, after an effectual attempt to adjourn, the House divided on the original motion, that Mr. Salomons do withdraw.

For the motion,	231
Against it,	81
Majority for the motion		150

The Speaker then called upon Mr. Alderman Salomons pursuant to the resolution of the House, to withdraw.

Mr. Alderman Salomons still retrined his seat.

The Speaker directed the Sergant-at-Arms to move Mr. Alderman Salomons below the bar.

The Sergant-at-Arms having approched the honorable member for the purpose of carrying the Speaker's orders in effect.

The honorable gentleman retired below the bar.

Lord J. Russell than stated that the resolution he should propose this day would be exactly similar to that he moved in the case of Baron Rothschild. Adjourned.

Two Young Ladies Drowned.—Miss M. A. Goodrich and Miss Susan Dinsmore were drowned in Lake Erie near Quincy, Chautauque county, on Saturday the 19th inst. They went out only a short distance from the shore in company with Wm. Bell, Jr., when the frail boat parted at the bow. The Westfield Transcript says:

"Mr. Bell immediately jumped into the water, endeavoring to urge the sinking boat toward the shore, while the young ladies sat down in the bottom, the better to steady its motion. It rapidly filled, however, and upset, when they were of course precipitated into the water. Mr. B. with great exertion succeeded in getting them both hold of the wreck; but a heavy swell turned the boat again, and left them a second time at the mercy of the waves. Again Mr. B. endeavored to get them hold of the boat, and he succeeded in getting Miss Dinsmore to grasp the boat, but Miss Goodrich sank and was drowned. Miss Dinsmore soon became exhausted and sank to rise no more. Mr. Bell, although nearly powerless, contrived to retain hold until within a few rods of the shore, when he must have also drowned but for the timely assistance of those upon the beach. He was taken out. however, and with some difficulty resuscitated."

Great Land Sale.—All the surveyed lands in this district, says the St. Croix (Wis.) Inquirer, amounting to near 3,500,000 acres, will be offered for sale at this place in the month of August next. This is, we believe, the largest amount ever before offered for sale at any one time, in any Land District in the United States, and embraces a tract of country extending nearly from the Wisconsin river to the Mississippi, and north to the head of the St. Croix. The first sale will commence on the 4th of August, and close on the 18th. This sale will include the lands lying on and between the Black, Chippewa, O'Clare and Nominee rivers, which is valuable for its immense tracts of pine and numerous water-powers on those streams. The second sale commences on the 19th of August, and includes all the surveyed lands between the Chippewa, Mississippi and St. Croix, which is one of the finest sections of farming land in the State, and possesses advantages of timber, prairie and water, not enjoyed by any other portion of the west.

Suicide on Board the Atlantic.—A man of reputed respectability, and formerly a merchant of high renown in Boston, committed suicide by shooting himself, on board the steamship Atlantic, on the 25th of July—two days out from Liverpool. It is rumored that the deceased, some days previous to leaving England, had been indulging to an immoderate degree in the use of intoxicating drinks, and kept up the fatal indulgence until that most to be dreaded of all diseases, delirium tremens, deprived him of all reason and led to the commission of the fatal act. The body of the deceased was taken in charge by several of his medical friends residing in Boston, who preserved it in spirits until such time as they should arrive in New-York, and forward his remains to his relatives in New-England. SUMMARY.

Since the new rates of postage went into effect there has been a rapid and steady increase of correspondence. The ratio of paid letters was at first about one-half of the whole number; now at least three-quarters are paid, and the proportion is still increasing. Stamps are very generally used for letters. The number of transient newspapers has fallen to a mere trifle of what it has been.

On Saturday night a frame house at Browntown, Bradford county, Pa., owned by the contractors on the North Branch Canal Extension, was consumed, and Abraham Fisher, and Henry Fisher, his son, contractors; Mr. Flannegan, superintendent; and a man whose name was Goldsmith, the cook, perished in the flames. Abraham Fisher had just returned with money to pay his hands, and the money was probably consumed also.

At the late term of the Superior Court of New Hampshire, in the case of Elkins vs. Boston and Maine Railroad, it was decided that Railroads are not common carriers of goods and merchandize by their passenger trains, unless they expressly hold themselves out as such; and evidence that the Railroad two or three times carried goods by such trains, does not subject them to this liability. Goods sent by such trains are at the risk of the owners.

The St. Louis papers inform us that the cholera exists in various places at the West. At Waverly, Ill., it has appeared with a fatality which has produced great consternation. A letter from there states that there had been from seventeen to twenty deaths. At Carthage, Ill., on the 16th ult., there were four deaths; on the 17th, one; and on the 19th twe more cases occurred. At Louisiana, Mo., it created quite a panic, but the danger was said to have passed.

The business on the Erie Railroad for July shows an increase of about $4,000 over June. As compared with July of last year the increase is very large.

The Chicago Journal of July 26 says: Lake Michigan was playing its antics again all day yesterday, the water rising from two to four feet every half hour or so, and as suddenly receding. At dusk the lake was as smooth as a mirror, without wind or any apparent cause, the water rose to the height of four feet twice within an hour. "What has caused this commotion" with old Michigan, is a mystery.

Robert Beebee of Ellis village, Jefferson county, while in a state of beastly intoxication, was driven to the act of self-destruction. He was found on Saturday evening in a shed belonging to Mr. Searle, hanging by the neck. An empty bottle was found in the poor suicide's hat, which had been doubtless emptied of its contents previous to the tragic act.

At the late session of the United States District Court at Springfield, Illinois, two young men named Hiram Purcell and Elias Warfield, indicted for robbing the mail, pleaded guilty; when, in consequence of their youth, both being eighteen years of age, they were sentenced to three months' imprisonment in the penitentiary.

The following Life Insurance Companies have complied with the law of the last Legislature of New York, which compels them to deposit $100,000 with the Comptroller: The Albion of London, United Life of New York, New York Life, New York Life and Trust, New England Mutual of Boston, and Mutual Benefit of New Jersey.

Mr. Wm. Ramsay, late editor and proprietor of the Sidney (Ohio) Yeoman, dropped dead on the 13th ult., while seated at his table, in the act of writing editorial. Mr. Ramsay has, for the last twenty years, been engaged in publishing, and he has left many friends to mourn his sudden departure.

The Annual Exhibition of Live Stock in connection with the Twenty-fourth Fair of the American Institute, will take place at Madison Cottage, corner of Fifth-avenue and Twenty-third-st., N. Y., on the 15th, 16th and 17th of October next.

The farmers in Ohio complain that the new corn this season is nearly all infected by a species of caterpillar which insert themselves through the silk end of the ears and eat away the grain. Should the stock corn be found similarly affected, the crop will fall short at least one half.

The Postmaster General acknowledges having received, under cover of a letter signed "Romulus," one hundred dollars, in two notes of the Bank of Washington, part or all of which sum, the writer says, is due to the Post Office Department.

On Saturday afternoon last, Mr. Jos. S. Atkins, of Mt. Vernon, Me., was killed by lightning. He was with his son mowing; and the son was also prostrated, and remained senseless for an hour, and on coming to, found his father dead by his side.

It is said that the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company have still upon their road, and in good running order, the first steam locomotive running between Philadelphia and South Amboy. It was put on in the year 1832, and consequently is 19 years old.

A Fair, somewhat after the English pattern, has been established at Mineral Point, Wis. One of them, held in June, is thus spoken of in The Tribune of that place: "On this day, pursuant to public notice for that purpose given, a Fair was held at the village of Mineral Point, and a very great assemblage of farmers, mechanics and citizens appeared on the ground selected, when a number of horses, mares and colts, and heads of horned cattle, consisting of yokes of cattle, milch cows and calves, and young cattle, were exhibited for sale." The sales are reported to have been quite satisfactory.

The National Intelligencer has a long article against sympathy for the Cuban revolutionists, and says, that it is plain that the pretended declaration of independence is no act of the people of Cuba, but of those individuals who have in different cities of the country opened recruiting rendezvous, raised and lent money, displayed strange flags, and marshaled innocent youths and reckless desperadoes from allegiance to their own government, into the wild, dangerous and infamous plundering enterprises against the dominions of Spain.

The St. Croix (Wisconsin) Inquirer says: The Commissioners appointed by the Governor of Wisconsin to select 500,000 acres of land given by the General Government for the support of schools in this State, made choice of something over 100,000 acres of the fine timber and prairie land in this county for that purpose, which is now being appraised and will be sold to actual settlers, who have the right of pre-emption, at about the same price of government lands. The State gives a credit of thirty years on these lands by the purchaser paying the interest annually, at the rate of 7 per cent.

The State Fair in Vermont will be held this year at Middlebury, on the 10th and 11th of September. In addition to the usual display of sheep, including some of the best breeds in New England, there will be exhibited twenty large Merino sheep just arrived from Havre in the packet ship Samuel M. Fox, having been purchased for Mr. S. W. Jewett of the former place. They are said to be from the finest flock in France, and among them is one male of the Rambouillet breed, only two years old, who has already yielded 40⅜ pounds of wool in his two shearings.

The Ballston Journal announces the death of Mr. James Comstock, the former proprietor of that paper, and one of the oldest editors in that section of the State, he having published the Independent American in Ballston, in 1810, under the firm of Comstock & Bates, and subsequently edited and published the Ballston Spa Gazette and Saratoga Co. Farmer, which, with the omission of the latter part of the title, he continued to preside over as editor and proprietor for a period of nearly twenty-six years.

It is said by the Cincinnati Times, that there is in that city a house occupied by fifteen or twenty persons who follow street begging as a business. "Their gains average every day from five to ten dollars for each of the gang, and their nights are spent in feasting and debauchery. They are all able bodied men and women, and when engaged in their vocation as mendicants, counterfeit lameness or any other physical infirmity likely to excite the compassion of the public."

Dr. Josiah Skeen, a highly respectable citizen of Jacksonville, Ill., retired to bed in good health, and in half an hour afterwards started suddenly from his sleep, exclaiming he had the cholera. In his alarm he drank off a large tumbler full of brandy, and two or three ounces of strong essence of peppermint, which occasioned his death in a few hours. There were no cholera symptoms present, and the physicians concurred in opinion that the death was occasioned solely by the draughts taken.

The Buffalo Courier makes the following statement in regard to Jenny Lind's intentions:—"Worn down by the fatigues of six months' constant labor and journeying, it is the intention of Madame Lind to break up her troupes here, and, retaining only her personal suit, to refresh exhausted nature and gather new inspiration within the sound of that greatest wonder of the world, the Falls of Niagara."

A rumor got abroad in North Carolina, that Prof. Deems, of the Greensboro Female College, had been caned by the girls. It seems the calumny originated in the fact, that the young ladies presented the Professor a beautiful gold-headed ebony cane, as an evidence of their affection and regard.

The bark Jane, Capt. Soule, of Halifax, from New York, July 21, for Glasgow, with coal and naval stores, took fire when one day out, from spontaneous combustion, and burnt to the water's edge. The Captain and crew took to their boats, and were picked up on the 24th by the bark Geo. Briggs, from Boston.

The steamship Alabama arrived at New-Orleans Aug. 1 from Chagres, with later advices from California. Another conflagration had occurred at San Francisco, in which ten squares were burnt, and three millions worth of property was destroyed. Several lives were also lost. The fire is believed to have been the work of incendiaries.

Later advices from Havana state that Trinidad and Villa Clara had declared against the Government and favor of the insurgents. A dispatch from Cincinnati reports that large bodies of young men in that region are waiting for an opportunity to join the insurgents.

The Hightstown (N. J.) Record says that the peach growers have commenced sending their fruit to market, and that several baskets were at the depot in that place on Wednesday, that looked well for early fruit. The crop this year is not large, and the consumers will have to pay higher prices than they did last season.

Don Marcial Arias Carbajal, a young Spaniard, has deposited at the Patent Office the plan of a mechanism which he has invented, and to which he has given the name of Brake a la Marcialina, or the Application of Steam to the Brakes, and which enables the engineer to close them when necessary from his place.

A correspondent writing from Detroit, says he has just been to Windsor, C. W., opposite that city. The vast barracks erected during the last war, may be seen there rapidly falling to decay. They are now occupied by fugitive slaves, and among them both poverty and suffering are visible. Many of them left property and home to avoid slavery in this Republic.

A special Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the diocese of Illinois, is to convene at Pekin, in that State, on the 1st of September next, for the purpose of electing an Assistant Bishop. The declining health of Bishop Philander Chase, from extreme old age and arduous duties, renders this step necessary.

A Mass State Convention of the opponents to the "Fugitive Slave Law, to the further extension of Slavery, to the insolence of men of any section of the Union who dictate to us subjects we shall or shall not discuss," has been called to meet at Madison, Wisconsin, on the 9th of September, to nominate a Governor and State officers.

The number of newspapers taken by the people of the United States annually averages over sixteen to every inhabitant, man, woman, or child. In the British Empire only one person in 12,000 takes a newspaper, in Belgium one in 25,000, in Russia one in 33,000, in Prussia one in every 20,000.

It is said that five gentlemen recently killed 3,500 brook trout in two days and a half, in Lewis County! This is a large story, and, for the sake of the humanity of those of whom it is told, we hope it is not true.

The slave of John K. Shaw & Co., of New Orleans, absconded with $4,500, the proceeds of a check intrusted to him, and drawn from the Bank. No traces of him have yet been discovered.

Joseph S. Atkins, of Mount Vernon, Maine, while mowing in a field on Saturday, was struck by lightning and instantly killed. His son, standing near him, was knocked down senseless, but resuscitated.

In Ohio advices from all quarters of the State show that the wheat crop of the present season will be the largest ever grown in the State. In New York, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin, the yield is also very large, and the wheat of the very best quality.

The Commissioners of Excise in New York adjourned last week, after having licensed only four thousand seven hundred and thirteen liquor-sellers.

The Postmaster-General, with the advice of the Attorney-General, has decided that there can be but one office of publication for newspapers and periodicals, and that is where they are printed and published.

The reports from all the grain-growing parts of the Union indicate that the wheat harvest of 1851 will be the heaviest ever raised.

MARRIED.

In Edmeston, Otsego Co., N. Y., on the 29th of July, by Eld. W. B. Maxson, Mr. Benjamin F. Madison, of Burlington, N. Y., to Miss Fanny Burdick, daughter of Mr. David Burdick, of Edmeston, N. Y.

In Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y., July 15th. 1851, by Eld. T. E. Babcock, Mr. John Longwell, of Hammondsport, to Miss Harriet Goodrich, of the former place.

DIED.

In Independence, N. Y., July 20th, 1851, of consumption, Lydia Reynolds, wife of Wm. Reynolds, in the 74th year of her age. She professed Christ in early life and united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, R. I. Subsequently, on removing to Brookfield, N. Y., she joined first Church of that town. At the time of her death she was a member of the Church in Independence. In all her pilgrimage, she found the Saviour whom she learned to trust in her youth, a "present help in every time of need." Nor did He forsake her in death. As she neared the boundaries of time, she manifested such cheerfulness, and confidence in the Gospel, and talked of her departure from this life, and her entrance upon the next, in such a spirit as almost to shut out of the mind of the beholder the thought of being in the house of approaching death, and to present the appearance of one preparing for a journey. T. E. B.

In Alfred, N. Y., July 16th, Miss Prudence Davis, aged 20 years. Sister Davis professed religion in early life, and united with the second Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, of which she continued a worthy member until dismissed to join the church triumphant. Her disease was consumption, with which she lingered more than a year, and then died in the triumphs of faith; her last words being, "I am ready and willing to go." J. K.

Union Bible Dictionary.

PREFERABLE TO ANY OTHER.—It is unquestionably preferable to any other manual adapted to aid the young in studying the sacred volume. [N. Y. Obs.

Fuller than any other.—It is nearly a complete summary of all the most valuable learning on the subjects embraced in it. [The Independent.

It is, by far, the completest and most perspicuous Bible Dictionary of its size to be found. It condenses a great amount of learning, and has a fullness of information, for which one would not look in so unpretending a volume, and which is all that most Bible readers would desire on the subject. [N. Y. Evangelist.

Cheaper than any other.—There is probably no book, except the Bible itself, in which so great a quantity of matter can be purchased for so small a sum; and happily, it is matter of an important character, all of which helps to elucidate the Bible. It explains the meaning of words, and the names of persons, animals, and objects, which are not defined in ordinary dictionaries. The images of things are also given in pictures, wherever this method is necessary to a just perception of them, or can be made to convey a more ready and accurate idea, than a mere verbal description. It is a sort of sine-qua-non for a Sunday-school teacher, and should be in the hands of the more forward pupils.

The best of its kind.—I feel free to express my general approbation of the "Union Bible Dictionary," as a work well calculated to extend the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and especially to be a valuable assistant to teachers and scholars in our Sunday-schools. [Rev. Dr. Alexander.

The mass of various and important information compressed within so small a compass is almost incredible. [Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Mass.

The Christian Review.

THE removal of this Quarterly to New York more than a year since, and its elevation in character, the Publishers are happy to say, have greatly increased its circulation. Seeing this readiness to appreciate and patronize their efforts, they are determined to spare no pains or expense in raising the work to the highest point of excellence, every way worthy of its position in the metropolis of the nation, and as the organ of one of the most numerous and respectable denominations in the land.

TERMS.

For a single copy, three dollars per annum. No subscriptions received for less than a volume commencing with the Jan. No. of each year.

Every person forwarding the subscription price of four copies, shall receive a fifth copy gratis.

POSTAGE PRE-PAID.

When paid in advance, the postage will be pre-paid by the Publishers; or, the postage will be pre-paid on all numbers issued after the payment of the subscription. ☞ NEW POSTAGE LAW. ☜

This offer of pre-payment of postage is of more importance in consequence of the new law. The postage under 500 miles is the same as before; over 500 and under 1,500 miles the postage will be double; over 1,500 and under 2,500 miles, treble; and over 2,500 and 3,500, quadruple.

☞ If, however, the postage is pre-paid it is only one-half the above rates.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

This periodical has at last taken its true position. It will now challenge comparison with the best religious Reviews—proving that the Baptists have intellectual power and diversity enough to maintain a denominational Quarterly of the highest standard. [Watchman and Reflector.

In tasteful and correct mechanical execution the "Review" is not surpassed by any of the Quarterlies. . . . Every minister should have it; and we wonder that more of our lay brethren, of educated mind, literary taste, and pecuniary ability, do not subscribe. [Michigan Christian Herald.

This is one of the best Quarterlies in the United States, and may, in fact, be regarded as a model of its kind. [Western Literary Messenger.

We have always regarded the "Christian Review" as an able, candid, and fearless exponent of truth, both in religion and literature. It is eminently catholic in its spirit, and comprehensive in its scope. We commend it, cordially, to religious readers. [Southern Literary Gazette.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J. W. MORTON, Mr. O. B. IRISH, } Assistants.

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—

The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term; Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting,	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

Board, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

Miscellaneous.

The Wife's Appeal.

BY W. C. BENNETT.

Oh, don't go in to-night John!
Now husband, don't go in!
To spend your only shilling, John,
Would be a cruel sin.
There's not a loaf at home, John;
There's not a coal, you know;
Though with hunger I am faint, John,
And cold comes down the snow:
Then don't go in to-night!

Ah, John, you must remember,
And, John, I can't forget,
When never foot of yours, John,
Was in the alehouse set.
Ah, those were happy times, John!
No quarrels then we knew,
And none were happier in our lane
Than I, dear John, and you:
Then don't go in to-night!

You will not go! John, John, I mind,
When we were courting, few
Had arm or step as firm,
Or cheek as red as you.
But drink has stolen your strength, John,
And paled your cheek to white,
Has tottering made your once firm tread,
And bowed your manly height:
You'll not go in to-night.

You'll not go in? think on the day
That made me, John, your wife;
What pleasant talk that day we had
Of all our future life!
Of how your steady earnings, John,
No wasting should consume,
But weekly some new comfort bring
To deck our happy room;
Then don't go in to-night!

To see us, John, as then we dressed,
So tidy, clean, and neat;
Brought out all eyes to follow us
As we went down the street.
Ah, little thought our neighbors then!
And we as little thought,
That ever, John, to rags like these
By drink we should be brought!
You won't go in to-night!

And will you go? If not for me,
Yet for your baby stay;
You know, John, not a taste of food
Has passed my lips to-day;
And tell your father, little one,
'Tis mine your life hangs on.
You will not spend the shilling, John?
You'll give it him? Come, John,
Come home with us to-night!

The Indians in Oregon.

The National Intelligencer says that the Indian Commissioners have recently completed four treaties with the Indian tribes of Oregon. The following account of the treaties, show what trinkets satisfy the Indians for their lands, and what gloomy forebodings they have of their own fate, can not be read without pain:—

One treaty was with the Yamhill band of the Callapooya tribe, whereby they stipulate to become subject and faithful to the laws and regulations of the United States governing the intercourse between the whites and the Indians, and to continue the friends and allies of the same, referring all cases of difference or aggression arising between the whites and themselves to the Government of the United States for adjustment; the latter agreeing to indemnify them for all losses and injuries inflicted on them by the citizens of the United States. The Yamhills cede a tract of the south fork of the Callapooya, a tributary of the Wallamette, occupied by a numerous white population, and accept a reservation in a small isolated valley among the Coast Mountains, offering pasturage for their horses and a supply of roots, which form their principal support. Besides this reservation they are to receive compensation, partly in cash and the remainder in clothing, household utensils and agricultural implements, with the reserved right of changing these implements for other articles of equal value, on giving one year's notice to the Territorial Superintendent of Indian Affairs of their wish to do so. Ten rifles and three Indian horses are also to be given to the Chief of the bands, and seven substantial log huts, built within the reservation, as speedly as practicable after the ratification of the treaty.

A second treaty is with the Luckamiute band of the same tribe, having the same general stipulations as the foregoing. The Luckamiutes cede a tract along the river from which they take their name, also a tributary of the Wallamette, keeping a reservation for their own special use, saving the right to the authorities of the Territory to locate highways through the reservation whenever public convenience might appear to require it. The treaty stipulates a money compensation in the same proportions of cash and articles as in the treaty with the Yamhills. A horse and bridle is also to be delivered to each of the Chiefs of the band.

A third treaty with the Santiam band of the Moolalle tribe, similar in general respects to the forgoing, cedes to the United States a tract abutting on Silver Creek, a tributary of the Wallamette. It makes a reservation neighboring a former reservation to the Santiam band, with similar proviso as in the treaty with the Luckamiutes. They also get a compensation, part money and goods. Ten rifles to be delivered to the band at large, and a good Indian horse to the principal chief.

The fourth treaty is with the principal band of the Moolalle tribe, and agrees in general terms with the former. It cedes a tract of land commencing at a point within a mile of the Falls of the Wallamette, at Oregon city, and occupying a valuable portion of the country. They too are to have a reservation, with money and clothing, similar to the foregoing; also, fifteen rifles, and five horses to the chiefs, with a good log-house for the principal chief, Guai-eck-e-te.

The reservation made in these treaties are, in the judgment of the Commissioners, well suited to the character and condition of these Indians. Little conflict will be had with any rights of property acquired by white men; and in the very few cases where reservations for the Indians cover lands in occupancy of whites, it is recommended that the latter be bought out at a fair valuation. The Indians themselves have got to be almost wholly dependant on the whites for protection, assistance and money, and are unwilling to be removed far from them. On the other hand, they are of no little service to the white emigrant in a country where labor is scarce. So that all interests and wishes are served by the measures the Commissioners have taken.

So much, it might be remarked, have these Indians fallen into white habits and ideas, that they have altogether abandoned their original costume and adopted that of the whites, retaining only the blanket. They evidence a strong desire yet more to assimilate themselves to their white neighbors. These Indians seem to be constitutionally attached to the homes and haunts of their progenitors. Their habitations, such as they are, are not only permanent, but hereditary. They seem to have universally imbibed the idea that the doom of their race is sealed, and rather than move from the places their forefathers occupied will submit to die on the beloved soil.

With this deep-rooted, or rather ineradicable, principal the Commissioners had to contend, and only effected the favorable treaties they have by granting reservations in situations the very least objectionable to the white man. The lands so reserved are not well fitted for cultivation, though suited to the peculiar habits of the Indians. The Callapooyas have little taste for hunting or fishing, but live on low and marshy spots, where the kamass and wappattoo abound, while the Moolalles, a hardier and more vigorous race, inhabit the wooded slopes of the Cascade Mountains, and subsist chiefly on game.

Intemperance in England and Wales.

Every day throws fresh light on the fearful results of intemperance. At the last meeting of the Statistical Society, a paper was read by F. G. P. Neison, Esq., on the "rate of mortality among persons of intemperate habits." Mr. Neison commenced his paper by explaining that the primary reason for collecting the data then brought forward was to apply the results to life assurance operations, and he had consequently only included well-marked cases of intemperance, and not brought into his observations mere occasional drinkers, or what is termed generous or "free livers." Throughout the whole of the tables the mortality shown was frightfully high. In the 6111.5 years of life to which the observations extended, 357 deaths had taken place; but if these lives had been subject to the same rate of mortality as the general population of England or Wales, the number of deaths would have been 110 only, or less than one-third. At the term of life 21.30 the mortality was upward of five times that of the general community, and in the succeeding twenty years it was above four times greater, the difference gradually becoming less and less. An intemperate person of the age of 20 has an equal chance of living 15.6 years, one of 30 years of age 13.8, and one of 40 years 11.6 years, while a person of the general population of the country would have an equal chance of living 44.2, 36.5, and 28.8 years respectively. Some curious results were shown in the influence of the different kinds of drinks on the duration of life; beer drinkers averaging 21.7 years, spirit-drinkers 16.7, and those who drink both spirits and beer indiscriminately 16.1 years. These results, however, were not more curious than those connected with different classes of persons. The average duration of life, after the commencement of intemperate habits among mechanics, working and laboring men, was eighteen years; traders, dealers, and merchants, seventeen; professional men and gentlemen, fifteen; and females, fourteen years only. But perhaps the most curious circumstance disclosed was the remarkable similarity between the proportion of crime in the sexes to the proportion of deaths from assigned causes of intemperance. It was shown that the tendency to crime in the male sex is nearly five times greater than that of the female, or more strictly in the relation of 336 to 1,581, while the ratio of deaths to the population from assigned intemperate causes at the age of 20 and upward, are in the relation of 8,011 to 36,769—a most remarkable agreement, the difference being under 2½ per cent. Mr. Neison concluded by giving an estimate of the number of drunkards in England and Wales, from which it appears that the number of males was 53,583, and females 11,223, making a total of 64,806, which gives one drunkard to every 74 of the male population, one to every 434 of the female, and one in 145 of both sexes. How long are these things to be? When will the curse of strong drink be removed? How long will the drinking customs of society—customs so irrational—so destructive of health—so ruinous to soul and body—be sanctioned and upheld by fashion and learning, and piety and rank?

Suicide in France.

The number of suicides in France from the year 1835 to 1845 amounted to 33,032. During the year 1835 the number was 2,305, and from that time it regularly increases to 3,102, with the exception of the year 1844, which fell off 47 from the year 1843. The proportion between men and woman was 1,785 to 520 in 1835, and similar in the other years. Suicide was much less frequent in the mountain regions than in the level country. The number was decidedly influenced by the season of the year. There were the least in the month of December, only 1,977 cases in the whole twelve years. From that month there was a regular increase till June, which numbers 3,624, and a regular decrease again from that time till December. Among the suicides during this period were 239 children under 16 years of age; thence the number increases till between the age of 40 or 50, of which class there were 6,675 cases; then again a regular decrease; there being still 458 cases over 80. As to occupation, 7,530 were day laborers, 1,883 military men, 1,571 capitalists. Of the deaths, 11,084 were by drowning, 10,605 by hanging, 5,362 by shooting, 2,322 by the fumes of charcoal, 1,328 by sharp instruments, 791 by poisoning, and 1,399 by falling from a hight. As to the causes, there were 6,449 cases from mental aberration, 2,745 from bodily suffering, 1,186 from fear of legal process, 2,623 from domestic troubles, 1,853 from poverty, 1,697 from pecuniary embarrassment, 143 from ill treatment of parents, 983 crossed in love, 148 from jealousy, 1,360 habitual drunkenness, 3 (women) from want of means for the toilette, 1 for failing in an examination, and 6 from political excitement. [N. Y. Tribune.

Etiquette and Cheap Postage.—The system of prepaying postage is being very generally adopted by the merchants. Very many general letters, however, are still sent through the Post Office unpaid. There is a point of etiquette in connection with this subject which we are sure will be observed by every gentleman who once directs his attention to the subject. Under the old Post Office dispensation, the rule was, that letters between friends, except from a gentleman to a lady, need not be prepaid. If that custom ever had any claims to approval, they were entirely swept away by the operation of the new Postage Law. A letter which is not prepaid is charged two cents more than when prepaid. Is it polite, kind, or gentlemanly to subject a friend to a tax of 66 per cent., which benefits neither party to a correspondence? The polite world should remember that the times change, and that etiquette must keep pace with the times, if it would not lose its claims to gentlemanly consideration.

Southern Chivalry Illustrated.

The following, from a paper called the Troy Palladium, published in Pike County, Alabama, is the greatest illustration, of Southern Chivalry we have yet met with. Only think of a town being "thrown into a state of excitement" because a "one legged itinerant clock mender," ventured to speak "pretty freely on questions of free-soil, &c.," and was "seen some days previous in a very suspicious conversation with a negro man!" Here is the article, complete:—

An Abolitionist Served Right.—Our usually quiet little town was thrown into a state of some excitement on Saturday last, by the report that an Abolitionist was in our streets. A man who said his name was D. S. McCoy, an itinerant clock-mender, visited this place on Tuesday last, spoke pretty freely on questions of free-soil, &c., but it seems that no one paid any attention to the fellow, not thinking him an Abolitionist. On Saturday McCoy again made his appearance in the village, and went on in such a way as to leave no room to doubt his being an unadulterated Abolitionist; having been seen some days previous in a very suspicious conversation with a negro man belonging to Mrs. Allen. Our worty fellow-townsman, Richard F. Cook, Esq., went to McCoy and told him he must leave the place immediately—that the citizens were indignant at his conduct, and that if he did not leave as requested he would certanly receive such punishment, at their hands as his infamous conduct would authorise them to inflict on their worst enemy. The Abolitionist, not heeding the friendly advice given him, remained, and a number (in fact all) of the villagers assembled and procured a very ugly pole, placed the Abolitionist on it, and gave him as comfortable a ride down to the double branches as the case would admit of. Arrived at the branches the pole slipped, and down slid Mr. McCoy into considerably refreshed, yet unregenerated! He was then told that he might leave without further indignities being shown him, but he maintained his stubborn and dogged will to outbrave the masses that surrounded him; still paying no heed to the good advice of the humane, he continued his threats and refused to leave, bidding defiance to the whole community. The citizens then, seeing that they would have to use strong remedies, as his case was a very hopeless one, procured a basket of all sorts of feathers and a bucket of tar, together with a substantial wagon-whip with a very extensive thong attached thereto, and where about to apply things that were calculated to have a moving effect on his hitherto stubborn bowels—when, just then, he caved, and concluded to retire in peace. After mounting his horse and getting off a respectful distance, he uttered the most awful threats and imprecations on the devoted Trojans, who where about to get at him, when lo! he vamosed, and when last seen he was on his way to see the Governor!

McCoy is a one-legged man, and it is altogether owing to that circumstance that he saved his bacon! No two-legged Abolitionist can come here and say what McCoy said, and take his hide away whole cloth.

Curing Clover Hay.

Clover makes a most desirable and nutritive hay, provided it be cut in season, and properly cured. As a general rule, it is not advisable to permit it to remain standing much after the period of inflorescence, as the ripening of seed in the field exposes it to a certain degree of deterioration, which considerably diminishes its value as a feed for stock, besides insuring a certain degree of actual and unavoidable loss in handling it, as those leaves and heads which have become dry are easily detached from the stock during the process of raking and pitching, even when these operations are performed with the most consummate care.

My plan of operation in curing clover is as follows:—As soon as the heads are fully blown I commence mowing, care being had to lay the swath as closely as possible, and to leave no scattering grass between them, if it can be helped. About four o'clock in the afternoon, provided the weather during the day has been clear and warm, I have the swaths turned carefully over with a fork, and in this position they are allowed to remain until four o'clock the next day. I then with a pitchfork commence cocking the swath—pitching the half-made grass into flakes as much as possible, and making my cocks compact, but small, say about eighty pounds uncured hay to a cock. They are then neatly raked off, the "scatterings" cleaned up, and the cocks permitted to remain unopened and wholly undisturbed till dry.

Should the weather prove favorable, the making will proceed rapidly, and in two days from the time the grass is cocked, the hay will be fit to put on the mow. This increases the entire preservation of the tops and foliage, gives a beautiful green color to the hay, and prevents the stocks from assuming that dry, ligneous character which they are sure to possess when made by exposure to the hot sun. Clover made in this way is never mouldy; and even should the weather prove unfavorable, or even wet after cocking, the compactness of the cocks will prevent their becoming saturated, and a few hours' sunning will render them fit to put on the mow. I have known hay cocked in this manner to remain out a week or ten days, and still retain all its original greenness and fragrance perfectly unimpaired.

Making hay in this manner is a practice not yet in much favor with the American farmers; but in England, Scotland, and other European countries, the "grass cock system" of curing has now nearly superseded every other, not only in the management of clover, but all other grasses, even the finest, but when cut for hay, or as a dry feed for domestic stock. In the case of clover, which usually grows thick and rank, the fork should always take the place of the rake, which is not required. [Germantown Tel.

Cutting Hay and other Crops.

There appears to be sound philosophy and good sense in the following remarks from an English paper:—

The period at which hay is cut and corn [wheat] reaped, materially affects the quantity [by weight] and the quality of the produce. It is commonly known that when radishes are left too long in the ground, they become hard and woody; that the soft stem of the young cabbage undergoes similar change as the plant grows old; and the artichoke becomes tough and uneatable if left too long uncut. The same natural change goes on in grasses which are cut for hay. In the blades and stems of the young grasses there is much sugar, which as they grow up, is gradually changed, first, into starch, and then into woody fibre. The more completely the latter change is effected—that is, the riper the plant becomes—the less sugar and starch, both soluble substances, they contain. And though it has been ascertained that the woody fibre is not wholly indigestible, but that the cow for example, can appropriate a portion of it for food, as it passes through her stomach, yet the reader will readily imagine that those parts of the food which dissolve most easily are also likely—other things being equal—to be most nourishing to the animal. It is ascertained also, that the weight of hay or straw reaped is actually less when allowed to become fully ripe, and therefore by cutting soon after the plant has attained its greatest height, a larger quantity as well as a better quality of hay will be obtained, while the land also will be less exhausted. The same remarks apply to corn, both to the straw and to the grain produce. The rawer a crop is cut, the heavier and more nourishing the straw. Within three weeks of being ripe, the straw begins to diminish in weight; and the longer it remains uncut after that time, the lighter it becomes and less nourishing. On the other hand, the ear, which is sweet and milky a month before it is ripe, gradually consolidates, the sugar changing into starch, and the milk thickening into the gluten and albumen of the flour. As soon as this change is nearly completed, or about a fortnight before ripening, the grain contains the largest proportion of starch and gluten; if reaped at this time, the bushel will be heavier, and will yield the largest quantity of fine flour and the least bran. At this period, the grain has a thin skin, and hence the small quantity of bran. But if the crop be still left uncut, the next natural step in the ripening process is to cover the grain with a better protection, a thicker skin. A portion of the starch of the grain is changed into a woody fibre, precisely as in the ripening of hay, of the soft shoots of the dog rose, and of the roots of the common radish. By this change, therefore, the quantity of starch is lessened, and the weight of husk increased; hence the diminished yield of flour, and the increased produce of bran. Theory and experience, therefore indicate about a fortnight before the full ripening, as the most proper time for cutting corn. The skin thinner, the grain fuller, the bushel heavier, the yield of flour greater, the quantity of bran less, while at the same time the straw is heavier, and contains more soluble matter than when it is left uncut until it is considered to be fully ripe.

Death of "Mother Gertrude."

In Paris, an old lady named "Mother Gertrude," known in all the distinguished families of that capital, lately died. Could she have written her life it would be a remarkable story, for she was a nurse for the sick, and had witnessed in the long course of her life many remarkable scenes. She had closed the eyes of Chopin; waited on Mirabeau, Sieyes, the Brothers Lameth, Barnave and the late Duke de Lauzun; applied leeches to Marat; put a mustard plaster on Robespierre, and even held the head of Napoleon, when he had an attack of fever. Not long ago she closed the eyes of a man who for twenty years previous to the Revolution of February, held the keys of the "Secret Fund," and who, before he died, ordered a glass of water, dipped his fingers therein, and breathed his last with these words: "I wash my hands in innocence." Mother Gertrude also witnessed the resurrection of a child, who is now one of the most distinguished women of Paris. The child had died, as it was supposed, and had been placed in its coffin. That night, the mother, who had cast herself on the floor in an adjoining room, in the bitterness of her grief, suddenly arose and was led by an irresistible feeling to look again on her child's face. On opening the door, she found it sitting up in the coffin, playing with the funeral garlands. This remarkable scene became the subject of one of Lamartine's poems.

A Yankee Manufacturing Town.—Waterbury is the chief seat of manfactures in Connecticut. Having had little to do with Cloths or Fabrics, but devoted its energies to those branches in which Ingenuity does most and mere Labor least, it has retained its activity, and its prosperity, though the recent manufacturing depression. Ten years ago, it had 2,468 inhabitants; now it has 5,137—an increas of over 100 per cent. Its Census shows 782 dwellings, 1,005 families, 109 Farms, and 45 Factories, employing a capital of $1,511,900, which is probably swelled by the capitals of individual shops auxiliary to these to not less than Two Millions. Sheet Brass, Copper, German Silver Wire, Plated Ware, Daguerreotype Plates, Buttons, Pins, Pocket Knives, Hooks and Eyes, Hosiery, Suspenders, Umbrella Trimmings, &c. are the products. Probably more Buttons are made at Waterbury than in all America beside. The Button manufacture was first started here in 1802, being the second attempt in the United States. The Brass and Copper buisness was started here in 1830, under the impulse of the noble Tariff of 1828. The Pocket Cutlery business is much younger.

Burglars' Boots.—The notorious and desperate burglar, Shields, whose arrest we published on Monday last, was removed from his den in Orange street without his boots, and when in charge of the officers at the Chief's office, and on being taken to the Newark jail, seemed to be very much concerned about the boots left behind, and begged of the officers to get them and send them to him, which they promised to do. Yesterday afternoon the boots in question were obtained; but before sending them to Jersey, officer Read suspected that there might be something wrong about them, and on examination found three small saws, a file, and other useful little tools, which had been nicely packed between the soles when made. These instruments were ntende d for use in breaking jail.

Improvement of Parsnips, Beets, and Carrots.—By a little attention to the seeds of these roots, and to good cultivation, their size and quality can be greatly improved. Our plan is this: As soon as the umbels or spikes, as the case may be, begin to form for the seed, we carefully prune out the laterals and throw all the circulation into the central stalks. The result will be a development of the remaining seeds to about double their usual size and in a much higher degree of maturity and perfection. A little extra attention to manuring the ground, deep tillage and careful cultivation of the beds, in which these seeds are sown in the ensuing year, will insure roots of at least double the ordinary size; and a repetition of these processes, for several seasons in succession, will continue to repay for the trouble by the annual increase of the products. Seed raisers and gardeners will do well to notice this. [Family Visitor.

Siamese Twins Outdone.—The La Grange (Ga) Reporter of the 11th inst. says: On the night of the 3d inst. a servant women belonging to R. A. T. Ridely gave birth to a child having two perfect and distinct heads and necks on one body. It has two breast bones and two spines, and (it is supposed from external indication) two sets of digestive organs. In other respects is does not seem to be different from other children. It legs and arms are perfect, and, excepting the parts above mentioned as double, there appears no deformity whatever. The most surprising part of the whole affair is that the mother is alive and doing well, although the child weighed at birth eleven and a half pounds. Dr. R. has preserved it in alcohol, in which state it was exhibited for several days at his office. It is his intention to present it to the Medical College at Augusta.

Variety.

The Washington Telegraph says the first application for a patent from California will shortly be presented at the Patent Office. The model, which is of a double-acting force-pump, is all of pure solid gold. The inventor is a native of Washington, but now a resident of Sacramento. The gold of which his model is composed was gathered by himself, and he has exhibited much skillful handiwork, as well as ingenuity in its construction. Of all the models in the Patent Office—more than 15,000 in number—the present is the only one of this material.

The Parisians are diverting themselves with a lively little farce, respecting the adventures of a Frenchman in London during the Great Exhibition. The disagreeables of tough beef, heavy pudding sombre skies, and stiff manners, throw them into convulsions of laughter—when suddenly the stage is darkened, (the scene being a few blank walls,) sad music makes the heart sink with its plaintive wailing, while a few melancholy individuals in deep mourning steal about on tiptoe, slowly repeating in solemn whispers, as the curtain falls, "It is Sunday."

Dr. Symonds, of New Orleans, publishes statistics to show that that it the unhealthiest city in the Union, and he enters into a curious calculation of the pecuniary loss thereby, averaging ten and a half millions a year, and over $400 to every man, woman, and child. The figures for four and a half years are:—Capital sunk by death $15,174,000; labor lost $17,003,250; ditto by sickness $2,173,075; cost of sickness and death $11,146,575; total $45,437,700.

Daniel Isaac, the celebrated Wesleyan preacher, was fond of smoking; and on one occasion an elderly lady entered the room, and seeing him engaged with the pipe, lifted her hands, and exclaimed, as if particularly shocked at the sight of so much self-indulgence, "Ah, Mr. Isaac, your are at your idol again!" Looking up at her with one of his quiet, yet pleasently demure expressions of features, he returned, puffing out a cloud of smoke, "Yes, I am burning it!"

"Extremes meet," is a proverb which finds an odd illustration in the recent action of the English Parliament and the California Legislature. These two bodies, which may be considered as lying at the extremes of civilization, both adjourned lately for reasons of like nature and importance—the first to attend the Derby Races, and the latter to witness a bull and bear fight.

As the sun doth not wait for prayers and incantations to be prevailed upon to rise, but immediately shines forth and received with universal salutations, so neither do you wait for applauses, and shouts, and praises in order to do good; but be a voluntary benefactor, aud you will be beloved like the sun.

New Era for the "Best Youth's Magazine!"

☞ GREAT REDUCTION OF POSTAGE! ☜

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET,

STILL under the editorial charge of Francis C. Woodworth, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, commences a new series with the issue of the number for July, 1851. This number is now ready. Now is the time to subscribe.

The great reduction in postage goes into effect on the first day of July. From and after that day, the postage on a single number of the Cabinet (paid quarterly, in advance) will be, for any distance not over 500 miles, 1 cent; over 500, and not over 1500, 2 cents—it being a reduction to all subscribers within 500 miles from 42 cents to 12 cents per annum, to all other subscribers in the Union a reduction of almost one half from the old rates. The publisher anticipates, as the result of this liberal reduction, a large and immediate addition to his subscription list from every part of the country, as the former high rates of postage have deterred many from receiving the work by mail.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet, in its reading matter, in the number, variety, and beauty of its illustrations, and in its general costume, now stands at the head of all monthly publications for the young. "It is unqualifiedly the best youth's magazine in America."—Brattleboro Democrat. "It is a model for all works of its class. We cannot too warmly commend it."—N. Y. Tribune. "It gives us pleasure to recommend it to our southern friends."—Balt. West. Continent. "Best magazine for youth we have ever seen."—Christ. Adv. & Jour. "It is a little world within itself."—N. Y. Independent. "Best publication of its class that I am acquainted with."—Rev. Dr. Adams.

* Each number contains 32 pages, and some 8 or 10 beautiful engravings. The reading matter is just such as is best adapted to amuse, entertain, and instruct the young mind.

☞ Please send on your orders at once. Specimen numbers can be seen at the office of this paper, or they will be forwarded, gratis, on application, (post paid,) to the publisher. Subscribers may send money by mail, at the publisher's risk.

Terms, (invariably in advance,) $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5.

Clergymen, postmasters, editors, and school teachers, who will form clubs of four or more, and who will forward the money, shall be allowed an additional copy for their trouble; or they are authorized to retain 25 per cent. on all new subscriptions, where the full price ($1) is paid.

Bound volumes, (of which there are now 5,) $1 25 each; the whole set, $5 50.

☞ Postage Free!—Subscribers at a distance, who will remit the full price ($1 25 each) shall receive the volumes postage free. These volumes contain nearly 500 pages each.

AGENTS WANTED.

The publisher wishes to employ several gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, Publisher.
118 Nassau-st., New York.

Note.—The publishers or editors of those newspapers to whom this advertisement is sent, MARKED, are requested to give it (not including this note) some half a dozen conspicuous insertions; for which they shall be entitled to receive a copy of the Cabinet, monthly, for two years, on their sending to the address of "Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet" copies of the papers containing the advertisement; or, if preferred, they shall receive one volume of the Cabinet bound in muslin, and a copy of "Woodworth's Stories about Animals," illustrated with 40 engravings. Those who prefer the latter, must signify such preference and inform us how the books are to be sent. D. A. Woodworth.

THE SABBATH QUESTION.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—Your correspondent, T. W. B., has put a string of queries on the Sabbath question, commencing with, "Is the day for which they" (a party before named) "seek to enforce such sanctity, the true Sabbath which God has commanded?" I think there is a previous question thrust upon our notice by the agitations of the present time. The first inquiry should be, "Is there a day which is the true Sabbath of God?"

There are not a few in our day who, while they profess great reverence for the Word of God, claim the liberty of dispensing with the Sabbath, under the plea that it is not binding upon th[illegible]is dispensation. And though your [illegible], who [illegible]hed an article in your September number, would retain a day of worship on certain grounds specified, I think his views erroneous and unsafe.

Allow me to call the attention of your readers to a brief defense of a different view of the subject, in which, though I shall not directly meet that gentleman's arguments, I will try to set aside some of his conclusions.

I take the following position:—God has required that A SEVENTH PORTION OF MAN'S TIME shall be specially devoted to religious purposes, which arrangement belongs to man's whole history, independently of dispensational changes, and to his whole race, independently of national distinctions.

The highest authority has said, "The Sabbath was made for man." I am aware that Jesus adds, "And not man for the Sabbath," That is, man was not made to adapt himself as best he could to an existing arrangement, whether for good or evil—the Sabbath was made for his advantage. Do not, therefore, says the Saviour, permit a man to be famished on the Sabbath rather than rub out a few ears of corn. Do not wish David to perish on his journey rather than appropriate the shew-bread, which, according to a ceremonial regulation, is to be eaten only by the priests. Still, it is true that the Sabbath was made for man. And if made by the Divine Father expressly for his advantage, it must be eminently fitted to promote his good; and it would be marvelous if he should hold it by custom, or as an expedient.

A few passages from God's word will show the relation of the Sabbath to every period in the world's history The heavens and the earth were finished in six days, and Moses informs us that "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it." (Gen. ii. 3.) He blessed the seventh day. For whose use? Who was to obtain the blessing? Himself, or man? He sanctified it. For whose advantage? His own, or his creatures'? He no doubt was to be praised for his wonderful works. But who was to praise him? Unquestionably all his works praise him. But can any other product of his hand than man offer special praise on the seventh day? It may be said that it is set apart as a memorial of the divine rest, or that it celebrates Jehovah's power, and wisdom, and goodness, as seen in his creative acts. Then we will turn to Moses, who wrote this account, and ask whether the sanctification and blessing of this day had not a special reference to man. We will meet him as he descends the mountain that burned with fire, after Jehovah had been speaking in his ear, while he holds in his hands the tablets graven by the Divine finger. We will read from the very stone, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." (Ex. xx. 7.)

And now let us inquire if this command has aught to do with this early setting apart of the seventh day, or is it a mere Jewish requirement? Moses will readily instruct us. At the 11th verse of the same chapter, he continues, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested on the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it." They (men) were to keep it holy, for the Lord had hallowed it and blessed it. They were to keep holy, not a ceremonial day of Jewish appointment, but the day blessed and sanctified in Eden. Nor is the argument for this connection at all weakened by the fact, that another reason for keeping the Sabbath was afterwards given in Deut. v. 15. It was merely an addition. The second motive did not destroy the first. The reason for keeping a day may be cumulative.

The desert offers its testimony. When the children of Israel sojourned in the wilderness of Sin, on a certain sixth day Moses said, "To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord." And when the seventh day had come, he added, "To-day is the Sabbath of the Lord." And why was this day brought to their remembrance? They were gathering manna, and they were to gather it on six days only.

No one will dispute that man had the Sabbath through the times of the prophets.

It must, too, be carefully observed, that the Sabbath was not merely a day of rest, but a day of religious worship, a day in which the great congregation assembled, and the saints were filled with holy joy. Then, as now, the Sabbath sun rose upon the multitudes who were glad as they went up to the house of God. "The Lord spake unto Moses, saying, speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, The feasts (assemblies, Pyle, Gill, Scott, &c.) of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts: Six days shall work be done; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of rest, an holy convocation." (Lev. xxiii. 1, 2, 3.) And how was the day to be spent? We will pass by now the Jewish observances connected with it, and ask Isaiah how the day should be sanctified. Besides making it a day of rest from men's own labor, pleasure, thinking, and speaking, (in which it is implied that they should do God's pleasure, and think and speak for him,) he requires that they shall "call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of Jehovah." (Is. lviii. 13.)

When our Lord was upon earth, he very carefully observed the Sabbath. (See Luke iv. 16.) After his resurrection, he met his disciples on two successive first days; and from that day to the present time, one day in seven has been kept holy by the church of God.

And now will you allow me to conduct my readers back to the wilderness of Sin? This is the battle-field of the question. Those who deny the universal obligation of the Sabbatic institute, affirm that it was a Jewish ordinance, which passed away with that dispensation. On the contrary, the proposition laid down in this article affirms that it is a commandment exceeding broad, stretching through all time, and living through all dispensations. Now, that it may be a Jewish ordinance, it should have a Jewish origin; it is exceedingly awkward, therefore, that it should be found in the 2d chapter of Genesis. Hence the opponents of its universal application generally refer to the 16th chapter of Exodus, and endeavor to find there its institution. Led on by the great Paley, they demand that we shall surrender to them the previous twenty-five centuries of the world's history, as a time in which no Sabbath cheered the world.

All the argument that appears worth meeting may be placed under three heads.

First, There is the argument which arises from the ceremonial aspect of the Sabbath.

The law, as laid down in Ex. xxxi. 14, looks very much like a Jewish and temporary appointment. "Ye shall keep the Sabbath, therefore; for it is holy unto you; every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death; for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people." But can no moral truth or perpetual ordinance be wrapped round for a time with the things that are to be done away? Can there be no living kernel within a temporary incrustation? A man is to be put to death for gathering sticks on the Sabbath-day, which would not be done in gospel times. Does it follow that the Sabbath itself cannot belong to this dispensation? The stubborn and rebellious son, who would not obey the voice of his father or mother, was to be stoned by the men of the city. Does the abrogation of this social Jewish law carry away with it the great moral statute, "Honor thy father and thy mother?" And if not, why should the removal of the death-punishment, associated for a time with the Sabbath, sweep away the Sabbath itself? "Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day," stood side by side with "Honor thy father and thy mother." They are both moral precepts, growing out of certain conditions of society, which conditions remain substantially the same through all ages of this world's history.

Secondly, There is the argument arising from certain phraseology used in reference to the Sabbath, as brought under the notice of the congregation in the wilderness.

Paley seems to rely chiefly on this argument to disprove the universal obligation of the Sabbath. He adduces three witnesses, Moses says, "See, for the Lord hath given you the Sabbath." (Ex. xvi. 29.) Ezekiel, speaking for Jehovah, says, "Moreover, also, I gave them my Sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them." (Ez. xx. 12.) Nehemiah adds, addressing Jehovah, "Thou camest down also upon Mount Sinai, &c., and madest known unto them thy holy Sabbaths." (Neh. ix. 13, 14.) The words "given," "gave," and "madest known," are thought to constitute proof that the Sabbath was then instituted. Now, this kind of logic is very inconclusive. Suppose we turn to Gen. xxxv. 12. God there says to Jacob, "The land that I gave to Abraham I give to thee." In Josh. xxi. 43, the speaker says, "The Lord gave unto Israel all the land which he gave unto their fathers." If he gave the land first to Abraham, secondly to Jacob, and then to Israel; why could he not give the Sabbath to the parties in the desert, after he had given it in Eden? Did Nehemiah say that Jehovah made known his Sabbaths to Israel? So the Lord, by Ezekiel, says, "I will make my holy name known in the midst of Israel." (Ez. xxxix. 7.) Are we to understand before this promise should be fulfilled, Israel should never have known his holy name? Esther prayed of the king that her life might be given her at her petition. Did she begin to live, and move, and exist, when her desire was granted? Did God give the Sabbath? Nehemiah says, "Thou gavest also thy good Spirit." The Sabbath has been named in the previous verses, and where the Sabbath is numbered in the catalogue of blessings, the inspired writer says, "Thou gavest also thy good Spirit." Had the Spirit never been given before? Had the world been left without Divine influence till Moses led the people into the desert? No. Man always needed the Divine donation. The light of heaven was always needed to cheer his eyes, and render the world his fit habitation—the air of heaven was always necessary to inflate his lungs, and purify his blood—the fountain stream was always needed to slake his thirst—and the Sabbath was always needed as a standing means of elevating his soul towards God. The light, the air, the water, and the Subbath, were made for man. But we need not multiply these kind of proofs; the record furnishes its explanation. "Moreover," says the Lord, "I gave them my Sabbaths to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them." (Ez. xx. 12.) He does not say that the Sabbath was given them in the wilderness absolutely, but a sign of a certain between him and them. So does he use the beautiful bow that sometimes span our heavens, and it shall be a token of a covenant between me and the earth." Had it never spanned the antideluvian heavens? Had the drops of those early clouds no refractive power? And why may he not as well give an already existing Sabbath for a sign, as set an already existing bow for a token?

Thirdly, there is the argument grounded on the long continued silence of the early scriptures respecting the Sabbath.

The Sabbath is brought under our notice in the 2d chapter of Genesis, and is not again expressly mentioned till the sojourn of the children of Israel in the desert. "If," it is asked, "the Sabbath had been instituted at the time of the creation, is it likely that there should be no mention of it for a period of about 2500 years?" Very likely, we answer. The Bible gives but a bare outline of early history. As we emerge from the garden of Eden, the history of nearly 2000 years is given in five or six short chapters. Two leaves in a pocket bible will conduct the reader from the expulsion of Adam out of Eden to the building of the tower of Babel. Would the early saints be likely to keep up their faith without sacrifice? Yet, from the time of Abel till the opening of the new world, the altar does not appear in our view. Could the fathers maintain their piety without prayer? Yet, with the exception of him who wrestled with the angel, the five books of Moses scarcely show us a man on his knees.

And let it not be supposed that because we have no express mention of the Sabbath, that the period referred to gives no evidence on the subject. There is allusive testimony which indicates, in that early time, the presence of this day, orbed by the Sun of Righteousness. The existing week arrangement tells us that the septenary division of Eden was not forgotton. "Noah sent forth a dove from the ark, and she returned unto him. And he stayed yet other seven days, and again he sent forth the dove. And he stayed yet other seven days, and sent forth the dove, which returned not again to him." (Gen. viii.) When Leah was imposed upon Jacob in the place of Rachel, to pacify him, his uncle said, "Fulfill her week, and we will give thee this (Rachel) also. And Jacob did so, and fulfilled her week." Now, what is a week? Whence this septenary division? The queen of heaven will point out the division of our time into months (moon-ths.) The glorious orb that comes forth like a giant to run a race, will make our day and mark out our year, but which of the stars, that are "for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and for years," will give us a week arrangement?

And who suggested this arbitrary arrangement to the nations that never heard of Moses and the prophets? Almost universally it has prevailed amongst them. "The division of the year into months is very old, and almost universal; but the period of seven days is by far the more permanent division of time, and the most ancient monument of astronomical knowledge was used by the Brahmins in India, with the same denomination employed by us, and was alike found in the calendars of the Jews, Egyptians, Arabs and Assyrians. It has survived the fall of empires, and has existed amongst all successive generations."

Homer, Hesiod, and a number of the early fathers, unite in telling us that the Greeks, Romans, Persians, Phœnicians, &c., esteemed the seventh day sacred; and one of them tells us it was a festival common to the world. Whence did they obtain this custom? Did they gather it from the books of the Jews? The sacred writings were little known till about the time of the Babylonish captivity. Some of these writers had lived before that time, and drew upon previous ages for their historic lore. Rather, had it not come down to them from the ark of Noah, and the plains of Shinar?

The Sabbath was not instituted in the desert of Sin. It was made for man the day after man was made. The first morn that opened upon him wakened him to worship; and as his morning orisons broke from his lips, God hearkened to the first Sabbath praise that rose from his new-made world. It was given to the father of men, that he might hand it down to all succeeding generations, the birth-right of his whole family, a boon fitted to bless man through all the changes he might experience.

Thus, Sirs, I have endeavored to show that the Sabbath is part of that code which is moral, and therefore remaineth—that if it were only a positive institution, seeing it belongs to all people, the observance of it is a matter of moral obligation through all time. I have not entered upon the argument for the change of day, because I think it distinct from this, and secondary in importance. My conclusion is, that a seventh portion of man's time is required for the high purposes indicated. That time may be spent in the worship of Paradise, where creation is the bible, and the Father of the universe is the object of adoration. It may be devoted to the service of God as he dwells between the cherubim, and listens to the silent eloquence of him who with solemn tread approaches the mercy-seat, to sprinkle the blood, and offer prayer for the congregation without. It may be spent upon the spectacle that graces, and yet disgraces, Calvary, or in celebrating the victory that spoiled death and the grave. It may take the name of Sabbath, or Sunday, or Lord's-day. But there it stands, a sanctified part of man's allotted term, a period rich with the dew of God's blessing. It may be that, in the wisdom of God, first the seventh, and then the first day of the week, shall be the appointed time. It may be that a Christian shall pass from the north to the south—that he may live in every degree of latitude, and commence his Sabbath through every hour of which his day is composed—what is the seventh day in one locality, may be the sixth in the second, and the first in the third; yet while he takes his day of gladness with him, he has one seventh portion of his time devoted to his soul and his God.

Let the Christian rejoice in his gospel privileges; let him stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made him free; but for his own sake, for his family's sake, for the world's sake, let him not surrender the day of rest and blessing. I am, dear Sirs, yours, &c.,

BENJ. CHAS. YOUNG.

CROSS-BEARING.—It is easier to do great things than to bear little ones. There are more heroes than saints in the world. St. Peter was not afraid of the soldiers in the garden, but he was ashamed of his master in the Judgment Hall. To bear disgrace, and shame, and scorn, to stand quiet under suspicions that drive one out of society, for the sake of a principle which nobody believes or respects—this is cross-bearing.

BLESSED ARE THEY THAT MOURN.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

Oh! deem not they are blest alone
 Whose lives a peaceful tenor keep;
The Power who pities man has shown
 A blessing for the eyes that weep.

The light of smiles shall fill again
 The lid that overflows with tears;
And weary hours of woe and pain
 Are promises of happy years.

There is a day of suny rest
 For every dark and troubled night;
And grief may bide, an evening guest,
 But joy shall come with early light.

And thou, who o'er thy friend's low bier
 Sheddest the bitter drops like rain,
Hope that a happier, brighter shore
 Will give him to thy arms again.

Nor let the good man's trust depart,
 Though life its common gift deny,
Though pierced and broken be his heart,
 And spurned of men he goes to die.

For God has marked each sorrowing day,
 And numbered every secret tear;
And heaven's long age of bliss shall pay
 For all its children suffer here.

THE DARK CLOUD WITH SILVER LINING.

"And so you have been in trouble, John," said I. "It is a long time now since I was in this part of the country. When I was here last your wife was alive, but even then she seemed to me to be ready for glory."

"I humbly believe she was, sir, and since then, as a shock of corn fully ripe, she has been gathered into God's garner. It was not a light affliction to lose her, after living with her five and forty years; but there is a time to die as well as a time to live; and, as she said, God's time is the best time."

"True, John, and when we think otherwise we think wrong. Was she patient in her illness?"

"Patient as a lamb, sir. 'It is not for the like of us,' said she, 'to be murmurers in the midst of our mercies. There is a cloud around me, John, but, blessed be God, dark as it is, it has a silver lining.'"

"What did she mean by that, John?"

"I will tell you, sir. The last time we walked out together, poor soul! she hung heavy enough on my arm, and made but a sad walk of it; we went to the end of the orchard just as the sun was setting. There was a cloud over the sun, black enough, but its edges looked as bright as silver. As we came through the orchard we talked of the sun being in the cloud, and my poor wife, as she turned round to look at it once more, said, 'When God is in it, John, the darkest cloud is sure to have a silver lining.'"

"I understand now. She meant to say, then, that God was in the cloud around her?"

"She did, sir, and surely he was there too, or she never would have demeaned herself so meekly. When she spoke of the cloud with the silver lining, it was only another way of saying, 'The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?' Ps. 27: 1. Many of us are glib enough with our tongues, and have texts of Scripture ready on all occasions, but my poor Mary had them in her heart. She had always the advantage over me in times of trouble, sir; for while I was fuming and fretting, she could lie quiet in God's hands, her soul magnifying the Lord, and her spirit rejoicing in God her Saviour."

"You appear to like to talk of her."

"Why, yes, sir; and sometimes I am afraid that I ease my own heart at the expense of other people, tiring them in listening to me; but when I talk of her, it seems as if we were nearer together."

"No doubt it does. It was no earthly teacher, John, that taught her to lie quiet in God's hands. Such an especial mercy comes only from Him who taught David the same lesson. You remember his words, 'Surely I have behaved and quieted myself as a child that is weaned of its mother; my soul is even as a weaned child.' Ps. 131: 2."

"I do, sir; and wish that I could say them oftener than I can, with my heart. You will, perhaps, smile at me, sir, when I tell you that what my poor wife said about the cloud and the silver lining has given a new value to my Bible."

"In what way, John? In what way?"

"In this way, sir; it has led me to ponder more in my heart the heavy troubles and merciful deliverances of God's People. Look at Abraham—to think of a man being called on to offer up his own son, when heaven and earth might be supposed to cry out against such a deed. Why, the cloud that hung over him was black as ink, and yet what a beautiful lining it had after all! The trial of Abraham's faith was perfected, the faithfulness of the Lord made clear, and the promise that he had given to his servant abundantly fulfilled."

"You apply this matter well, John."

"Again, sir, when Joseph was cast into the pit, there seemed little hope for him, nor was his case much mended when he was sold to the Ishmaelites; but when once Potipher had put him in prison, it appeared to be all over with him. He was, however, the Lord's servant, and the Lord delivered him, and blessed him; so that the silver lining was seen quite as plain as the dark cloud which had overshadowed him."

"Very true."

"I hope, sir, that you will not think I am talking faster than I ought, on this subject, but my heart is rather full of it. When we see David, with nothing but a sling and a few stones, about to fight with an armed giant; when we see Daniel in the lions's den, and Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego in the fiery furnace, the cloud appears so dark and threatening, that it is quite enough to alarm us; but the moment God is seen in the matter, the silver edge begins to appear; for God's servants are sure to have God's assistance."

"And I suppose, John, that you consider the servants of the Lord are quite as much under the Almighty's care as they were in old times?"

"Blessed be God, I do, sir; and here lies my comfort, that, sinners as we are, we may say the God of Abraham and Joseph, David and Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, is our God forever, and he will be our guide even unto death. Shadows may gather around us, sickness may come, and, sorrow and death may come; but to a Christian man the hope of eternal life through Him that suffered upon the cross, is the true silver to every cloud."

"You are right, John—you are right; and I trust this little conversation will do me good; for, like many others, I am more given to lament over my trials, than to rejoice over my mercies. This ought not to be, for as God's promises are all yea and amen in Jesus Christ, and as it is certain that all things work together for good to them that love God, so afflictions betide, it becomes every follower of the Redeemer, with a grateful heart, to look less and less at the dark cloud, and more at the silver lining."

PREACHING.

A writer in the Presbyterian Herald, speaking of the low state of Zion, gives the following as one of the causes:—

"One cause of the low state of piety in our churches is the style of preaching—the manner of delivering the messages of God to the souls of men. It is not that of Nettleton, Bull, John Breckenridge and Rice. The address is now made to the intellect, the taste, the fancy, while no strong, pointed, pungent, warm, tender, and awakening appeal is made to the consciences and hearts of men. Ministers move in hampers, yea, are manacled with paper fetters, servilely tied to written discourses. My brother, am I wrong? am I prejudiced? am I doing any injustice? I would not. But honestly, though criminating myself as much as others, there is great fault in this matter, not only here, but everywhere. We do not so address the people as to make them feel that we are charged with a message from God to their souls—as if we deeply felt the nearness, the vitality and unutterable importance of the verities of the eternal world, whither we are all going each beating pulse—as if we felt that men were really dead in sin, and the gospel of Christ, without we know they must perish forever. Hear the voice of one now sainted many years, but who still lives and speaks effectively:—'I seldom come out of the pulpit but my conscience smiteth me. It accuseth me not so much for want of ornaments and elegancy, not for letting fall an unhandsome word; but it asketh me, How couldst thou preach of heaven and hell in such a careless, sleepy manner? Dost thou believe what thou sayest? Art thou in earnest or jest? How canst thou tell people that sin is such a thing, and so much misery is upon them and before them, and be no more affected with it?' O, Lord! save us from the plague of hard-heartedness and infidelity, or how shall we be fit instruments of saving others.

A POOR JUDGE OF PREACHING.

The following anecdote is related of Gen. Jackson, while he was President of the United States. It is a good story, if not true:—

In the winter of 1832, President Jackson conferred the mission to Russia upon a justly distinguished son of Pennsylvania. Before the newly appointed minister, however, had departed on his mission, he deemed it due to the President to ask his counsel in reference to the selection of a Secretary of legation. The President declined all interference, and remarked to the minister, that the United States Government would hold him responsible for the manner in which he discharged his duties, and that he would consequently be at liberty to choose his own Secretary.

The minister returned his respectful acknowledgments, but before taking a final leave, sought his especial advice in regard to a young gentleman then in the service of the State Department, and who was highly recommended by the (then) Secretary. Gen. Jackson promptly said, "I advise you, sir, not to take that man, he is not a good judge of preaching." The minister seemed puzzled, and observed that the objection needed explanation.

"I am able to give it," said the old hero, and he thus continued: "On last Sabbath morning, I attended divine service in the Methodist Episcopal church in this city. There I listened to a soul-inspiring sermon by Professor Durbin, of Carlisle, one of the ablest pulpit orators in America. Seated in a pew near me, I observed this identical young man, apparently an attentive listener. On the day following, he came into his chamber on public business, when I had the curiosity to ask his opinion of the sermon and the preacher.

"And what think you, sir, the young upstart, with consummate assurance, pronounced that sermon all froth, and Professor Durbin a humbug. I took the liberty of saying to him—'My young man, you are a humbug yourself, and don't know it.' And now," continued the venerable old man, his eye lighted up with intense animation, "rest assured, my dear, sir, that a man who is not a better judge of preaching than that, is wholly unfit to be your companion. And besides," he added, "if he were the prodigy the Secretary of States represents him to be, he would be less anxious to confer his service upon you—he would rather be anxious to retain them himself." The President's advice was of course followed by the ambassador, and the young man's subsequent career of vice and folly proved that the General's estimate of his character, albeit founded upon a common-place incident, was substantially correct.

THE JUG WITH THE BOTTOM OUT.—In one of Dr. Tyng's travels he met with an emigrant journeying with his family to the fertile regions beyond the Mississippi. He had all his worldly goods packed on wagons, and on one wagon there hung a huge jug with the bottom knocked out. He asked him why he carried that with him. "Why," said he, "that's my Taylor jug." "And what is a Taylor jug?" asked my friend. "Why," said he, "I had a son with General Taylor's army in Mexico, and the old General always told him to carry his whiskey jug with a hole in the bottom; and since that I have carried my jug as you see it; and I find it is the best invention I ever met with."

CONVERSION FROM POPERY IN FRANCE.

Dr. Merle d'Aubigne, in his late address in London, gave some facts illustrating Protestant advance in France. Conversions from Popery to Protestantism are more numerous in that country, he said, than perversions from Protestantism to Popery in England.

A certain village had gone over en masse from Romanism to Protestantism; this was nearly ten years ago. A neighboring village some time afterwards sent a request for a Protestant pastor, signed by no fewer than eighty fathers of families, setting forth that they would no longer have any thing to do with the Pope or his priests. They wanted to hear the true gospel. A young man went and preached in a barn, when the magistrate threatened to imprison him, and he left the place. Some time after this, he was invited back again, and returned. He was now brought before the magistrate and tried. He pleaded that, according to the Constitution of the French Republic, every Frenchman had a right to propagate and hold his own religious opinions. The result was favorable to our friend, and the court decided that the meeting was not a political or social one, but that its character was purely religious, and that the minister must be free to preach to all people who would go to hear him. Since I have been in London, I have received a letter from that neighborhood, showing the importance of this result because in several of the neighboring and many other parishes there were numbers waiting to decide what course they should adopt, until after the question had been settled in this court. They will now, in very many cases, take pastors of the Protestant religion. But these general conversions are not always very spiritual ones. Nevertheless, the people are brought to hear and read the Word of God. They have good teachers, and the gospel is communicated to them, whereby they may obtain a saving knowledge of the truth. But the people of the village before alluded to say that Protestantism has already effected a marvelous change in that place during the last ten years. At that time it was the worst part in the entire neighborhood, and now there is a marked superiority. Such is the moral influence of Protestantism.

THE PURE IN HEART.

A few years ago, a young man in a neighboring university, had just been licensed to preach. He had intended to preach that system which denies the doctrine of depravity and teaches the purity of human nature. He had prepared his paper and pen to write his first sermon, and written the text: "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God." He began to ponder upon his text, and the question arose, who are the pure in heart? Am I pure in heart? The more he thought on the question, the more he was troubled. He had an engagement to preach the sermon for which he had selected the text. But when he looked into his heart, and reviewed his past life, he saw nothing except pollution and defilement. He was so distressed, that he could not write his sermon, and was obliged to send a note excusing himself from his engagement. He then for the first time began to cry, "God, be merciful to me a sinner." He deeply felt the necessity of an atoning Saviour, whose blood could cleanse from sin. In short a time, he experienced the efficacy of atoning blood. He could now answer the question, Who are the pure in heart? Not those who are born pure—Not those who have washed themselves clean. But those who are made such by "the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost." He now hungered and thirsted after righteousness, and prayed continually for the purity of heart. He preached the faith which he once denyed. This fact should lead every reader to inquire, Am I pure in heart? Do I cry continually, "Create within me a clean heart, Oh God: and renew a right spirit within me."

A BEGGAR'S LABORS.

Rev. Mr. Pilatte, of Paris, in a recent address, illustrated the use and showed the value of tracts by the following anecdote:—"A poor old beggar, such as you have not in this country, but unfortunately we have many in France, one day met one of our evangelists, and asked him, 'Have I not seen you? Did you not preach at such a place, and afterwards distribute little books?' The evangelist replied that he did. The beggar then pulled out of his pocket a little pamphlet, dirty and worn, entitled, 'God is Love,' and exclaimed how happy he was to meet the man who gave him that book. Said he, 'I am a poor beggar-man, and there are many families who give me bread to eat, and I have long wished to show my gratitude; but what could I do? I am unable to work and earn any thing at all. But when I got this little book and read it all through, it made my heart so full of happiness, that I thought, Now I can do somthing to show my gratitude to my kind friends; I can read this little book to them; and if it shall make them as happy as it makes me, it will pay them for all their charity.' And so this poor man had gone round to all those places where he was accustomed to receive charity, and had read every where his little book, 'God is Love;' and afterwards a church was gathered in that neighborhood as the fruits of the poor beggar's labors."

The Savannah News gives an account of the expulsion from Warren Co., in that State, of Mr. Nathan B. Watson, accused of being an Abolitionist.

RELIGION AND POLITICS—DUTY OF MINISTERS.

Under the idea that politics and religion have nothing to do with each other, it is often urged that ministers of the gospel should not meddle with the former. The sacredness of their calling, it is said, should keep them entirely aloof from the great questions which agitate the councils of the nation, and nothing but the care of souls should occupy their attention.

To this doctrine we beg leave to take exception. What are good politics but the application of the great principles of the moral law to the social system? Common party politics may be something else, it is true; and it is a deplorable fact, that righteousness, and truth, and equity, have very little connection with them. But politics, in the true meaning of the term—such politics as look to the preservation of the safety, peace and prosperity of a nation—are nothing else than the science of applying the great principles of the divine law to the whole community. Now, if ministers of the gospel have nothing to do with this kind of science, we have strangely misunderstood their calling.

The divine law says, "Thou shalt not steal." That a minister should know theft and robbery to be common crimes in his neighborhood, and withal have reason to believe that many of his hearers were guilty, and yet not lift up his voice as a reprover of them, would be such a palpable exhibition of unfaithfulness, that every honest man would cry out, Shame! But suppose it should be proposed to render some forms of theft legal. Suppose a bill were pending before the Legislature to render that form of it known as man-stealing lawful. And suppose there is some danger that the bill will pass. It has now become a question of politics. The law-makers are losing sight of every principle of morality involved in the case, and making it a mere question of expediency. Shall the minister now hold his peace? Shall the doctrine that a minister has no business to concern himself in politics, be a gag to his mouth? Common sense repudiates the idea.

We admit that it is beneath a minister's calling to descend to the level of brawling demagogues, going about the country to wrangle and dispute upon what may be regarded as merely the secular bearings of a question; as, for instance, Whether a National Bank would promote the interests of the country? or, Whether it is politic or constitutional to protect manufactures by a tariff? and multitudes of similar questions, which make up the most of the politics of the day. But there are some questions, which involve the principles of morality to such an extent that no minister can keep silence but at the risk of proving recreant to his duty. Upon such questions ministers should thoroughly prepare themselves, and be ready to cast the whole weight of their influence on the side of righteousness. We see no reason why such questions should not be made the theme of pulpit discourses, to a certain extent. The Gospel of the Son of God is a Gospel which calls to the practice of every form of righteousness, in every department of life. Its voice is to kings and to all that are in authority, as well as to those holding the most obscure stations. And while to the latter it preaches submission, and comforts them with the assurance that after they have suffered a while they shall be perfected in happiness, its voice to the former is no less emphatic, that they do justly, love mercy, break every yoke, let the oppressed go free. Political questions involving these points may, therefore, very properly be made the theme of pulpit discourse, so far as may be necessary to influence the hearers to what is right in the premises. For a minister, who does not carefully aim to make his hearers do what is just and right, in their political as well as in their private relations, does not half discharge his duty.

The rule which would exclude a minister of the Gospel from interference with political questions entirely, would narrow the range of his duties till he had become little more than an antitype of the ancient Scribe or Pharisee. A physician, in the practice of his profession, might perpetrate the most revolting crimes; he might outrage every rule of decency in his professional intercourse with the other sex; he might exercise an influence most destructive of moral purity; and the minister might be fully aware that it was so. But if he would raise his voice in protest against such wickedness, the whole medical fraternity take it into their heads that religion has nothing to do with the practice of medicine, and that a minister would better not interfere in such matters. Next, a merchant, in the prosecution of his calling, practices fraud upon his customers. The minister knows it, to be sure, but it is a species of dishonesty which the mercantile community have agreed among themselves to uphold, and if the minister hint his convictions that it is not according to the uprightness of the gospel, he is told that he knows nothing about 'business,' and that he would better confine himself to the preaching of the gospel. Now these cases are precisely on a par with those political questions, in which, if a minister of the gospel concern himself, it is considered a meddlesome intrusiveness. And so it might go on, till there was not a department of society left to which the reproofs and admonitions of the ministry were applicable.

Is it not too evident to require proof, that wherever God's law is applicable to human conduct, there is the minister's duty? And who will have the assurance to say, that it is not applicable to human conduct at all times, and under all possible circumstances? Who will say there is a single moment of one's existence when it does not hold him under obligation? It makes its demands upon the child at school, upon the youth at his trade, upon the merchant at his counter, upon the sailor on shipboard, upon the judge as he sits upon the bench, upon the legislator at his desk, upon the soldier in the army, upon the slave at his toil, upon the President in his chair, upon the King on his throne; and it makes its demand on them at all times, through every moment of their existence. With all these classes of persons, therefore, the ministry is concerned; and whenever any of them, in the prosecution of their business, shall presume to trample upon moral principle, then is the time for the herald of Christ to lift up his voice, no matter what may be the nature of the question which brings that wanton disregard of principle to view.

Sunday Trains—Regium Donum—Jewish Disabilities Bill—Papal Aggression Bill—Cardinal Wiseman—Count Guicciardini—State of Rome—The Irvingites.

GLASGOW, July 25th, 1851.

All the principal English Railways are continuing to run cheap Sunday Trains; and on Sunday last, it is stated, a passenger train of between 30 and 40 carriages passed Falkirk during the afternoon service, upon even the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway. As this Company discontinued Sunday trains long ago, this excited attention and led to inquiry. Those in charge replied, "It is a work of necessity." The necessity, we presume, was, that immense numbers having been at Glasgow Fair, and desirous of now returning to Edinburgh, a train was requisite to enable them to accomplish their purpose. But the "necessity" they surely occasioned for themselves.

It is only the English "Regium Donum," (amounting to about £6,000,) that the present Government intimate they will discontinue from the Estimates, if in office next year. It is a grant which has given great dissatisfaction to voluntaries, who object to all government aid to the church; and being secretly distributed by a committee of Dissenters, doubt has often been expressed whether there was not partiality shown in their discharge of this duty. It is, however, highly probable that, small as the amount may have been which some of the recipients obtained, (and no one received any proportion two years in succession,) many poor pastors have been benefited thereby in their need.

The Jewish Disabilities Bill has been again rejected in the House of Lords, for the fifth time; and Lord John Russell has intimated his intention of re-introducing it next Session. Mr. Salomon, the lately elected member for Greenwich, made repeated attempts to keep his place in the House of Commons; and before being ordered by the Speaker to withdraw, had actually voted three times. For this, proceedings are being instituted against him. Baron Rothschild called a meeting of his constituents, which was held yesterday in the London Tavern, at which the Baron was requested to retain his sent, and resolutions were adopted calling on Government to aid them in securing the services of the representative of their choice, and requesting provincial constituencies to support the Baron and Mr. Salomon, who was present and took part in the proceedings. With our convictions of the intimations of the "sure word of prophecy" pointing to Israel's speedy return to the land of their fathers, we feel little interest in the result of the continued contest on this point, between the Lords and Commons; but there is little reason to doubt that there are already members of both, in whose mouths an oath "on the true faith of a Christian" acquires no additional solemnity.

In the House of Lords, the second reading of the Ecclesiastical Titles Assumption Bill, (as that for repelling the Papal Aggression is called,) was passed, in the beginning of the week, after two days' discussion, by a majority of 265 against 38. There have been serious riots at Liverpool and Greenock, arising out of this act of the Papal hierarchy. In both places, the number of Irish immigrant supporters of the enslaving superstition is great, and repeated previous skirmishes had led both the Papal party and those opposed to them, (for I am not disposed to speak of rioters in such a case as "Protestants,") to put forth all their strength and enmity. The vituperations of a person named John Orr enraged the Papists so that they attempted to hustle him over the Quay when he was preaching. Orr is a native of Greenock, and is or was an Evangelist in the Irvingite Church, and although he seems of unsound mind, and practices great extravagances, the Scotch ship-builders mustered for his protection, and in the conflicts which ensued the peace of the town was much disturbed for several days, and the aid of the military required.

Cardinal Wiseman, as the Pope calls him, did attend the House of Commons Committee on Mortmain to which he was summoned. When questioned, however, on certain points relative to Papal bequests, he wholly refused to give evidence, on the ground that the Bill now before Parliament, being retrospective, he might incur its penalties by his statements. He was not therefore pressed farther on the point.

The Scottish Reformation Society memorialized the British Government, calling attention to the case of Count Guicciardini, who was arrested, along with some others, for reading the Bible. The Society begged that Government might use their influence to obtain their release, and for impressing on foreign powers the duty of granting religious liberty to their subjects. My cousin, the Rev. Dr. James Begg, Edinburgh, has received, as Chairman, a reply from Lord Palmerston, the Foreign Secretary, intimating concurrence in the sentiments of the Memorial, and their acting usually in the spirit of it, so far as that can be done without interfering with the rights of other nations. The Count and his friends, it is added, have been banished for six months from Tuscany, with liberty to choose their place of exile.

The state of Rome itself is very far from satisfactory to the Papal Chief, who seems to be providing the means for meditated escape. Besides the recent assassination of the Chancellor of the Tribunal of Imola, others of less note are reported; while it is farther stated, that the keeper of the Vatican Library has committed suicide. The state of irritation between the Papal subjects and the French troops seems on the increase. Yet it is in such circumstances that a letter of his Unholiness, offering a Jubilee to such as contribute to the erection of a grand Cathedral in a principal street in London, has been published. The plenary indulgences seem to be highly prized some where, and it is said that the funds are so far contributed that a site in a new street has been purchased, and that the foundation is soon to be laid.

In this connection, I may mention that the Irvingites, who have long imitated very closely Popish "mummeries," also propose to erect in London a magnificent building, 210 feet long, and to accommodate 2,000 persons. This will probably be a matter of greater wonder than the Popish Cathedral, considering the insignificance of the numbers of the sect throughout the country. But although we may marvel at it as a folly, we have no reason to doubt that if determined upon it will be carried out. With the banker, Henry Drummond, Esq., M. P., as one of their twelve apostles, and a considerable proportion of wealthy persons among their members, the tithe, which they exact, should yield no inconsiderable sum to be devoted to their purposes.

In regard to the Crystal Palace, the question now is whether it shall be retained, and fitted for a winter garden, which the receipts would enable the Commissioners to do. For the citizens of London, such a place of pleasant exercise could not but be very desirable; and if it could be preserved at a moderate expense, this might be very desirable. The Town Council of Glasgow, yesterday, voted unanimously to petition Parliament for its retention. The public desire of this seems decided, and it is probable their wish will be gratified. Yet we are not without misgivings, that the effect of its primary purpose upon the business of the nation may occasion its being pointed to hereafter as The Nation's Folly.

THE UNIVERSAL PEACE CONGRESS.

The Fourth Annual Congress of the friends of Universal Peace was held in Exeter Hall, London, on the 22d, 23d, and 24th days of July. The time was most favorable, and the place most accessible. The number of delegates in attendance is said to have been between eight and nine hundred, of whom about forty were from America. They represented a great variety of "professions or trades," such as merchants, millers, teachers, tanners, editors, authors, booksellers, jewellers, preachers, &c. Sir David Brewster presided. Among the speakers were Mr. Cobden, Emile Girardin the editor of "La Presse," Samuel Gurney, Joseph Sturge, Edward Miall, M. Cormenin the French statesman, Mr. Hindley of the British Parliament, M. Bouret of the French Chamber of Deputies, M. Avignon, Elihu Burritt, J. S. Buckingham, and Dr. Schertzer. The subjects discussed will be learned from the following series of resolutions, which were adopted by nearly unanimous votes:—

The Congress of the friends of Universal Peace, assembled in London July 22, 23, and 24, 1851, considering that recourse to arms for the settlement of international disputes, is a custom condemned alike by Religion, Morality, Reason, and Humanity, and believing that it is useful and necessary frequently to direct the attention both of Governments and Peoples to the evils of the War System, and the desirableness and practicability of maintaining Permanent International Peace, resolves:

1. That it is the special and solemn duty of all Ministers of Religion, Instructors of Youth, and Conductors of the Public Press, to employ their great influence in the diffusion of pacific principles and sentiments, and in eradicating from the minds of men those hereditary animosities, and political and commercial jealousies, which have been so often the cause of disastrous Wars.

2. That as an appeal to the sword can settle no question, on any principle of equity and right, it is the duty of Governments to refer to the decision of competent and impartial Arbitrators such differences arising between them as cannot be otherwise amicably adjusted.

3. That the Standing Armament with which the Governments of Europe menace each other, amid professions of mutual friendship and confidence, being a prolific source of social immorality, financial embarrassment, and national suffering, while they excite constant disquietude and irritation among the nations, this Congress would earnestly urge upon the Governments the imperative necessity of entering upon a system of International Disarmament.

4. This Congress, regarding the system of negotiating Loans for the prosecution of War, or the maintenance of warlike armaments, as immoral in principle and disastrous in operation, renews its emphatic condemnation of all such Loans.

5. This Congress, believing that the intervention, by threatened or actual violence, of one country in the internal politics of another, is a frequent cause of bitter and desolating wars, maintains that the right of every State to regulate its own affairs should be held absolute and inviolate.

6. This Congress recommends all the friends of Peace to prepare public opinion, in their respective countries, with a view to the formation of an authoritative Code of International Law.

7. This Congress expresses its strong abhorrence of the system of aggression and violence practiced by so-called civilized nations upon aboriginal and feeble tribes, as leading to incessant and exterminating wars, eminently unfavorable to the true progress of religion, civilization and commerce.

8. This Congress, convinced that whatever brings the nations of the earth together in intimate and friendly intercourse must tend to the establishment of Peace, by removing misapprehensions and prejudices, and inspiring mutual respect, hails with unqualified satisfaction the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations, as eminently calculated to promote that end.

9. That the Members of Peace Societies, in all Constitutional Countries, be recommended to use their influence to return to their respective Parliaments, representatives who are friends of Peace, and who will be prepared to support, by their votes, measures for the diminution of the number of men employed in, and the amount of money expended for, War purposes.

N. Y. STATE TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

We took passage en route for Dunkirk, Buffalo, the Teachers' Convention, and places too numerous to mention, from one of the railroad stations situated upon the elevated plateau or table land, where, by two or three hours' ride, you dip into the three vallies of the Delaware, St. Lawrence, and Mississippi. It is an elevated region, fanned by pure breezes that sweep over these mountain regions, free from the malaria of low flat districts. We passed along through a country rich in picturesque scenery, and although at the present time rather woody, yet it is not, as sometimes slanderously reported, a land of leeks—a land where the hard-pan, in its aerial flights, soars to the third and fourth rails of their snake fences—where, as Milton represents Scandinavia, it is so cold that the sap oozing from the ends of their burning fire brands freezes ere it reaches the ashes, and the people have to import their corn a thousand miles; but it is destined ere long to be a rich farming country. This portion of New York State has heretofore labored under great disadvantages for want of a ready communication for importing and exporting; but by the completion of the New York and Erie Railroad it has suddenly been transferred from the rear to the front ranks of progress. If the inhabitants do not become dizzy by the sudden transition, but will coolly take the advantage by the foretop, there is nothing to hinder their marching directly on to prosperity. They are located on a road that is destined to continue, as it has commenced, the great highway of the limitless West. It will be the great jugular vein, or, more properly, a compound of jugular and aorta, through which shall rush back and forth the heart streams of the nation.

As you come into the valley of the Allegany River, you find here a few natives of the soil, still lingering upon their narrow reservation along the banks of this stream. Their melancholy, dejected looks, tell us that their chief business here is to watch over the graves of their forefathers, while most of their brethren have turned with reluctant steps towards the setting sun, emblematic in its decline of the Indian's destiny. Their half-wondering, half-sorrowful gaze at the swiftly-passing train, seem to say, "Those steeds were never driven by our forefathers." Each snort of the iron steeds echoing through these vallies, is a funereal knell of the Indian's destiny.

As you pass from the valley of the Allegany, the mountain region gradually subsides into the level plain of the Great Lakes and the Western States. Dunkirk is thronged with travelers, and overrun with business. It seems to have been reposing very quietly upon the shore of the lake until unexpectedly aroused by the sudden rush of both east and west. From Dunkirk to Buffalo you have a very pleasant trip along the eastern shore of the lake, provided always that the weather is calm. Buffalo rises very prettily from the lake, seeming, as you approach her, to sit like a swan upon the waters. The Buffalonians, however, have to live a life of continual warfare—shallow, fitful Lake Erie keeping them constantly employed in rebuilding piers, dredging harbors, and repairing other devastations of her capricious moments. But we are falling into a very common fault of writers and speakers, that of spending most of their time and strength in their prefatory remarks. Let us turn to the subject indicated in the caption to this article.

—The New York State Teachers' Association met at Buffalo, at 10 o'clock A. M., August 6, pursuant to adjournment. The session was held in the Washington Street Baptist Church. The Association being called to order, and prayer being offered, the President, Mr. J. W. Bulkley of Albany, read his Annual Address, in which he succinctly reviewed some of the more important inventions and discoveries of the last half century, the rise and progress of various innovations and reforms in the political, intellectual, and moral world, together with a history of the Association, its future prospects, and the future prospects of the educational cause generally.

In the afternoon, Mr. Kellogg, of New York, presented a report upon the subject of the Analytical and Synthetical Methods of Teaching, in which was discussed the questions, What is the true logical definition of analysis and synthesis? Which is the most natural and proper method of instruction? What is the effect produced upon the mind by these methods? The lecture was quite learned, theoretical, and abstract. It occasioned considerable discussion—arising mostly, as most discussions in the three worlds of politics, science and religion generally arise—from difference, misconstruction and misapplication in the definition of terms.

In the evening, Rev. Mr. Hosmer, of Buffalo, delivered an address on the True Ideal of Teaching, in which he illustrated and enforced the proposition, that the true ideal is to prepare human beings to know God's laws and to obey them.

Mr. Hedges, of Newark, N. J., occupied the attention of the Association the first hour of the second day with a report on the subject of Incentives to Study and Good Behavior. It was a practical, common-sense discussion of the questions, How shall order be established? How shall scholars be classified? How shall misconduct be prevented? How shall offenders be punished? The report is worthy of being read by all teachers.

He was followed by Prof. Fellows, of Albany, with a report on Mrs. Willard's Theory of Respiration and Circulation. Her theory is that the heat generated in the lungs by the unition of carbon and oxygen, is the motive power of the circulation of the blood. The blood is expanded in the lungs by heat, and condensed in the capillaries by cold. By this alternate expansion and contraction a constant circulation is kept up. The theory was quite ably defended by the report.

Dr. Lambert, of New York, then interested the audience with a lecture on Physiology. The main drift of his lecture was to show the importance of cultivating the sensational and emotional powers, and that the teacher should strive to introduce pleasant sensations, consequently pleasant emotions.

In the afternoon, Prof. Benedict, of Rochester, made a report on the subject of Mental and Moral Discipline, condemning all the new methods adopted by common schools, academies, and colleges, and going back to the landmarks of good old times.

Miss Radley, of Buffalo, read a Poem in the evening; subject, "A Word—its Influence."

Short reports were made from the delegates of the several States and from Canada. Delegates were appointed to the National Educational Convention, soon to be held in Cleveland. Interesting resolutions were introduced upon various subjects. The following gentlemen were elected officers for the ensuing year:—

N. P. STANTON, of Buffalo, President.
N. W. BENEDICT, of Rochester, 1st Vice President.
D. M. PITCHER, of Tioga, 2d Vice President.
A. R. WRIGHT, of Elmira, 3d Vice President.
E. L. ADAMS, of Albany, 4th Vice President.
N. McELLIGOTT, of New York, Cor. Secretary.
R. C. WILSON, of Nundy, Recording Secretary.
O. AREY, of Buffalo, Treasurer.

The Association adjourned to meet at Elmira on the first Wednesday in August, 1852.

ALLEGAN.

THE INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.—A letter from Horace Greeley, dated London, July 25, expresses his opinion that the Great Exhibition of the World's Industry will close about the last of October. It is proposed to set apart a week, towards the close, for admitting the poor of London at one penny each. "At first the attendance was almost entirely of Londoners; now it is mostly of strangers. Great numbers of French are in the Crystal Palace daily, and long trains of visitors are constantly arriving from every part of Great Britain. The receipts promise to average 10,000 per day for at least another month."

WEST INDIA EMANCIPATION.—The Anniversary of the emancipation of eight hundred thousand slaves of the British West India Islands, was celebrated in several New England towns on the 1st inst. At Worcester, Mass., there was a spirited meeting, presided over by Adin Ballou, and addressed by H. J. Bowditch, C. C. Burleigh, P. Pillsbury, W. L. Garrison, and Wendell Phillips. A similar meeting was held at New Bedford, which was addressed by several effective speakers.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—Certain merchants of the city of Liverpool recently petitioned the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to send a steam vessel to the Arctic Seas to search for Sir John Franklin. The Admiralty reply that, "feeling that every exertion for the general object in view has been made, they are of opinion that they cannot comply with this request, consistently with their sense of public duty and the responsibility in which further expeditions would involve them."

THE FREE MISSION SOCIETY.—The American Baptist says that a semi-annual meeting of the American Baptist Free Mission Society will be held with the Baptist church of Peterboro, commencing on the first Thursday in September (the 4th.) Elders Washington Kingsley of McGrawville, N. Y., and Geo. T. Post, of New Berlin, N. Y., are appointed to preach on the occasion. Mrs. Judd and Miss Howard, of the Haitien Mission, it is said, are expected to be present.

LEAVING OFF PRAYER.—A correspondent of the Christian Mirror publishes the painful fact that at the Marlboro' Hotel, Boston, he found but nine guests at the usual evening worship in the parlor, and only six in the morning, while there were sixty at table. At the Adams House he learned that worship in the parlor has been discontinued on account of the indifference of Christian guests.

GENERAL BAPTISTS OF ENGLAND.—The 82d anniversary of the Association of General Baptist Churches of the New Connection, was recently held at Derby. Two hundred ministers and representatives were present. The reports from the various churches showed a clear increase during the year of only 361. The total number of members is 18,638. A communication was received from the Triennial Conference of the Free-Will Baptists of America, denouncing slavery and the Fugitive Slave Law; to which a reply on behalf of the Association was voted. In the report on Foreign Missions it was stated that every branch of the Society's agency—the native ministry, educational establishments, &c.—is in a flourishing state. Some villages, erected on land lately jungle, are being formed. By means of the mission hundreds of Khund children have been rescued from sacrificial and barbarous butchery, and a translation of the Scriptures into the Khund language is now made. The Society's East Indian stations are in Orissa, where Juggernaut rears his head, and receives the polluted worship of degraded millions. The society has also a station at Ningpo, China, where a native convert, Si Sing Sang, a man of letters and influence, is engaged, in connection with two General Baptist missionaries, in dissuading his countrymen from ancestral worship [illegible]ther ancient superstition[illegible] China.

VALUE OF THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.—A writer in the Congregationalist replies to the arguments commonly urged against Theological Seminaries. He maintains that these Seminaries and Foreign Missions are the contemporaneous growth of the same Christian spirit, and that the circumstances of a seminary are far better adapted to create and foster a spirit of comprehensive benevolence than those of a pastor or private teacher. In support of his opinion that Theological Seminaries are indispensable for Foreign Missions, he says:—

"Nearly all the foreign missionaries that the Baptists have sent out, were educated at the two seminaries of Newton and Hamilton. Nearly all that the American Episcopal Church have commissioned to the heathen, are graduates of the seminary near Alexandria. Nearly all on the list of the American Board, were graduated at five or six seminaries. One tenth of all the graduates at Andover have been, or are, foreign missionaries, and considerable more than another tenth have been, or are, domestic missionaries."

CATHOLIC OR PROTESTANT.—In an oration delivered at the recent commencement of Hamilton College, Mr. W. E. Robinson raised the question whether it is correct to call this country Protestant. A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune gives the following statistics of communicants of the several denominations, to help in settling the question:—

Of Methodists,	1,215,069
Of Presbyterians,	594,083
Of Universalists,	325,000
Of Episcopalians,	67,550
Of Unitarians,	33,000
Of Baptists,	1,251,629
Of Friends or Quakers,	50,000
Total of Protestants,	3,500,329
Total of Catholics,	1,231,300
Protestant majority,	2,269,029

There are 23,000,000 of people in the United States. The Catholics claim 3,000,000, leaving 20,000,000 to all other denominations. It is as safe to say that 12,000,000 are truly Protestant, as to say that there are 3,000,000 of Catholics.

SINGULAR, IF TRUE.—It is said that a Court Martial was recently held at Fort Columbus, near New York, for the trial of a soldier, who is a Roman Catholic. The charge preferred against him was, that he refused to attend a Protestant place of worship. His name was James Duggan, and for this he was sentenced to forfeit to the United States $5 a month of his pay for six months, to spend two months in solitary confinement and on bread and water, the other months at hard labor, with ball and chain to his leg. This sentence, which was in part approved by Gen. Wool, came up for revision before the Secretary of War, Hon. C. M. Conrad, and was by him set aside.

—Since the above was in type, the following paragraph has appeared:—

"Gen. John E. Wool has published a reply in regard to the statement that he sanctioned the sentence of punishment of private James Duggan, of the Fourth Artillery, for refusing to attend a Protestant place of worship, he being a Catholic. The General says that the punishment inflicted was not on account of his religious scruples, but for refusing to apply to his commanding officer for permission to stay away from church, and for leaving his company without permission."

A SLAVE FOUND.—The following advertisement, from the Alabama Tribune of July 22, 1851, we copy "free gratis," to show how they do in Slave States:—

"Committed to the Jail of Baldwin County, on the 18th of July, 1851, by Patrick Byrne, Judge of Probate, a negro girl, a runaway slave, who calls her name Julia, and says she belongs to Henry A. Newnes, who resides in Baldwin Co. Said slave is about twelve years of age, four feet four inches high, badly scarified, apparently from the lash, and has bruises on the head not yet healed, dark complexion. Her owner is requested to come forward and prove property, pay cost and charges, and take her away, or she will be dealt with according to law in such cases made and provided.

WM. H. SPIVEY, Jailor.

THE SLAVE-TRADE.—An American officer, writing from the naval station on the south-west coast of Africa, to the Philadelphia Inquirer, says of the Slave-Trade:—

"When I was ordered to this station, I thought, like a great majority of persons, that the suppression of the slave-trade by cruisers was impossible, and I ridiculed the very idea. But eighteen months of cruising and observation have convinced me to the contrary. We are now about to leave the Coast for St. Helena, on our way to Porto Praya, with the gratifying knowledge that the slave-trade is at its lowest ebb—more completely broken up than it has ever before been."

European News.

The steamship Europa, with three days' later news from Europe, arrived at Boston on the 6th inst. When near Halifax she ran down and sunk an American fishing vessel, the schr. Florence, belonging to Massachusetts. All her crew, consisting of fifteen persons, were saved, except Joseph C. Snow.

In the British Parliament, nothing of much interest has transpired. The anti-Papal Bill, so called, after an attempt by Lord Monteagle to exclude Ireland from its operation, passed through Committee in the House of Lords, on the night of the 25th, and was to be read the third time the following week. The majority in its favor is large.

Much of the time of the Commons had been occupied in discussing the admission of Alderman Salamon, without coming to a decision.

In the City of London, Baron Rothschild attended a public meeting, at which it was resolved to petition the House of Commons to reconsider their vote against the Baron's admissibility.

A number of gentlemen, with Lord Ashburton at their head, have formed themselves into an Association, for the purpose of inducing the Government to which they belong to establish a uniform and low rate of postage on letters from all parts of the world.

The harvest of Ireland promises well. There is no truth in the report that the potato rot had appeared. The contradiction is given on the authority of a Liverpool gentleman, who has traveled through all Ulster and the greater part of Connaught.

The Commission named at Turin for the purpose of sending Piedmontese workmen to visit the Great London Exhibiton, has addressed a circular to all the mayors of the kingdom, inviting them to give their active support to the measure, and to promote subscriptions for the purpose.

The Stockholm journals state that Mlle. Jenny Lind has just purchased one of the largest estates in Sweden, that of Beckarshoerg, in the Province of Nykoping. These journals state that the last letters received by her friends in Sweden, contradict positively the reports lately published of her approaching marriage.

The journals of Christiana, (Norway,) of the 10th, state that a serious disturbance took place there on the previous night. Several thousand persons assembled on the Place de l'Hotel de Ville with the intention of breaking open the doors of the prison, and releasing some malefactors who were confined there. Just as they were commencing to break open the doors, some strong detachments of cavalry and infantry arrived and put the mob to flight, and a number were arrested.

The Observatore Romano states that on the 10th ult. another attempt at assassination took place at Rome, on the person of Signor Squaglia, connected with that paper. He received four stabs, but all without effect, a slight cut on the right hand being the only wound inflicted on him.

A letter from Rome, of the 14th, states that an attempt was made on the 11th to assassinate Monsignor Tizzani, Bishop of Terni, by blowing up the house he inhabited at Santa Maria Maggiore. Fortunately the incendiary missile, consisting of the nave of a wheel loaded with powder and grape-shot, which was to set fire to a quantity of combustible matter in the cellar, exploded before it reached its destination, and only caused some slight damage to the outer wall of the building.

Two Weeks Later from California.

The Empire City, from Chagres, arrived at New York on the 6th inst., bringing the California mails of July 1st, 360 passengers, and $1,700,000 in gold dust. The mails were brought down by the steamer Panama in 18 days from San Francisco.

By this arrival we have the particulars of another great fire in San Francisco—the sixth that has visited that doomed city. It is said to have laid the heart of the city in ashes, having destroyed about five hundred houses and three millions of dollars' worth of property. The loss has fallen upon a class of citizens who were ill able to bear it. Most of them are poor men, men whose all was invested in the houses and goods which have been destroyed. A great deal of lumber has been burned up, and it will be a long time ere the burned district is built over again. The fire was the work of incendiaries, who have been arrested by the Vigilance Committee. Their fate may easily be surmised. Several lives are said to have been lost.

Lynch law continues to prevail throughout California. The agricultural prospects are favorable. The reports from the mines are conflicting, but generally they are favorable. The quartz diggings yield well. The Indian troubles continue.

The following summary contains the principal items of news of general interest:—

The curiosity of the San Francisco public was satisfied, to some extent, recently, by the exhibition in Brown's Saloon of a specimen of quartz gold weighing 28 pounds, the value of which is estimated at $4,000. It was found at Sonora.

The California Courier estimates the yield of gold dust at $134,660,000 annually. This is undoubtedly exaggerated.

A shocking affair occured in San Francisco on the night of the great fire, Lewis Pollock having been dragged from his bed and shot dead by Samuel Galligher.

A horrible murder was perpetrated at Sonora by persons who took offense at an article in the Sonora Herald. They repaired to the room of the Editor, (Dr. Gunn,) dragged him from his bed, shot him through the head, killed two other persons connected with the office, and wounded or killed three or four other persons who went to their assistance.

At the corners of the streets, in booths and in carts, and on the tables of our house-keepers, (says a San Francisco paper,) may be seen abundance of apples, in as fresh, and tempting condition as when they left the rich old orchards of the Bay State. Ice has worked wonders, and this is one of them. By a simple plan the apples have been kept in a perfect state through a voyage around Cape Horn. They are placed, we understand, in such a manner that the temperature shall be a little above freezing point, and thus preserved, preventing nearly all tendency to rot.

Telegraph across the Atlantic.—A Mr. Reynolds, of New York, proposes to construct a telegraph communication across the Atlantic at a cost of $3,000,000. He thinks the plan practicable and safe, and sets forth that the distance between Cape Canso, above Halifax, on the American coast, and the nearest point in Ireland, near Galway, is but about 1,600 miles, along the banks of Newfoundland, which are known to extend within 160 miles of the coast of Ireland, at an average depth of 800 feet. A line of that length, consisting of four wires perfectly insulated in a cord of gutta percha of the size proposed, would last for hundreds of years, as the insulating substance is indestructible in water, and has a strength equal almost to iron. Such a line would weigh about 10,000 tons, and would require about 1,500 tons of iron anchors. The cost of everything, when in complete working order, would be less than $3,000,000.

Cured of Error.—The Morning Star says that an intelligent man of Boston, Mass., who had repudicated the doctrine of human depravity, and held that no man delighted to do wrong, but was pressed to it by influences and temptations, avows himself completely cured, by a recent trip to California. He says that the recklessness, cruelty, inhuman avarice that delights in the misery of others that money may be wrenched from the victim, or that drags a dying man into the streets to avoid the expense of burial, which he met with on his route, convinced him that there was some mighty wrong in man's nature, or he would never sink so low in the blackness of crime as that. He saw many men who were apparently respectable, honorable, manly, at home, who were dead to every appeal of justice, mercy or manliness in the "far off land," and were ready for any deed of darkness which could feed their avarice or base desires.

The Perils of Camphene.—A gentleman in Brooklyn has kept a record of all the accidents by camphene which have occurred in this vicinity, and have been reported in the newspapers, since the 3d of July, 1850, and they number 59. Many persons have been fatally injured and much valuable property has been destroyed by this explosive and combustible fluid. It is full as dangerous an article as gunpowder, and, when we consider the number of cheap, inferior lamps, that are used, it is astonishing that accidents are not more frequent. Unless a camphene lamp is made perfectly air-tight, and constantly kept so when ignited, an explosion may ensue at any moment, and it is about as rational to put such a torpedo into the hands of children and servants as it would be to give them a bombshell. [N. Y. Com. Adv.

Three Executions at Once.—The murderers of the Cosden Family, in Maryland, were hung on Sixth-day last. A dispatch from Baltimore says: The prisoners ascended the gallows with firm steps. Taylor and Murphy made short addresses, positively denying their guilt; Shelton also denied his guilt. When they were swung off, the rope slipped from Murphy's neck, and he fell violently to the ground—a distance of fifteen feet. This occurrence caused a thrill of horror among the spectators. Murphy was picked up insensible, with his throat terribly lacerated by the rope; he soon, however, revived. Taylor and Shelton, in the mean time swung in the air lifeless corpses, dying with but few struggles. When they were cut down, Murphy was again brought on the scaffold, and in a few minutes he was swung off and died easy. The crowd quietly dispersed.

Commencement at the Wesleyan University.—The Annual Commencement at the Wesleyan University in Middletown, Ct., took place on the 6th inst. The Peithologian Society was addressed on the 5th by Rev. Dr. Cheever, of New York, on the subject of the elements of a permanent National Literature. The orator considered these points as essential: 1st. That it should be founded on Christianity; 2d. That it should be domestic; 3d. That it should be believing, rather than sceptical; 4th. That it should be in harmony with nature; 5th. That it should be founded on a love of our own language; and 6th. That it should have the quality of loyalty to righteous law.

No Licenses in Illinois.—The following is the substance of the No-License Bill which has passed the Legislature of Illinois:

1. It repeals all present license laws.
2. Prohibits the sale of intoxicating drinks in less quantity than one quart, under a penalty of $25.
3. If sold to minors, increases the fine to from $30 to $100.
4. Provides for a penalty of not less than $25, nor over $100, for selling more than a quart, and permitting the same to be drunk on the premises of the seller.
5. Giving away liquor to come within the provisions of the law.

Fair of the American Institute.—The twenty-fourth annual Fair of the American Institute is to be held at Castle Garden, New York city, in October next, for the exhibition of goods, specimens of agricultural productions, and machinery. Premiums are offered for the best specimens of various descriptions of works of art and cultivation, and among other things for the skill of apprentices, of whose productions a separate list is to be kept, so that they may be competitors with one another, and not with experienced workmen. Articles will be received on the 27th, 29th and 30th days of September, and the Fair will open on the 1st of October. The anniversary address will be delivered on the 16th of October, by Dr. Charles T. Jackson.

Captives Restored.—A recent report from General Harney, commanding on the Texan frontier, communicates intelligence of the rescue of seventeen Mexican captives from the hands of the Camanche and Lipan Indians, and their delivery to the Mexican authorities at Guerraro, Mexico, agreeably to the 11th article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Sixteen of the prisoners were boys, and all were children collected in the predatory excursions of those Indians from different parts of the Northeastern Provinces of Mexico; but, although many of them had been from five to seven years in captivity, the United States officers were enabled to gather such particulars respecting their parentage and places of birth as will probably secure the return of them all to their families.

A Novel Passage.—We learn from Capt. Hovey, of the "Devonshire," who arrived from Liverpool on Saturday morning, that there was no sickness among his passengers, with the exception of one man, who, it appears, came on board effected with the small-pox. As soon as this circumstance became known to the Captain, the patient was placed in the stern-boat, hanging at the davits, several feet from the ship. Over the boat a tent was erected, covered with tarpaulins. Here the patient was nursed an attended by the physician and officers of the ship. He is now quite well, and he never left his romantic domicil during the whole course of his passage. This timely precaution, taken by Capt. Hovey, prevented the disease from affecting any of the passengers. [N. Y. Tribune.

Colored Population.—New Jersey has a larger colored population, in proportion to its size and white people, than any other of the Free States; and more than half of all the free colored people in the Union are to be found in the five Middle States, New York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland. The three adjoining States, Virginia, North-Carolina and Ohio, contain over 100,000 more, leaving less than 100,000 for the other twenty-two States, there being comparatively very few free negroes in the Eastern or Western States.

Accident Last Sabbath.—A sad accident occurred near Bristol, R. I., last Sabbath. A boat, in which were Mr. Rufus Reed, a brewer, of Providence, his two daughters, two Misses Potter, of Prudence Island, and two other persons, was upset in a gale. The four young women were drowned. Mr. Reed sustained himself by swimming, and the other two by clinging to a portion of the mast which remained above water, until they were rescued by the crew of another boat.

SUMMARY.

A paper published at Augusta, Me, says that on Saturday, Aug. 2d, being the day on which the Mayor's sixty-day proclamation expired—the several liquor dealers in that city, great and small, hotel-keepers, apothecaries, and all others who had to any extent previously participated in its sale, voluntarily abandoned the traffic; and now, on the seventh day of August, in the year of grace 1851, not a single glass of intoxication liquor, of any kind, could or can be obtained for love or money, or for any purpose whatever, in the city of Augusta.

One of the liquor sellers in Augusta, Me., whose stock was destroyed by the city authorities, brought an action of trover against the officer who seized it, to recover the value of the jugs and liquor, representing that he had the liquor in his possession for medical purposes, and not for sale. The Judge decided, under the 16th section of the liquor law, that no action could be maintained in which any portion of the property sued for is composed of intoxication liquors. Judgment accordingly.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser states that the Michigan Southern Railroad Company have contracted for the construction of three first-class steamers, to be ready for the opening of navigation next season. They are intended to be put upon the route between Monroe and Buffalo. In addition to this, another line of first-class boats will be put upon the line from Monroe to Dunkirk; and another from Toledo, (one of the terminating points of the Southern Road,) to touch at all the principal ports on the south shore of Lake Erie.

The Steamer St. Ange recently returned to St. Louis from the Yellow Stone River. During her absence she suffered much from sickness. At one time there were more than half the voyageurs down with the cholera and other diseases. Sixty strewed the cabin floor at once. There were fourteen deaths. Eleven voyageurs, the fourth engineer, a passenger by the name of Wilcox, and the Rev. Father Hockin, all or nearly all, died of cholera in its worst from.

A project is said to be under way at Boston for connecting all the railroads centering at that city by a circular road. The proposed road passes from Roxbury through Brookline, Cambridge, Chelsea, and Charlestown, to East Boston. It is to be at the water's side, with piers and wharves for the accommodation of shipping, so that all the railroads can send their freight cars directly to the vessel's side, and load and unload their freight without the trouble of cartage.

The Prairie du Chien Patriot states, that about three millions of feet of sawed lumber, besides shingles, logs, timber, &c., were seized lately on the Black, Chippewa and St. Croix rivers, by United States Deputy Marshal Thomas, and that, with two or three exceptions, a settlement without sale was effected with the holders, either paying for the wood or giving security for the payment of so much per thousand feet.

A correspondent of the Dubuque Herald says that the wheat crop in that district of Iowa is nearly a failure. The winter wheat was badly blighted and rusted, and the spring wheat is blighted in a great measure. The corn looks very poorly, but hopes are entertained that it will turn out well. The oat crop is very abundant. The potatoes are ruined by the rot.

The Superintendent of the Banking Department of the State of New York has received notice from the following Banks that their affairs will be closed and circulation withdrawn as speedily as possible: Adams Bank, Ashford; American Bank, Maysville; Champlain Bank, Ellensburg; Cortland Co. Bank, Cincinnatus; Knickerbocker Bank, Geneva.

The N. Y. Tribune of August 8th says: Peaches are becoming quite abundant, and some very fine ones are now received; they come mostly from Delaware. During the past two days about 2,000 baskets have arrived over the Camden and Amboy Railroad. It is said that the crop will not be more than one-quarter or one-third that of last year. The price ranges from $1 25 to $2 per basket.

A very fine horse, the property of Col. A. Noble, of Carlisle, Pa, came to his death in a most singular manner. He was tied by the Colonel near to a bee stand for the purpose of grazing. In this position he was left for an hour or more, and it is presumed that by switching his tail to keep off the flies, he gave offence to the bees, who attacked him in countless numbers. When discovered he was literally covered with them—on his ears and nostrils especially, they hung in large clusters. The poor animal was led off, but it was too late; he died in less than an hour afterward.

The reports from the various grain growing parts of the Union, indicate that the wheat crop of the present year will be the heaviest ever taken from the earth in the Western States. In Ohio, the crop is a very large and fine one. In New York, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin, the yield is also very large, and the wheat of the very best quality. In Michigan particularly, the yield exceeds anything ever known even in Michigan.

The Hartford Times says that Jonathan Olcott, of Hartford, aged 93 years; Roswell Miller, of Windsor, aged 92 years; and Thomas S. Bishop, of Avon, aged about 90 years—all revolutionary pensioners, rode in the procession in that city on the Fourth of July. Before the month ended all of them were in their graves. Mr. Olcott died on the 17th of July; Mr. Miller died on the 28th; and Mr. Bishop on or about the 25th.

The steamship Atlantic, which sailed hence on the 6th inst., will most probably arrive at Liverpool by noon on the 16th inst., in which case we shall have intelligence of it in this city on the 27th inst., as the steamer Asia sails from Liverpool on the 16th inst., and will arrive on the 27th, in 11 days, her usual time. So, in exactly three weeks from her departure, we may confidently expect to hear of the arrival of the Atlantic at Liverpool.

The Monmouth (N. J.) Inquirer says that some of the farmers in that region have examined their potatoes, and find that in some fields they are rotting in the ground, although it si hoped that it is not generally the case. A very large planting of potatoes, more than any former season, was made in Monmouth this season, and those which are coming in and sent off to market are very fine.

The Maine people seem disposed to test satisfactorily the operation of the new liquor law of that State. Besides the seizure of a large quantity in Portland, we learn from the Rockland Gazette that 33 barrels, including 22 of New York rum, were seized in that town and that the contents will be destroyed.

Mr. John T. Blois, author of the Gazetteer of Michigan, is engaged on a History of that State, embracing a period from the first settlement to the present time, and also intended to contain biographical sketches of the prominent men of the State. Mr. Blois has been a resident of Michigan for twenty years.

A very destructive hail-storm was recently experienced in the vicinity of Danville Green, Vt., It swept over a distance of six miles in length and a mile and half wide, nearly destroying all the crops within its range, cutting the corn down to within a foot of the ground, and leaving the wheat and oats fit only for fodder. The fruit was also mostly destroyed.

The Western Reserve was visited by a hail storm a few days ago, which was very destructive to the growing crops. Trees were uprooted, fences demolished barns unroofed, &c., in large numbers. Several barns filled with grain were struck by the electric fluid and consumed by fire.

The Geographical Center of the United States, at the present time, is in the Indian Territory, 120 miles west of Missouri. The present center of our representatives population, which is constantly moving Westward, is ascertained, by actual calculation, to be just about at the City of Columbus, Ohio.

Mr. S. W. Jewett, an extensive farmer in Vermont, has lately introduced a whole flock of genuine merino sheep, imported directly from France, at a cost of $30,000. Many of these were bought at the yearly sale from the Government flock at Rambouillet, and are pure descendants of the celebrated Spanish flock.

During a squall on Tuesday afternoon last, a small boat was capsized near the Kills, nearly opposite the Sailors' Snug Harbor, on Staten Island. The boat contained, at the time, two sailors from the harbor, two females, and four children, all of whom were drowned before any relief could be extended to them. The party were going on a pic-nic excursion.

Mr. Henry Snow, of Hampden, Me., 32 years old, died in Boston a few days ago by disease contracted in California. He left Boston a year or two since, went to California, was unsuccessful, got sick, and returned just in time to die. He died poor. His case is not singular, and is an example of warning to all.

The Gloucester (Mass.) Telegraph proposes a Convention of Delegates from the fishing towns of New-England, for the purpose of consulting together upon the best means of laying the subject of British encroachments upon the American fisheries before the American Government.

There is a counterfeit five on the Bank of Sullivan, N. Y., in circulation. The engraving and general appearence of the bill is excellent, rendering detection very difficult. It is darker than the original, and the signatures are not exact imitations. will require very close examination to distinguish the counterfeit from the genuine.

Reports of service were made in the third Auditor's office during the month of July, 6,748 claims for bounty lands under the old Indian wars and the war of 1812 with Great Britain. In the pension office, 32,638 warrants were issued under the act of September 28, 1850, up to the 1st of August, 1851, inclusive.

There is much dispute about the extent of the Cuban insurrection. An extra New-Orleans Picayune says the Cuba Revolution is not suppressed. The patriots hold their own. Trinidad, Cienfuegos, and Villa Clara have sent out their bands, and Giunia Miranda had raised the banner of rovolt.

The Cincinnati Commercial says: The potato crop this year in Ohio has never been equaled by any previous one. In addition to the abundant supply, their flavor is far superior to any that have been introduced in our market for many years.

Messrs. Rodgers, Ketchum and Grosvenor, of Paterson, have built a locomotive for the New York and Erie Railroad, calculated to draw forty loaded cars, or a weight equal to 800 tons—a freight for a large ship.

A dispatch dated Boston, Friday, Aug. 8, says the gamblers who were compelled to leave the muster-field at Neponset, proceeded to Squantam, where a serious fight occurred among themselves. Knives and clubs were freely used, and it was reported that one of the gamblers was fatally injured. One had his ear bitten off, and others were badly bruised.

The Willimantic (Ct.) Medium states that the cotton mill of A. & S. Jilson, in that village, has been purchased by Messrs. Ives & Dunham, of Hartford, who intend to convert it into a linen factory. A purchase of machinery for this factory has been made in England, by Mr. Rixford, of Mansfield, who has been for some time engaged in the manufacture of linen.

A man may now come from Cincinnati to New York in 41 to 48 hours, his baggage ticketed through. In 1812, it was a hard month's journey to come with a carriage and horses, and there was no stage west of Carlisle, Pa.

Mr. John Gilman, the oldest printer in Massachusetts, died a few days since in Newburyport. He was born in 1777, and served as a connecting link between Franklin's ink-balls, and Hoe's fast press.

The Hornellsville Railroad is progressing rapidly, and it is the intention of the Company to complete it by the 1st of January. There is to be an independent track, of six feet guage, from Buffalo to Hornellsville.

A dispatch dated Albany, Friday, August 8, says: A young man (a son of Mr. Robert Whitlock, lumber dealer) was found hanging in the garret of his father's house, this afternoon. It was the result of accident.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Remarks.

All the English branches usually taught in our Eastern Academies, together with the Classics, and the Modern Languages, (French, German, and Italian,) will be taught in this Institution. The mode of instruction will be in accordance with the latest and most popular method adopted in our best Eastern Institutions, aiming, primarily, at a thorough and practical qualification of School Teachers, and preparing students for an advanced standing in a College course.

This Institution is located in the healthy and delightful village of Milton, at the junction of the Milwaukie and Mississippi and the Northern and Southern Railroads, amidst an enterprising and moral community, and removed from the vices and temptations ever attendant on large villages and cities.

Weekly meetings are held in the village by three different evangelical denominations, either of which students can attend.

The plan of instruction and government of this Institution will aim at a harmonious development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of students, in a manner to render them thorough scholars, and practical, useful citizens; and the public may feel assured that no exertion shall be wanting on the part of the teachers and proprietors of the school to render it worthy of patronage and confidence. au14 4t

Milton, Rock Co., Wis., July 11th, 1851.

In sending the notice of our school to the Recorder, we will take the opportunity to assure such Seventh-day Baptists and other friends at the East as may contemplate removing to this State, and yet wish to enjoy the advantages of a good school, that it is intended to afford as good facilities for study and improvement in this school as can be found in any other Academy.

Union Bible Dictionary.

PREFERABLE TO ANY OTHER.—It is unquestionably preferable to any other manual adapted to aid the young in studying the sacred volume. [N.Y.Obs.

Fuller than any other.—It is nearly a complete summary of all the most valuable learning on the subjects embraced in it. [The Independent.

It is, by far, the completest and most perspicuous Bible Dictionary of its size to be found. It condenses a great amount of learning, and has a fullness of information, for which one would not look in so unpretending a volume, and which is all that most Bible readers would desire on the subject. [N. Y. Evangelist.

Cheaper than any other.—There is probably no book, except the Bible itself, in which so great a quantity of matter can be purchased for so small a sum; and happily, it is matter of an important character, all of which helps to elucidate the Bible. It explains the meaning of words, and the names of persons, animals, and objects, which are not defined in ordinary dictionaries. The images of things are also given in pictures, wherever this method is necessary to a just perception of them, or can be made to convey a more ready and accurate idea, than a mere verbal description. [Ch. Mir.

It is a sort of sine-qua-non for a Sunday-school teacher, and should be in the hands of the more forward pupils.

The best of its kind.—I feel free to express my general approbation of the "Union Bible Dictionary," as a work well calculated to extend the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and especially to be a valuable assistant to teachers and scholars in our Sunday-schools. [Rev. Dr. Alexander.

The mass of various and important information compressed within so small a compass is almost incredible. [Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Mass.

I regard the present volume as the best of its kind. [Rev. Dr. Stone.

Just what was wanted by Sunday-schools and Bible-classes. [Baptist Record.

Miscellaneous.

Locomotive Force of the Erie Railroad.

A correspondent of the Farmer and Mechanic, who has been employed to collect facts concerning the engines in use, for the officers of the New York and Erie Railroad, says there are at the present time 117 locomotive engines belonging to the company, while nearly 20 more are constructing at the various shops with which the company have contracts. The length of the center road is 444 miles, divided, for the running of engines, into four divisions. The first, or Eastern Division, extending from Piermont to Delaware, is 74 miles long; the Delaware Division extends from Delaware (better known as Port Jervis) to Susquehanna, Pa., 104 miles; the Susquehanna Division extends from Susquehanna to Hornellsville N. Y., 139 miles; and the Western Division, extending from Hornellsville to Dunkirk, is 127 miles long. The Eastern and Western divisions are quite undulating and uneven, the grades reaching in many places, 50 feet per mile. The Susquehanna Division is very even and regular, having no grades sufficient to check the speed of the trains, while the grades on the Delaware Division do not exceed 15 feet per mile, except for a few miles at the "Summit," in Lanesboro, Pa., where the ascent in some places is as steep as 85 feet per mile. Of the 117 engines employed, 8 were built by Norris, of Philadelphia; 14 by M. W. Baldwin, of Philadelphia; 2 by Ross Winans, of Baltimore; 32 by Rogers, Ketchum and Grosvenor, of Paterson, N. J.; 32 by Swinburne, Smith & Co., of Paterson, N. J.; 20 by the Boston Locomotive Works; 7 by the Taunton Locomotive Manufacturing Company, at Taunton, Mass.; and 2 by the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company, at Manchester, N. H. Arranging the machines according to the size of cylinder, there are 2 engines of $10\frac{3}{4}$ inches diameter of cylinder; 1 of 12 inches 4 of 13 inches; 3 of 14 inches; 6 of 15 inches; 2 of $15\frac{1}{2}$ inches; 18 of 16 inches; 71 of 17 inches; 9 of 18 inches; and 2 of 19 inches diamater. The dimensions of one of the first class passenger engines are, seventeen inch cylinder, twenty inches stroke, fourdrivers of six feet diameter, and four trucks. Boiler forty-four inches diameter, and contains 175 tubes $1\frac{3}{4}$ inches diameter and 11 inches long, 922 square feet of tube surface, 67 square feet of fire box surface, and 13 square feet of grate. Weight, in running order, 56,000 lbs. The freight engines of the first class have 18 inch cylinders, 20 inches stroke, 6 drivers 5 feet diameter, and 4 trucks. Boiler 48 inches diameter, and contains 198 tubes, $1\frac{3}{4}$ inches diameter, and 13 feet long, 1127 square feet of tube surface, 72 do. of fire box surface, and $14\frac{2}{3}$ do. of grate. Weight in running order, 65,000 lbs. There are two engines employed at the "Summit," which weigh each 73,700 lbs., being probably the heaviest locomotives in America. Upwards of 100 of the locomotives owned by the company have been placed upon the road since May, 1848. It is anticipated that this road will require, when in full operation, an equipment of more than 200 locomotives.

The Infant's Appeal.

In the year 1836, inhabitants living in a district bordering on Rock River, in the northern part of the State of Illinois, were much incensed by the depredations of a band of horse thieves who invested that portion of the country. Every exertion had been made to discover the men engaged in this nefarious transaction, but hitherto in vain, and valuable animals were stolen, and lost to their owners, in defiance of the utmost vigilence and care.

During such a state of affairs, the citizens residing in the region of the theives became throughly excited, and were wound up to such a pitch of indignation, that a body of men were formed styled Rangers, whose explicit duty was to expunge the district of all suspicious characters, and endeavor to put a stop to the depredations of the horse thieves.

Shortly after this band commenced operations, word was conveyed to the leader of the Rangers that a valuable horse which had been stolen the night previous, could then be found on the premises of a man named Burt, locked up in the stable. Although Burt had heretofore been looked upon as an honest man and an upright citizen, yet the Captain deemed it his duty to at least examine his farm and learn the truth or falsity of the report.

Accordingly he summond some half-dozen of his Rangers to meet him at a spot not far from Burt's house, and before morning, set out for the same place himself. Daylight was but barely discernible in the east, and the light of comming dawn had not yet penetrated the bottom, where the suspicioned man resided, as the Rangers, charged with their fearful mission of life or death, silently approached, and surrounded the dwelling. Leaving three of the band to guard the entrance, the Captain proceeded with the others to the stable, broke open the door, and found the missing horse, as had been reported, safely stalled inside.

Not a lingering doubt now remained of Burt's guilt, and with a stern determination to make such an example of him as would deter others from a like transaction, the Rangers returned to the house. In the meantime Burt had arisen and upon coming to the door was seized by those in waiting, and upon demanding the reason, was informed that a stolen animal was found in his stable, and that he was considered a thief. Muttering something about "he knew t'would come to this at last," he quitely submitted to whatever his captors had in store for him.

A short consultation was held, and it was resolved to hang the criminal upon a large elm tree, that grew in front of his own home, it being deemed that such an act would strike terror and dismay into the ranks of the horse thieves.

Burt had asked half an hour to prepare for death, and the sun had risen in all its golden majesty ere the fatal moment arrived which would launch him into eternity. In vain had his grey headed father and mother pleaded for his life, with trembling tongues—the old lady tottering forth from the dwelling, and kneeling in suppliant mood to his apparently merciless captors. In vain had the wife of his bosom knelt in tears of agony, and entreated them as husbands to spare his life—for each Ranger had suffered more or less in person, and they deemed the example absolutely necessary to deter others; and it seemed as though Burt must surely die.

The dreadful preparations were completed—the half hour had expired—and the criminal was arrayed under a limb of a stout elm, over which a rope was thrown, one end being noosed around the prisioner's neck, and the other held by three of the Rangers.

Then came a moment of dreadful silence; that awful stillness, which preludes the launching of a fellow being into a future existence—while the three strong men who held the rope's end, gazed fixedly upon the Captain for the fatal signal. It was given by rising the right arm; and already the noose was tightening around the doomed man's neck, when the wife of Burt issued forth from the house, holding an infant, a little more than a year old, in her arms.

Rushing forward, she fell on he knees directly in front of the Captain, and instantly raising the child, with arms outstretched, towards him she exclaimed, in tones that would have pierced a heart of steal:

"If you will not spare him for the sake of his grey haired sire, or the wife of his bosom, spare him, in the name of God, for the sake of his infant boy!"

Another dead silence reigned like a pall over the spot; then, as though inspired by heaven itself, the chid also out-stretched its little arms full towards its parent, and exclaimed, in a voice heard by all, the single word:

"Father!"

The muscles of the Captain's face quivered in every fibre, and the men who held the rope slowly relaxed the pressure around the neck of Burt; when again the infant uttered, in distinct tones:

"Father! father!"

And then, as though desparing of succes, huddled into its mother bosom, and burst into a sobbing cry.

It was more than the Rangers could stand, and after a short consultation, the rope was taken from the criminal's throat, and the band left the spot; and Burt became a reformed man, through the powerful effects of his "INFANT'S APPEAL."

Storm in Fayette County, Pa.

The Uniontown Democrat gives some painful particulars of the tornado in Fayette county, on the 26th of July.

It began at the farm and residence of Geo. Wetsell. The family occupied a large log building, with an immense old-fashioned stone chimney in the western gable. The first blast of the storm brought down the chimney and crushed Mrs. Wetsell under it. Huge stones fell on Mr. Wetsell. Half the floor was covered with stones, from the depth of a foot to eighteen inches. Many of them weighed from fifty to eighty pounds. From under these Mr. Wetsell literally quarried out his wife, finding her in a sitting posture, with her head pressed down to the floor with the superincumbent stones. They were drenched with her blood. A cradle, in which was a young child, was crushed to the floor, but the child was unhurt.

Over the top of the next hill it encountered the barn and dwelling of Mr. Arrison. The barn was not entirely destroyed, but the dwelling was a heap of ruins. Both Mr. and Mrs. Arrison were badly hurt—he having several of his ribs broken, and she being terribly cut and bruised.

Descending the hill a short distance, it encountered the residence of the Rev. Mr. Rose, a two story stone building. The family consisted of ten persons, one being absent from home. Nothing was left but a small angle of the first story. One girl, thirteen years old, was instantly killed—all the rest were badly injured. Three of the family were sleeping in the garret—they were found fifty or sixty paces distant, lying in an adjoining field. The hat of one of the boys was found on the farm of Col. Bute, three miles distant.

Crossing two fields and a small ravine, the storm next encountered the frame barn and dwelling of James Stewart. The latter was a two-story log building with stone basement. Roused by an unusual roaring in the air, Mr. Stewart stepped to his door, and by the glare of the lightning he saw limbs of trees and all sorts of rubbish rushing and reeling through the air. In an instant he seized one child, his wife another, and they rushed to the basement. There was but one blast and a crash, and his house was gone. In one minute there was a perfect calm. He lighted a candle, and there was not a breeze to disturb it in the open air. He proceeded to search for two other children who were sleeping on the first floor; over the bed, which was crushed to the floor, he found a wooden partition, and on top of that several large logs. Crawling beneath them, he found his children stunned, but not seriously injured.

The residence of Mr. Strong withstood the blast, but his barn lost part of its roof. A hundred yards from his house it unroofed a stone school-house, and taking a strip of the finest timber we ever knew of, belonging to Col. Bute, it seems to have let locse all its fury. The road running along its side was literally choked up with trees and brush. The Colonel thinks he has come in for more than his full share of the storm. For him it destroyed eight buildings, composed of stables, dwellings occupied by his sons, and various granaries and out-houses. His main dwelling-house and large barn escaped. A grand-child, a small child of Mrs. Archibald, had its skull fractured—another was slightly injured. One horse was killed, and twelve others crippled or injured more or less. Col. Bute estimates his loss at $3,000.

Crossing the next hill and the road to Laurel Hill meeting-house, it came down upon the premises of Zachariah Ball. His large frame barn was destroyed. His dwelling was a substantial brick, with 18-inch walls. The family was on the first floor, in a room fronting the east. The roof and upper story were carried away, and the east front fell forward, exposing the family to the open air, but the floor overhead protected them from above, and they escaped unhurt.

There is a gentle rise, mostly open fields, to the next batch of buildings, belonging to Gen. H. W. Beeson. First the storm took the house, carrying away the upper story, and uprooting every thing about it. The General's barn was fifty-two feet square, framed of large timbers, and double stone foundations, one within the other. It stood on the very apex of the hill; we saw the foundation, but what has become of the barn is yet unascertained.

Pursuing its course towards the mountains, it destroyed the barn and brick dwelling of Mr. Jones, on the old Connellsville road. Its last act before rising to the mountains was to unroof a house occupied by Mr. Kinsil, and he, stepping out of his door at the time, found himself on the top of a fallen tree, some hundred steps from his house, occasionally touching the ground on his way, but unable to stay his course until he lodged in the tree. Several other houses were destroyed wholly or in part before the storm took the mountain, but we cannot give particulars.

Crossing the top of the mountain, it blew down a large log barn belonging to Levi Downer, of this place. We next hear of it at Mr. Sebastian Rush's, on the National Road, twelve miles east of this, where it blew the roof off his new barn, just finished, and partly unroofed his store.

A Thrilling Incident.

An incident occured at the Key Biscayne light-house during the Florida war, which is perhaps worth recording. The light-house was kept by a man named Thompson. His only companion was an old negro man; they both lived in a small hut near the light-house. One evening about dark they discovered a party of some fifteen or twenty Indians creeping upon them, upon which they immediately retretred into the light-house, caraying with them a keg of gunpowder, with the guns and ammunition. From the windows of the light-house Thompson fired upon them several times, but the moment he would show himself at the window, the glasses would be instantly riddled by rifle balls, and he had no alternative but to lie close. The Indians meanwhile getting out of patience, at not being able to force the door, which Thompson had secured, collected piles of wood, which, being placed against the door and set fire to, in process of time not only burt through the door, but also set fire to the stair-case conducting to the lantern, into which Thompson and the negro were compelled to retreat. From this, too, they were finally driven by the encroaching flames, and forced outside on the parapet wall, which was not more than three feet wide.

The flames began to ascend as from a chimney, some fifteen or twenty feet above the light-house. These men had to lie in this situation, some seventy feet above the ground, with a blazing furnace roasting them on one side, and the Indians on the other, embracing every occasion, as soon as any part of the body was exposed, to pop at them. The negro, incautiously exposing himself, was killed, while Thompson received several balls in his feet, which he had projected beyond the wall.

Nearly roasted to death, and in a fit of desperation, Thompson seized the keg of gunpowder, which he had still preserved to keep from the hands of the enemy, threw it into the blazing light-house, hoping to end his own sufferings and destroy the savages. In a few moments it exploded, but the walls were too strong to be shaken, and the explosion took place out of the light-house, as though it had been fired from a gun.

The effect of the concussion was to throw down the blazing materials level with the ground, so as to produce subsidence of the flames, and then Thompson was permitted to remain exempt from their influence. Before day the Indians were off, and Thompson being left alone, was compelled to throw off the body of the negro while strength was left him, and before it putrified.

The gunpowder was heard on board a revenue cutter at some distance, which immediately proceeded to the spot to ascertain what had occured, when they found the light-house burnt, and the keeper above on the top of it. Various expedients were resorted to, get him down; and finally a kite was made and raised with strong twine, and so manœuvred as to bring the line within his reach, to which a rope of good size was next attached and hauled up by Thompson. Finally, a block, which, fastened to the Light-house, and leaving a rope to it enabled the crew to haul up a couple of men, by whose aid Thompson was safely landed on terra firma.

The Indians had attempted to reach him by means of the lightning rod, to which they had attached thongs of buckskin, but could not succeed in getting more than half way up.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA AND ENGLAND.—Wm. Wells Brown, formerly a slave in the United States, has addressed a very sensible letter to the London Times, on the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in England. He says very many of those who have been compelled to fly into Canada from persecutions resulting from the fugitive law, are without employment. He estimates the number of fugitives in Canada at thirty thousand; and as these people, he says, are mostly without education, and have but little knowledge of the mechanical branches, they find many difficulties in the way of getting employment, and thereby earning for themselves an honest living. Many of these people have, within the last six or eight months, gone to England to seek employment, and encounter the same difficulties there as in Canada, and consequently soon become burdens to the benevolent, or inmates of the "unions." He therefore recommends that provision be made for sending such of them as are willing to go to the West Indies, to labor in those Islands where slavery has been abolished, and where a deficiency of labor is now experienced.

ADVENTURE WITH A LYNX.—These animals, it is said, are becoming numerous in some parts of Canada, and are very ferocious. A few days since, a little girl, ten years of age, while engaged in cutting nettles a quarter of a mile from home, in the township of Oro, saw an animal approaching her which she supposed to be a dog; but she afterwards discovered that it was a wild animal, and she ran to escape from it. The lynx intercepted her and threw her down, but allowed her to get up again. She than ran to the stump of a tree, ten feet high, and succeeded in climbing to the top of it. It was hollow, and she decended into it some eight feet. The lynx mounted the stump and commenced howling, when a sister of the little girl was attracted to the spot and rescued her. Five of these animals were seen in the same town at one time. They are sometimes strong enough to overcome a man. [Rochester Democrat.

THE MAYOR AND THE COUNTRYMAN.—While the Mayor of Washington was conversing with a friend near the corner of Pennsylvania Av. and Ninth St., recently, a young man, evidently from the country, and unaccustomed to the etiquette of city life, approached, and, addressing the Mayor rather unceremoniously, inquired how long he was going to stand there. Receiving for answer, "a few minutes," he asked the Mayor just to hold his horse for a little while! at the same time handing him his bridle. His Honor smiled at the republican bluntness of the stranger, and, with a bow, complied with his request. The countryman then leisurely walked into a store near by, and having there made several purchases returned to where he left his "critter." Returning his thanks for the favor rendered, he leaped into the saddle, and, in the course of a few minutes, was on his way homewards. It is not every one who can procure a Mayor to hold a horse.

Curiosities from Ninevah.

Recently several cases containing additional antiquities from Ninevah arrived at the British Museum in London. A great variety of new and interesting objects have been brought to light, chiefly connected with the domestic economy and customs of the ancient Assyrians. They principally consist of instruments and vessels of bronze and earthenware, several in a perfect state of preservation, others thickly encrusted with rust, and broken to fragments. The use of some of them is quite inexplicable for the present, and must be left for future ingenuity and study to discover. There are, however, bowls and vases, many richly chased; some dozens of earthenware studs of different shapes, supposed to be for harness; a very perfect wine-strainer, similar to those in use at the present day; the hinges of the gates of the palace; legs and feet of chairs; a curious mask of iron or bronze; richly ornamented handles of various kinds; a large wheel, or the bronze casing of it, broken into many pieces; one or two small glass vases of beautiful colors; a quantity of cylinders about an inch and a half in length, carved or inscribed, one or two of them of a substance resembling plumbago both in appearance and weight, but the greater portion of them of earthenware; a statue of a priest in stone, about four feet high and much ornamented, and with the peculiarity that the figure has no cap or covering on its head, and is apparently bald; and, lastly, several slabs of inscriptions. The study of these remains will doubtless throw much additional light on the imperfect knowledge we possess of the ancient and wonderful people to whom they belonged.

Mrs. Swisshelm on Women's Rights.

The following remarks by this lady are advisable and well-timed, and indicate strong sense amid many unfeminine peculiarities:—

"The physical right to be taken care of is one of 'woman's rights' that we will never yield. Our physical weakness will be our strongest argument for claiming all legal, intellectual and moral powers of defense. In an intellectual or moral war, we ask no quarter on account of womanhood; but of every man we meet we claim physical protection, just because he is a man and we a woman. As to meeting in convention to discuss woman's right to engage in any occupation for which she has a capacity, it is sheer nonsense. There is no law to prevent women from following almost any business, and why do they not take their right to work at any thing they please? Mrs. Coe urged that women have a right to be captains of ships! Well why are they not captains? There is no law to prevent it. If we believed it right, and thought we had the capacity, we would soon command a vessel, and no doubt the world would acknowledge our right. It would have taken a deal of talk to convince the world that Joan of Arc and Jagello had a right to be soldiers; but without any argufying on the subject they proved their title to a niche in the warrior s temple of fame. 'A man of words and not of deeds, is like a garden full of weeds,' and a woman of that kind is very much like him. There is no use claiming rights for those who do not want to use them, and those who do should just take them."

ANOTHER FLYING MACHINE.—The Paris Patrie states that the Academy of Sciences is just now examining a Flying Machine, invented by one Don Diego de Salamanca, who declares that he can make his way through the air as fast as a carrier pigeon. The experiments, which will be held on a small scale, and the flights of Don Diego "will not extend beyond the Department of the Seine;" but at a later period he proposes to go to Lyons, to Bordeaux, Toulouse, Marseilles and Tours, and to take the lines of railway. The price of each machine will not exceed 1,100fr. for women. If the experiment succeed, Don Diego will take out a patent, and will make the sale of the machines a branch of commerce. Although greatly astonished at this invention, several members of the Academy have pointed out the inconvenience of bringing it into general use. In point of fact, there will be no security for any one, if by the aid of such a machine, all our usages and customs be overthrown, and if malefactors can fly on the roofs of houses, and afterward get into apartments and commit all sorts of depredations. "It will be very curious," says the Patrie, "to see policemen, in France or England, pursuing theives in the air, to lock them up on earth."

REMEDY FOR STAINS, &c.—If cotton or linen goods, as linen towels, &c., become stained from fruit, tarts, jellies or jams, apply immediately common table salt. This, if well rubbed on before the stain becomes dry, will generally remove it, or will keep the article damp until by the usul process of washing it will disappear. Pure cider vinegar if immediately applied is very useful in removing stains from either cotton, linen or woolen goods. This should be afterwards rinsed out with soft water. For mildewed linen, salt and sour buttermilk rubbed over the stains and exposing the goods to the sun, a few times repeated is an effectual remedy. Spots from iron rust are generally removed by applying the juice of a lemon. For the removal of ink spots, milk thoroughly rubbed on and rinsed out with pure cold water is a pretty certain remedy. [Tribune.

ARTIFICIAL TOPAZ.—M. Daubree has communicated to the Paris Academy of Sciences the results of some researches on the artificial formation of Topaz. Pure alumina, previously calcined by a bright red heat, is submitted to the action of a current of fluoride of silicon. After two exposures of this kind, the alumina increased in weight 70 per cent. The product contained fluorine, and what was more, this fluorine is in such a state as not to be acted upon by boiling concentrated sul phuric acid. By this characteristic alone, the substance produced offers a great resemblance to topaz, the four constituent elements of which it also contains. A quantitative analysis indicated its very near approach to, if not, identity with, topaz. Its identity, which is 3.47, is the same as that of natural topaz.

GALVANIC PRINTING PRESS.—Mr. F. Foreman passed up on the Fulton, on Sunday, (says the Muscatine [Iowa] Enquirer,) on his way to Washington, to procure a patent for a most ingenious and practical invention. He had with him a perfect model of a printing press, moved and regulated by means of galvanic magnets. We shall not attempt a complete description of Mr. F.'s discovery; suffice it to say, that he had the press in full operation, with a form upon it, from which it threw off impressions with the rapidity of lightning. His paper works upon a reel, and is continuous, like the telegraphic coil. The paper passes over the type on a cylinder, and when one side is worked the paper is reversed, and the other side printed with a most perfect register, and the sheets are clipped apart, as they come from press, by an ingenious contrivance. There is no limit to the speed at which this press will work; its exactness is beyond any thing known in this line of machinery; and what is better than all, Mr. F. says he can put up the largest sized press at a cost of not more than $500. Mr. Foreman is a practical printer, and at present a citizen of New Boston, Ill.

ROTATION OF THE EARTH.—Professor Strong, of Rutgers College, New-Brunswick, N. J., has just put in operation a new contrivance for testing this scientific problem, which puts the French pendulum mode entirely in the shade. Professor Strong has constructed a wooden wheel six feet in diameter, but very slight indeed, its weight being only two pounds. This wheel is only supported horizontally, the hub resting on a steel needle in the same manner that a compass is supported. The needle fits into a glass socket. Placed in a room free from currents of air and all disturbance, the motion of the earth around the wheel is percetible the wheel apparently performing the revolution in the proper number of hours. It is proper to state that no motion is externally communicated to the wheel. This is the latest perpetual motion we have heard of. By this wheel it is said that the latitude can at all times be correctly ascertained The experiment is not confined to a wheel of such large dimensions, but may be realized with smaller ones The experiment will soon be tested at the Washington Observatory.

AN ACCOMPLISHED MORMON.—A letter from Paris to the New York Observer gives the following notice of the Mormon Missionary at that place: "In the house where I live is a gentleman by the name of B—n, an American, a Mormon, and a Prophet. He is one of the most polite and pleasant men that I have met since I left home, a graduate of the New York University, and familiar with several modern languages. He has a family in the Great Valley, (Deseret,) and has been connected with the Mormon fraternity ten years. He is one of the twelve Prophets who conduct the affairs and guard the interests of the whole community. He is now engaged in the laborious occupation of translating the Mormon Bible into French; and when I tell you that he has been occupied four months already, from 11 to 5 each day, with a prospect of four more before the work is completed, you must acknowledge that it is no small task."

THE INGENUITY OF PATRIOTISM.—On the last Fourth of July, in a paper making village, about a dozen miles from Boston where patriotism was rife and cannon scarce, the inhabitants, resolved not to forego the usual artillery salute, common in most of our cities and towns, during the day, procured an old anvil, drilled a hole in it, and conveying it to a neighboring hill, discharged in by filling the aperture with powder and then driving in a wooden plug. The experiment was eminently successful, the noise of the discharge being equal, if not superior, to that of a more legitimate article. Perhaps it would be well to send an old anvil to the World's Fair, as a specimen of a Yankee's Fourth of July Artillery.

SIZES OF SHOES.—The Lynn Directory for 1851, says a size is the length of one "barley corn" or one third of an inch. A size stick is thus formed. Take a rule or piece of pine wood thirteen inches in length, and divided, into thirty-nine equal parts, of one third of an inch each. The first thirteen are left blank, and counted nothing. The second thirteen are called childrens' size. The third thirteen are called men's and womans' sizes; thus nine inches is a man's size, No. 1; ten inches is No. 4; eleven inches No. 7; and twelve inches No. 11.

TO REMOVE GREASE OR OIL FROM SILK.—Remove all the oil, &c., from the surface of the silk by rubbing it smartly with a clean cotton or flannel cloth, after which apply quite liberally, with a soft flannel or clean spong, the common Burning Fluid or Ethereal Oil used for burning in portable lamps, (not camphene.) In a few minutes repeat the operation with pure alcohol, and the most unsightly spots of oil or grease will be removed without injury to the most delicate colors.

The wife of a Marvin Andrews, a respectable farmer sesiding in Gloucester, R. I., has eloped with an Irishman named John Sternes. She took with her half a dozen of her husband's shirts, and left three children behind her.

The Hudson River Railroad (which has only about 30 miles of steamboating) is carrying passengers from New York to Albany in about six hours. The whole line is to be complete in about 60 days.

A dispatch dated Portland, Me., Thursday, August 1, says:—This morning about fifty casks of liquor were seized under the new law, on board a steamboat and at a storehouse. They were directed to all parts of the country.

Central Railroad of New-Jersey.

Summer Arrangements, commencing Monday, March 31, 1851.

THIS Road extends from ELIZABETHPORT, 35 miles, to WHITE HOUSE, N J, reducing the staging between the terminus of the Road and EASTON to 25 miles.

This line leaves New York by steamboat Red Jacket from pier No 1 North River, and connects with trains on the New Jersey Railroad, which leaves New York from foot of Cortland-st.

TRINS UP—Leave New York by steamboat Red Jacket, pier No 1 North River, at 9 A M, passenger; 1 P M, freight; and 5 P M, passenger; and by N J Railroad, foot of Cortland-st, at 9 A M, and 2 and 5¼ P M.

Trains leave White House and following places for New York as follows:

White House at 3¼ A M, freight; 5 40 A M, passenger, at 1 40 P M.

Somerville at 4 30 A M, freight; at 6 05 A M, passenger, at 2 05 P M.

Bound Brook at 4.50 A M, freight; at 6 15 A M, passenger, at 2 15 P M.

Plainfield at 5 20 A M, freight; at 6 35 A M, passenger, at 2 35 P M.

Westfield at 5 50 A M, freight; at 6 50 A M, passenger, at 2 50 P M.

Elizabethtown at 7 15 A M; freight at 10 30 A M; passenger at 3 15 P M.

Elizabethport at 7 30 A M; freight at 10 45 A M; passenger at 3 30 P M.

On Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, trains leave Somerville for Pespack, Lesser Cross-Roads, and Pluckamin.

STAGES will be in readiness on the arrival of the 9 A M train from New York at the White House to convey passengers to Easton, Wilkesbarre, Bethlehem, Allentown, and Mauch Chunk, Penn, and to Clinton, Flemington, Lebanon, Milford, and Belvidere, N J.

N B—All BAGGAGE at the risk of the owners until delivered into the actual possession of the Agents of the Company and checks or receipts given therefor.

The Christian Review.

THE removal of this Quarterly to New York more than a year since, and its elevation in character, the Publishers are happy to say, have greatly increased its circulation. Seeing this readiness to appreciate and patronize their efforts, they are determined to spare no pains or expense in raising the work to the highest point of excellence, every way worthy of its position in the metropolis of the nation, and as the organ of one of the most numerous and respectable denominations in the land.

TERMS.

For a single copy, three dollars per annum. No subscriptions received for less than a volume commencing with the Jan. No. of each year.

Every person forwarding the subscription price of four copies, shall receive a fifth copy gratis.

POSTAGE PRE-PAID.

When paid in advance, the postage will be pre-paid by the Publishers; or, the postage will be pre-paid on all numbers issued after the payment of the subscription. ☞ NEW POSTAGE LAW. ☜

This offer of pre-payment of postage is of more importance in consequence of the new law. The postage under 500 miles is the same as before; over 500 and under 1,500 miles the postage will be double; over 1,500 and under 2,500 miles, treble; and over 2,500 and 3,500, quadruple.

☞ If, however, the postage is pre-paid it is only one-half the above rates.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

This periodical has at last taken its true position. It will now challenge comparison with the best religious Reviews—proving that the Baptists have intellectual power and diversity enough to maintain a denominational Quarterly of the highest standard.

[Watchman and Reflector.

In tasteful and correct mechanical execution the "Review" is not surpassed by any of the Quarterlies. . . . Every minister should have it; and we wonder that more of our lay brethren, of educated mind, literary taste, and pecuniary ability, do not subscribe.

THE SABBATH QUESTION.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—Like most of your readers, I have been much gratified to find that you have thrown open your columns to a free discussion on the question respecting the Sabbath. I had not at first intended to take part in it, hoping that some more able correspondents would advocate the view which I believe to be the true one; but as this has not been the case, and as both the letters to which you have given insertion are, though able, very unsatisfactory, I deem the subject of too much importance to allow them to pass without some animadversion.

I cannot help, in the first instance, expressing my surprise that so plain a question as the one before us should have been involved in so many difficulties; and that men, on other subjects liberal and enlightened, should manifest, on this, so little strength of mind and freedom of investigation. As, however, from various causes, attention has been recently directed to it, I have no doubt the untenableness of many of the positions now held will be perceived, and that right views will soon prevail extensively.

I begin by stating, that I attach no importance whatever to the argument in favor of Sabbath observances derived from Old Testament authority. Admit that it was established not only in the Decalogue, but was attended to by the patriarchs under the first dispensation, and it appears to me you are no nearer the settlement of the question in the affirmative. The entire Jewish law, and, I believe, also the patriarchal, were abrogated by the dispensation of Christ—BOTH these laws were but "schoolmasters to bring us to Christ;" and though many are disposed to make exception in favor of the Ten Commandments and of the patriarchal law, I confess that I see no authority for doing so—no reason, indeed, which does not equally apply to every Mosaic observance.

With regard to the law of the Ten Commandments, why, I ask, do you consider the law in the twentieth chapter of Exodus binding, and not the law in the twenty-first, the twenty-second, and the twenty-third? The law which says, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," was given with no higher sanction, no greater solemnity, than that which says, "He that smiteth his father or his mother shall surely be put to death." The general impression appears to be, that God descended upon Mount Sinai, in thunders, and lightnings, and with the voice of a trumpet—that he delivered the law of the Ten Commandments, and that with them his communications ceased. The fact is, however, that the Ten Commandments constitute but the introductory part of a law which occupies several chapters in the book of Exodus, and most of the commands in which we never think of observing; and though the Ten Commandments were written on tables of stone, and though our Lord is said to have re-established "the law;" with reference to the former it is obvious to remark, that the writing on two tables was probably rather on account of the generally moral character of the commandments, and, consequently, their superior importance to the law which was chiefly ceremonial, (or, perhaps more probably, on account of their fundamental character in regard to the whole Jewish national polity—like the twelve tables at Rome,) and that it would be absurd to draw from this fact alone the inference of their claim to perpetual observance; and, with reference to the latter, it is sufficient to observe, that "the law" which our Lord "came not to destroy but to fulfill," was not the law of the Ten Commandments, but rather what may be called the moral law of the universe, of which the Decalogue was merely a national declaration, and which would have been just as binding, if the Decalogue had never been given. The law "written and engraven on stones," is expressly declared, in 2 Cor. 3, to be "done away."

I know, however, that it is common, when the argument from the Ten Commandments fails, to go back to patriarchal times, and to assert that the Sabbath was ordained immediately after the creation, and is therefore binding upon the whole human race. With the great Paley, and many other critics and theologians, I am compelled to doubt whether the evidence is sufficient to establish the observance of the Sabbath before the events of the wilderness, as recorded in the sixteenth chapter of Exodus, and whether the passage in the second chapter of Genesis was not a remark of the historian, written by him of course after the establishment of the Sabbath, but referring it to the event which suggested it, at the time when he records that event itself. Be this, however, as it may, the question appears to me unaltered. I believe that patriarchal observances are as much abrogated by Christianity as Jewish; and that, that "which is perfect" having "come," "that which is imperfect," whether Jewish, patriarchal, or paradisaical, is for ever "done away." It is also not unworthy of remark, that if the argument proves any thing it proves too much; for if the Sabbath was established at the creation for the whole human race to the end of time, it was established for the same purposes, and as commemorative of the same event, as those which first suggested it.*

The Sabbath we now, whether rightly or wrongly, keep, is a very different Sabbath from that first established, and conveys a very different idea; it is therefore another institution, and founded upon another law. If there was a permanent Sabbath law issued at the Creation as commemorative of the resting of Jehovah frow his works, it is time we went back to the old practice, for, according to our present custom, we do not obey it.

I hope it is now clear, from what I have said—as far, that is, as such a hurried statement of arguments can make it clear—that our present observance of a Sabbath is not justified by Old Testament authority; let us see whether it is demanded as a part of the New Dispensation. The texts upon which Sabbatarians rely as proving the Divine institution of a Sunday Sabbath are the following—(as my space will not permit my quoting them in full, I leave them to be referred to by the reader:)—John 20: 19; John 20: 26; Acts 2: 1; Acts 20: 6, 7; 1 Cor. 16: 1, 2; Rev. 1: 10. Now, with reference to all these texts it may be observed, in the first place, that they do not contain or imply a divine command; all the argument derivable from them is inferential; and it really does seem unlikely, that if our Lord had intended legally to establish a Sabbath institute in his church—an institute, be it observed, which, when it was ordained as a part of a former dispensation, had been introduced in the most solemn manner, "with thunders, and lightnings, and the sound of a trumpet, and with a voice which made those who heard it exceedingly fear and quake"—he would have given it in such a way, and so clearly, that his will respecting it could not be misunderstood. But allowing this to pass, and giving all the weight to the passages quoted which can legitimately be claimed for them, what, I would ask, do they unitedly prove? The utmost that can be deduced from them is the probability that the disciples were accustomed to meet on the first day of the week, most likely in the evening, for the breaking of bread; they do not imply that the first day of the week was in any degree regarded as a Sabbath, nor that the disciples desisted during the day from their ordinary avocations, nor even that they considered it a day, the hours of which were specially to be devoted to Christian worship. Is it not, rather, highly probable, that, being obliged as Jews to observe the last day of the week, so far as not to attend to their usual occupations, they should abstain from those avocations on the first day of the week likewise? Upon those, however, who assert that they did so abstain, lies the burden of proof; and it is certain that if a Sabbath law is to be sustained, further evidence must be adduced than that which has been yet furnished.

In conclusion, I would observe, that while I can find no Scripture authority for a weekly Sabbath, I have no objection, on social and religious grounds, to a weekly holiday; and as long as such a holiday exists—and for the sake of our busy millions, wearied and worn by the cares and labors of life, God grant it may never be lost to us—I have no doubt that spiritual men will feel it a privilege to employ it, in some measure at least, for spiritual purposes—more especially, in reference to the first day of the week, as so many interesting associations cluster brilliantly around it. There is no evidence, however, to support the opinion, that any thing which is lawful and right on other days is unlawful on this; and there is no reason why we should specially serve God on this day which would not apply equally to any other day, if it were equally possible for us to do so. Let us beware of the danger of applying to a day, justifiable on grounds of social and religious convenience only, the rules and principles of a day like the Jewish Sabbath; and, especially, let us beware of the danger of bringing Christianity down from its high moral position—as existing for spiritual purposes, and intended to make every day a Lord's day, and every act an act of worship—and converting it into an improved and modernized edition of Judaism—a system of days and ceremonies, which the higher spiritual attainments of the world must, sooner or later, sweep away.

I am aware, sirs, that the views I have expressed will conflict with those of many of your readers. I trust, however, to your candor to give them insertion. I shall be sorry to pain any one by the assertion of views which may to them appear erroneous; the searching times, however, upon which we have come, demand of all of us earnest thought and thorough investigation; and I cannot find a better apology than the old one, for giving expression to opinions different from those prevalent in our churches, "I am a friend of Plato, a friend of Socrates, but more a friend of TRUTH."

Believe me, dear sirs, yours very faithfully,

A SINCERE INQUIRER AFTER DIVINE TRUTH.

*I cannot help pointing out what strikes me as an error, in the, in many respects, able article in your last number. "A man," says Mr. Young, "is put to death for gathering sticks on the Sabbath day, which would not be done in gospel times. Does it follow that the Sabbath itself cannot belong to this dispensation?" The answer is obvious. It follows that it does not belong to this dispensation as an enactment in the Jewish law. If attended to on account of the enactment in Jewish law, the whole law must be obeyed. Mr. Young and the Sabbatarians place themselves on the horns of this dilemma; if they observe the Sabbath law in obedience to the Jewish enactment, they are wrong in not obeying the whole of the enactment, ("stoning with stones," &c.;) if they do not observe it in obedience to Jewish but New Testament law, it becomes at once a New Testament enactment, and they are wrong in wasting time by appealing to Old Testament authority. We will see shortly whether they are justified in the practice by any law of the New Testament.

The Sabbath Question.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—The letter of "A sincere Inquirer after Divine Truth," in your last number, will doubtless put the patience of some of your readers to rather a severe test, especially those connected with Sabbath Schools and those at the head of religious families.

Your correspondent congratulates himself on your having opened your columns to a "free" discussion on this subject, and free, indeed, has been the use he has made of your kindness.

Allow me to examine some of his positions and arguments.

1. "The law which says, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,' was given with no higher sanction, no greater solemnity, than that which says, 'He that smiteth his father or mother shall surely be put to death.'" Now, the first was given immediately from heaven by God himself, written with his own finger on stone, and the delivery thereof attended with fearful signs and wonders; the other was given mediately by Moses, unattended by any such awful demonstrations. If this does not constitute a difference of delivery and sanction, it is difficult to conceive what can possibly do so. Your correspondent says that the Ten Commandments were only introductory to the code of laws contained in the Book of Exodus; but that this is erroneous, may be justly concluded from the declaration of the prophet, "These words the Lord spake unto all your assembly out of the midst of the fire, out of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice, and he added no more." (Deut. 5: 22.)

2. "The law which our Lord 'came not to destroy but to fulfill,' was not the law of the Ten Commandments, but rather what may be called the moral law of the universe." What does your correspondent know, or what does any one know, of the moral law of the universe? Does he mean the moral law of this world? for we have not the slightest reason to suppose that Christ came either to destroy or to fulfill any other laws than those relating to the inhabitants of the earth. If he came to destroy any of the Ten Commandments, he came to destroy the whole; for he himself makes no distinction, except between the moral and the ceremonial law. The Ten Commandments were a formal and authoritative declaration of the moral law, which had traditionally descended through the whole period of the patriarchal dispensation, and were intended to bind the inhabitants of the earth to the end of time. The averment of the apostle in 2 Cor. 3: 7, is mis-stated by your correspondent. It was the glory of the ancient dispensation, which was "a ministration of death," that was "done away," and not "the law written and engraven on stones." The apostle is contending for the superior glory of the one, and not indicating the abrogation of the other.

3. "There is no evidence to support the opinion, that any thing which is lawful and right on other days is unlawful on this." I scarcely know how to deal with this statement. If it be true, any man is at liberty to follow his own inclinations, as to what day of the week he will observe as a Sabbath, which would introduce the greatest confusion into society, and annihilate the Sabbath altogether. If it be true, all the lawful business of the country on Monday may lawfully be done on Sunday. But I may safely leave this position to the condemnation of the readers of "The Church," as pregnant with the greatest mischief to morality and religion.

One word as to the general question. "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," appears in the "Statutes of the Lord," as the high behest of Heaven, with as severe a sanction as "Thou shalt do no murder." If the one fall, so must the other. The change of the day makes no difference in the spirit of the institution, though it does in the letter. The change of the day from the seventh to the first, has been sanctioned by "holy men of God" from the days of the apostles inclusive; and he is a bold and dangerous innovator who would now tell us, after 1800 years, that the "faithful in Christ Jesus" have, during that lengthened period, mistaken their Lord's will, with regard to such an important matter as the observance of the Sabbath day. A spirit of "free thinking" is abroad in the present age, that requires to be fearlessly met, and strenuously opposed, by the friends of the "faith once delivered to the saints."

I am, dear sir, yours truly, JAMES LEIGH.

DR. CAREY'S EARLY STRUGGLES.

Carey was a journeyman shoemaker, in the small hamlets of Hackleton, a few miles from Northampton; and when, as a "consecrated cobbler," (the term of reproach applied to him by Sidney Smith, in sneering at his missionary efforts,) he removed to the neighboring village of Moulton, it was to preach to a small congregation of Baptists, for a salary under £20 a year, and to teach a school besides, that he might eke out a scanty livelihood. To Sidney Smith, as to nine-tenths of the British population at that time, it looked ridiculous enough that such a man should, not only trouble his own mind, and try for years to trouble the minds of others about the conversion of 420,000,000 of pagans; but that he should actually propose that he himself should be sent out to execute the project. He succeeded at last, however, in obtaining liberty to bring the subject before a small religious community, of which he was a member; and on the 2d of October, 1792, at a meeting of the Baptist Association at Kettering, it was resolved to form a missionary society; but when the sermon was preached and the collection made, it was found to amount to no more than £12 13*s* 6*d*. With such agents as Carey, and collections like this of Kettering to support them, Indian missions appeared a fit quarry for that shaft, which none knew better than our Edinburg reviewer how to use; and yet, looking somewhat more narrowly at the "consecrated cobbler," there was something about him, even at the beginning, sufficient to disarm ridicule; for if we notice him in his little garden, he will be seen motionless for an hour or more, in the attitude of intense thought; or if we join him in his evening hours, we shall find him reading the Bible, in one or other of four different languages, with which he has already made himself familiar; or if we follow him into his school, we shall discover him with a large leather globe, of his own construction, pointing out to the village urchins the different kingdoms of the earth, saying, "These are Christians, these are Mohammedans, and these are pagans!" his voice stopped by strong emotion as he repeats, and re-repeats the last mournful utterance. Carey sailed to India in 1793. Driven by the jealousy of thr East India Company out of an English ship, in which he was about to sail, he took his passage in a Danish vessel, and chose a Danish settlement in India for his residence; yet he lived till from that press which he established at Serampore, there had issued 212,000 copies of the sacred Scriptures in forty different languages—the vernacular tongues of 330,000,000 immortal beings, of whom more than 100,000,000 were British subjects, and till he had seen expended upon that noble object, on behalf of which the first small offertng at Kettering was presented, no less a sum than £91,500.

"LIGHTEN OUR DARKNESS."

BY MRS. ABDY.

"Lighten our darkness," gracious Lord,
  Watch o'er us while we sleep,
From every ill that walks abroad,
  Thy faithful servants keep;
And should'st thou send a dream of thee,
  To glad us in the night,
Soon shall the shades of darkness flee
  Before its cheering light.

"Lighten our darkness," gracious Lord,
  When forth at day we go,
Teach us the doctrines of thy Word,
  To praise as well as know;
And should the skeptic's doubt and sneer
  Attempt our faith to blight,
Aid us to make thy counsel clear,
  And pierce the cloud with light.

"Lighten our darkness," gracious Lord,
  When shadowed round by death;
The image of thy Son afford,
  To soothe our failing breath;
Lead us on him our hopes to place,
  And bid us trust his might,
Who turned, by his redeeming grace,
  Our darkness into light.

OPENING OF SERMONS.

On Sunday last, says the Newark Daily, the preacher of the German Methodist church in Market street began his sermon so beautifully and solemnly, that it is worth remembering. After laying down his firstly, secondly, thirdly, he uttered a long sentence in his own native German, which may be shortened thus—"I have now placed before you the outlines of my discourse, and may I be so aided in speaking, and you in attendance and understanding, that before we go from this house we shall feel that the Divine Presence is here."

Dr. McC. of New Jersey, who has recently sailed for Europe, was once invited to preach in the old Dutch Church, now the Post Office in New York. Knowing that his audience did not allow their ministers to use notes, he went on smoothly through the introduction of his sermon without them, but after announcing his firstly, secondly, and thirdly, he said: "Now brethren, I have laid before you my discourse, and I beg you will permit me to lay it before myself." So saying he took his manuscripts and placed them in front on the desk.

Old Dominie L——g, of the Dutch Church, celebrated for his goodness and his homely originality, on an excessively hot summer Sunday, when announcing his text, read off four verses, and said, this is the foundation of the first head of my discourse; after reading four more, he said, this is the ground of the second head of my discourse; and reading another four, this is the foundation of the third head of my discourse. Then stepping back and pulling off his warm cloth coat, he hung it on the side of the pulpit, and, conspicuous in his white linen sleeves, he began: "Now, brethren, depend upon it, we have got a job before us."

THE PET FAWN.

A pretty little fawn had been brought in very young from the woods, and nursed and petted by a lady until it had become very tame. It was so graceful, gentle, and playful, that it became a universal favorite. One morning, after its usual gambols, it threw itself down in the sunshine at the feet of one of its friends, upon the steps of a store. There came along a countryman who had been a hunter, with one of his hounds. The dog suddenly stopped near the young deer; the little animal saw him and started to its feet, instinctively taught that an enemy was at hand. Its whole character and appearance were changed; and all its past habits were forgotten, every wild impulse was awake, its head erect, its nostrils dilated, its eye flashing. In another instant the fawn was leaping wildly through the street, and the hound in full pursuit. The friends who had long fed and fondled it called its name in vain. The hunter endeavored to whistle back his dog, but with no better success. The fawn dashed onward to the lake, the hound and the village dogs at his heels. Men, women, and children, anxious for the fate of the pet fawn, crowded the shore or threw themselves into boats to intercept the hound before he reached his prey. The little animal directed its course across a bay towards the border of a forest, and the owner of the hound crossed a bridge, running at full speed, hoping to seize his dog as he landed. The fawn touched the land, and in another instance it would reach the cover of the woods. The hound followed, arriving at the same spot. His master was now coming up at the most critical moment. Would the dog hearken to his voice, or could the hunter seize and control him in time?

A shout from the village bank proclaimed that the fawn had passed out of sight into the forest; at the same instant, the hound, as he touched the land, felt the hunter's strong arm clutching his neck.

The woods were searched in vain for the lost fawn. Some thought it would return after its flight was over, of its own accord. It wore a collar with its owner's name upon it. Before many hours a hunter came to the lady whose pet the little creature had been, and showing a collar with her name upon it, said, that he had been out in the woods and saw a fawn in the distance; the little animal, instead of bounding away as he had expected, moved towards him; he took aim, fired, and shot it to the heart. When he found the collar about its neck he was very sorry that he had killed it. And so the poor little thing died. One would have thought that terrible chase would have made it afraid of man; but no, it forgot the evil and remembered the kindness only, and came to meet as a friend the hunter who shot it.

This beautiful story, condensed from "Rural Hours," conveys more than one moral lesson.

Like the pet fawn, the "wild impulses" and passions of our nature may be tamed or restrained by grace; but they still exist, and when least expected, they may gain the mastery.

Had the fawn trusted its friends instead of its feet, it would have been safe. Self-dependence is too apt to take the place of simple faith in times of trouble and temptation. We may then learn from the fawn, to cling the closer to our best Friend when the "roaring lion" crosses our pathway, or when fright or passion would drive us to the mountains of sin.

Just as the hound was seized at the critical moment, and the panting fawn rescued, so is many a child of God snatched from danger when most in peril. "Man's extremity is God's opportunity."

Unlike the fate of the fawn, if at last we will return, we shall meet no cruel, fatal wound. Christ was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities. His arms are open to receive us. Come, then, from your wanderings and from your enemies, to the only place of safety and peace, the cross of Christ.

REVIVAL SCENE IN VERMONT.

Rev. James Gallaher communicates to the New York Evangelist several interesting facts that came under his notice in connection with recent revivals in Vermont. Such a scene as is described below, is suited to send a thrill through the hearts of the redeemed on earth, and cause joy among the angels. Speaking of the fruits of Divine influence in Northern New England, were he has labored, Mr. G. says:—

Very hopeless cases have been reached, we trust savingly, by the Spirit of God. As a sample take the following: At Walden, in Caledonia Co., Vt., the meeting had continued through five successsive days. The solemnity had been deep and extensive. The design was to close the services with the afternoon sermon on the fifth day. The sermon was preached, the closing hymn sung, and the minister had risen to pronounce the final benediction, when behold, at the extreme end of the church from the pulpit, sprung up a man somewhat past the meridian of life. "I wish the liberty of saying a few things before the congregation is dismissed." These words were spoken with a loud voice, and in a manner somewhat hurried and agitated. They effectually arrested the attention of the entire audience. The officiating minister paused, the assembly was not dismissed, and the speaker went on. "You know me, you all know me. I have been an enemy of this church, I have professed atheism, and have long tried to believe it. I have spoken publicly and bitterly against the members of this church, and have aimed to injure them. I now confess the folly and wickedness of what I have done, and I have risen to ask the members of your church to forgive the unkind and ungenerous treatment which they have received at my hands, and to pray for me that I may have forgiveness from God."

"Do you desire that we should pray for you now," asked the minister.

"Yes, now."

"Then come forward into this open space before the pulpit, and we will kneel down and call on the name of a forgiving God."

The relenting atheist left his position at the extreme end of the church, and with the solemnity of a funeral procession, marched forward into the vacant space in front of the pulpit. Deep and awful were the emotions of that congregation as they looked on, and witnessed this movement. The atheist was known to them all. But a little time since, they had seen him engaged in circulating, with much industry and zeal, the profane publications of Abner Kneeland. They had heard him deriding sacred things, while he cast "fire-brands, arrows, and death," at those who were called by the name of the Lord Jesus, and now "behold he prayeth." As he stood in front of the pulpit, before kneeling down for prayer, the eyes of all were fastened on him, and it seemed as if the crowded assembly almost held its breath in the profound stillness and solemnity of the moment. It looked as if indeed, "the dead had heard the voice of the Son of God."

"Are there any others in the house," asked the officiating minister, "who wish to unite with this man in requesting that prayer for your salvation may be offered up to a prayer-hearing God? If so, come forward at once and take your place beside him." There was an instantaneous rush from all parts of the house, and presently thirty-eight persons, many of them old and grey-headed, kneeled down together, while the church united in solemn prayer. Many of the children of God then present could fully appreciate the beautiful lines of the sweet singer of Israel,

"I've seen thy glory and thy power
  Through all thy temple shine;
My God, repeat that heavenly hour,
  That vision so so divine."

SABBATH RAIN.

"It is very bad for the health to sit in church with wet clothes and damp feet."

Well, it is. At the same time, Sabbath rain is not worse than week-day rain, although there is apparently as much greater terror of it.

The following considerations may suit the case of some "fair-whether" church-goers.

It is as bad for the minister as for the people, and yet he must be there. Through rain or snow he must go, dry if he can, but if not he must go. His health is not better than that of the male members of his congregation generally, usually not so good. And if the rain furnishes no excuse for his absence, it furnishes none for theirs. If you say it is his business to go, so it is theirs—there is one law for both. And,

A wedding, a concert, a party, a fair, seldom wait for the whether. They are rarely put off on account of the storm. I have noticed that when people are excited they rarely suffer from the exposure. If there was a little more interest in church going, a little more unction in the worshipers, would it not prove favorable to health?

Bad whether reduces a church congregation quite out of proportion to any other collection of people. Why, the other evening, a Thursday meeting was given up on account of the whether, no one but the minister and one lady coming, (which was hardly enough to plead the promise and secure the blessing;) and yet the minister met some twenty-five people that same evening assembled in a parlor, who seemed quite unconscious that it was raining. And how they ever got there on foot, without soiling their silk dresses, or damping their feet, has been a mystery to him ever since. Here was a religious meeting completely collapsed, and a social party reduced only about twenty per cent., and all by the same storm. How is it that the rain is much more terrible "hard by the synagogue," than it is about town? It is quite true that many "women and children" are precluded from attending church in storms. But, verily, four or five hundred per cent. is too much to allow for shrinkage, in common congregations. We should be made of sterner stuff. We should be less the sport of circumstances. Satan waits not for fair weather. He does his work in "thunder, lightning, and in rain," and we ought to be as busy as he. God has never said, "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths and reverence my sanctuary, except when it storms."

TRIBUTE TO DR. JUDSON.

The report submitted at the late anniversary of the Missionary Union on the Union and its missions, written by Dr. Peck, opens with the following beautifully expressed tribute to the memory of Dr. Judson. We quote from the Macedonian:—

"On the 12th of April, 1850, the Rev. Adoniram Judson, D. D., ceased from his labors; and his body was entombed to await the day, when, 'at the voice of the archangel and the trump of God,' the sea shall give up its dead.

"In that far-reaching event, the Executive Committee, the Board, the Missionary Union, were stricken and afflicted. Dr. Judson had been a missionary of this Board from the day of its institution. God gave him to us when as yet we were few and without strength, and there was none who could "go for us." Around him had gathered our earliest, our deepest, missionary sympathies. We had known of him at Rangoon, at Ava, in the prison at Oung-pen-la. We had joined in his ascriptions of 'praise and glory,' when garnering the first ripe fruits of his spiritual increase. We had bowed the knee with him, as, with humility and grateful tears, he spread before the Lord the last leaf of the Scriptures of the New and Old Testaments translated into the Burmese tongue. He had been, as concerned our Foreign Missions, a leader and exemplar. All eyes were turned to him. Respect, affection, veneration, swayed all our hearts. He was a man, and as a man, he was 'subject to like passions as we are;' but he was a man of God, chosen and ordained of God to do and to suffer for his name's sake; and God was with him. God strengthened him. God sanctified him. God replenished him with faith and constancy; and in the hour of deepest anguish poured into his heart His exceeding consolations. God gave him grace to abide, and he did abide, a faithful and true witness, till his testimony was filled up and the book was sealed."

"BY HOOK OR BY CROOK."

The destruction caused by the fire in London A. D. 1666, during which some 13,200 houses, &c., were burned down, in very many cases obliterated all the boundary marks requisite to determine the extent of land, and even the very sites occupied by buildings previous to this terrible visitation. When the rubbish was removed, and the land cleared, the disputes and entangled claims of those whose houses had been destroyed, both as to the position and extent of their property, promised not only interminable occupation of the courts of law, but made the far more serious evil of delaying the rebuilding of the city, until those disputes were settled, inevitably. Impelled by the necessity of coming to a more speedy settlement of their respective claims than could be hoped for from legal process, it was determined that the claims and interests of all persons concerned should be referred to the judgment and decision of two of the most experienced land surveyors of that day—men who had been thoroughly acquainted with London previously to the fire; and in order to escape from the numerous and vast evils which more delay must occasion, that the decision of these two arbitrators should be final and binding. The surveyors appointed to determine the rights of the various claimants were Mr. Hook and Mr. Crook, who, by the justice of their decisions, gave general satisfaction to the interested parties, and by their speedy determination of the different claims, permitted the rebuilding of the city to proceed without the least delay. Hence arose the saying above quoted, usually applied to the extrication of persons or things from a difficulty. The above anecdote was told the other evening by an old citizen upwards of eighty, by no means of an imaginative temperament.

THE PILLOW FOR THE NIGHT.—To sleep well, lay these things under your head:—

1. A precious promise out of Scripture.
2. A sweet verse of some evangelical hymn.
3. A hearty prayer to God.
4. A good conscience, purified with Christ's blood.
5. A feeling of forgiveness and charity to all mankind.
6. A resolution to serve God on the morrow.
7. A glance of faith at the cross. [Am. Mess.

THE ATHEIST IN COURT.

A recent judicial decision, in one of our sister States, that the testimony of an Atheist is inadmissible, naturally prompts inquiry as to the compatibility of such decision with the spirit of our free institutions. Holding, as we do, that government should be so framed and administered as to secure equality of rights to all, we can not help doubting its soundness. View it in whatever light we will, it appears to place a stigma upon a man's character merely because of his religious opinions, notwithstanding his behavior as a citizen may be without reproach. In ordinary cases, a man's testimony is rejected, because the facts of his character give evidence that he has no regard for truth. But in the case of an Atheist the facts may be otherwise. His character for veracity may be unimpeachable. He may have been known by all his neighbors as a man of uprightness in his dealings, and in his general intercourse with society. Yet because he does not believe in the retributions of a future life, he is treated as if he had been notorious for his disregard of truth! We confess, that in our simple, unsophisticated way of viewing things, we do not see the justice of this.

We say, Treat all man alike. Let every man be considered honest and truthful, till there are facts which prove the contrary. We are as ready to admit, as any others, that the principles of Atheism are unfriendly to habits of truth; and where they are thoroughly wrought into the heart, a man cannot be expected to tell the truth any farther than he may feel it for his interest to do so. But when it is considered, that it is in the power of the Court to punish a man who gives false testimony with imprisonment, and that he forever afterwards becomes disqualified from standing as a witness, it is surely for the Atheist's interest to speak the truth; and so far as responsibility to the Court is concerned, just as much for his interest as if he believed in the retributions of eternity. If he wishes to avoid incarceration in a prison, if he wishes to maintain his standing in society, his interest lies in speaking "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." It is certainly fair to presume, that under the influence of motives appealing so strongly to his welfare in the present life, he will give testimony of a reliable kind.

It is well known, however, that a man is often better at heart than his opinions. The Atheist is not always so thoroughly imbued with the sentiments which he professes, as to depart from rectitude of behaviour. And, on the other hand, the professed believer in Christianity is often worse than his principles. The doctrine of which he makes a noisy boast, has but little influence upon his life. We have known many infidels more correct in their general deportment than many who acknowledged their belief in the retributions of eternity. Yet the latter are permitted to testify, in Court, while the former are not. For our own part, we would quite as quickly receive the testimony of the former as of the latter, and we see no reason why Courts of justice should consider it less reliable.

As to the oath, we cannot say that we object to its use on conscientious grounds. We cannot resist the conviction, however, that many a witness who binds himself under its sanctions, speaks the truth more from a fear of incurring the civil penalties of its violation than from any regard to the consequences of perjury in the future life. Certain it is, that civil penalties constitute all the punishment which a court of justice can inflict upon any one who perjures himself. And why compel a man to bind himself under the sanction of an oath, when there is no power to enforce the sanction? If a court, after requiring a witness to testify under oath, could enforce the sanction, there would be some consistency in it. But it is evident that its power extends no farther than to make a man suffer in this life. We are not quite sure, therefore, but what the formality of the oath might be dispensed with altogether.

The solemn affirmation of the Quaker is admitted, we believe, in all the courts of the land. Does the Quaker bind himself, by his affirmation, under the dread sanctions of a future life? If he does, in what respect does his affirmation differ from an oath, except it be in the mere formality of kissing the Book, or raising the hand? It is a difference only in name, not in reality. If he does not, we see not why his testimony should be considered any more reliable than that of any other man who sustains an equally fair character. If the Athiest is as generally upright in his behavior as the Quaker, we see no reason why his testimony should not be as readily admitted in a court of justice.

JEWS IN HOLLAND.

A letter from Mr. Schwartz, of Amsterdam, to the Missionary Record of the Free Church of Scotland, describes the state of the Jews in that city, and in Europe generally, as deplorable enough. We quote a passage.

I have seen them in Germany, in Hungary, and in Constantinople—have frequently come in contact with them in all these places; but, I do confess, I never knew what a tremendous influence Rabbinism exercises upon its professors, and with what a strong grasp the synagogue holds fast her members, till I came to this place, where thousands of Jews live close together, depending upon one another, where they can scarcely speak or move without being closely watched and observed, so that thousands are tyrannized by the influence of a few rich orthodox men, to whose sway the whole synagogue is subjected. It is impossible to give you by writing an accurate idea of the ignorance and bigotry of the great mass of the Jews here, nor can I describe to you all the various means that are continually employed to keep their minds in ignorance and darkness, and to prevent them from becoming acquainted with the truths of the gospel. For a time we were permitted to go on unmolested; but as soon as the leaders found out that a great many Jews came to our meetings, some of whom attended quite regularly every Saturday, a mighty opposition was raised, threats and promises, earnest entreaties and vile calumnies, were made use of, and it is indeed a wonder that there are still Jews coming so regularly to my house and church, to receive religious instruction, and to speak about the welfare of their souls. It is a great blessing that we are permitted to sow the good seed. Some that promised well, and of whom we expected much, have sadly fallen back—and such disappointments must certainly be reckoned among the severest trials of missionary life—whilst a few have remained steadfast, and especially one Israelite has, as I fully believe, been savingly brought to the Lord.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

The Anniversaries of our Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies, are to be held with the First Church in Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., on the 11th, 12th and 14th days of September next. The occasion is usually one of deep interest, and always of great importance. It is hoped that individuals and churches will remember it in their prayers, and also make provision for the attendance of a large delegation. Meanwhile it may be in place for us to say something in regard to the operations and necessities of these Societies.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society was organized some eight years ago, for "the dissemination of the Gospel in America and other parts of the world." It has now four missionaries in China, and is aiding feeble churches and destitute regions in this country as means are provided and opportunities offer. During the last year it has, besides meeting its ordinary expenses, raised between three and four thousand dollars to build a missionary chapel in Shanghae. For the collection of its funds and the transaction of its business, the Society relies mainly upon the voluntary and gratuitous agency of its officers and friends in the various churches. Fears have been expressed, that this year, in consequence of the special effort to raise means to build a chapel, the receipts for general purposes would fall short of expenses. We hope that these fears may prove groundless. To this end we beg leave to suggest, that an effort be made in each church, previous to the Anniversary, to raise a sum proportionate to the number of members, which may be forwarded directly to the Treasurer, A. D. Titsworth, of New Brunswick, N. J., or sent by the delegates to the meeting in Brookfield, to be by them paid over to the Treasurer there at the earliest possible moment, so as to be included in his report for the current year. If this plan were generally adopted, the missionary treasury would be replenished, the interest in the forthcoming Anniversary increased, and the hearts of the members of the Board and all connected with them encouraged.

The American Sabbath Tract Society continues its efforts "to promote the scriptural observance of the Sabbath, in connection with the interests of vital godliness and sound morality, by the circulation of religious tracts, and the employment of colporteurs and lecturers." At the last Anniversary it was resolved to raise one thousand dollars for this object during the current year. As yet, however, the receipts have not reached that point by a considerable sum. Many churches have not forwarded any thing. There is still time to do it, however, and it is important that the time be improved. No church should fail to send in its annual contribution. Thomas B. Stillman of New York is the Treasurer.

The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society relies for its income mainly upon the receipts from its publications. If this were the place, we would suggest (as there is large occasion to do) the importance of promptness in meeting the claims of the Society on this score. But as we are not now writing a newspaper dun, we will simply say, that the Society is desirous of numbering among its members many whose names are not now found in the list which accompanies each Annual Report. Five dollars makes one a member of the Society, and twenty-five dollars an honorary director with the privilege of attending the meetings of the Board. This money goes to create a fund on which the publishing business is transacted—the profits of the business to be appropriated, under the direction of the Board, to missionary, tract, and educational purposes—and the fund itself, if ever for any reason divided, to be devoted to the same purposes. Within the year a number of brethren have voluntarily sent in the sums necessary to make themselves members, and it is hoped that many others will take advantage of the approaching Anniversary to do the same.

In order successfully to conduct the operations of our Societies—the Boards of which perform all their labors gratuitously, and the funds of which are very little if at all expended in making collections—it is indispensably necessary that churches and individuals feel the obligation resting upon them to contribute their quota promptly and without personal solicitation. In years past this has been done in a commendable manner. We hope that the reports of the Treasurers this year will show a disposition to continue in well doing.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

[The same mail which brought us Mr. Begg's letter dated July 25th, and published in the Recorder last week, brought us also a letter dated June 13, which has probably taken a long journey in some wrong direction. We copy that portion of it which has not been superseded by later intelligence.]

The German correspondent even of Evangelical Christendom, (the organ of the Alliance which makes Sunday-keeping one of the objects of its care,) in the number for last month, expresses great suspicion of what may come out of what he calls a "simultaneous crusade against Sunday desecration in France, Austria, and Prussia." He refers to a recently-published decree of the Imperial Austrian Government, proposing to prevent, by the infliction of temporal pains and penalties, not the desecration, but the non-consecration of Sunday; and fears that it may be but "the introduction to compulsory attendance on the mass." And referring to the expectation of Continental Papists, that they will speedily regain the dominion they lost by the Reformation, he adds, "Nor is there small ground for dreading its realization in countries where Protestantism is an inheritance, not a conviction, and where human compositions, under whatever name, and human statutes, are made the test and the rule of church fellowship, instead of simple adherence to God's revealed Word."

A departure from this "simple adherence to God's revealed Word" is undoubtedly the root of Popery, and it is this amongst Protestants generally which justifies fears of farther departure; but how little this correspondent apprehends his own condition, may be inferred when I add, that he proceeds "with more satisfaction" to notice "The Prussian Evangelical Supreme Ecclesiastical Council's" Report on the same subject of Sunday sanctification, prepared by command of the Prussian monarch. It recommends His Majesty "to command the administrative adoption of such measures" as will insure Sunday observance by "prohibiting and punishing desecration." What then is to be said as to the evil of putting "human statutes" in the place of "God's revealed Word?"

In Scotland, the Inverness Exchange Reading Room, which, at the annual meeting recently held was ordered to be shut on Sundays, was ten days ago voted to be reöpened, by a majority of 35. * * * *

The schism in the Methodist church is extending. The number of members who have seceded from the lordly conference during the past year, as testified by their own organ, from certified statistics, is 55,852. Still there seems little of the spirit of contrition among the leaders; and the courage and confidence of the seceders have been increased by the view taken by the court of the position of many of the chapels with debt upon them. Bonds on such chapels are, in many cases, in the hands of wealthy members who have seceded, and the congregations being weakened in numbers are less able to cancel these bonds, so that when sold they may be purchased for the use of the seceders. This is but a worldly means of success, but the other party also rely on their advantages of similar nature.

J. A. BEGG.

CALLING THE FIRST DAY THE "SABBATH DAY."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It is time to speak out plainly. It is time to "cry aloud and spare not." The man who has read the New Testament, and still calls the first day of the week the Sabbath day, practices an imposition; because the apostles invariably called the seventh day of the week the "Sabbath day," for many years after the resurrection of Christ, and never called the first day of the week the Sabbath or rest-day. The man who secularizes the seventh-day Sabbath, which Christ says "was made for man," and calls the first day of the week the Sabbath day, is guilty of sacrilege; for he takes that particular portion of time which God has blessed, sanctified, and set apart for a holy use, and converts it to his own use as a day of labor. "Thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege?" He is guilty of stealing—of taking without liberty that portion of time which God calls "my holy day," and appropriating it to his own use. He is guilty of robbery—of robbing the Creator of the glory of that memorial which he has given of his works of creation. "Will a man rob God?" He is guilty of sin; for "sin is the transgression of the law," and that says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," yet he every week transgresses the law of God, which is holy, and just, and good. He is guilty of laying aside the commandment of God, and of teaching for doctrine the commandment of men. He is guilty of "changing the truth of God into a lie;" for "all his commandments are truth—they stand fast for ever and ever, and are done in truth and righteousness." He is guilty of helping to "change times and laws," and to cast the truth to the ground. (See Dan. 7: 25, and 8: 12.) He is guilty of upholding and helping the man of sin, who "opposeth himself above all that is called God." His practice, and the influence of his practice, (if not his words and votes,) persecute and wound the feelings of those who would "keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." Thus the reader may see, that the professedly learned Christian, who stands up in a public assembly, and calls the first day of the week "the Christian Sabbath," imposes upon the Christian religion, imposes upon the New Testament, and imposes upon the feelings of the pious Christian who delights in the law of God.

WEST INDIA EMANCIPATION.

The Christian Watchman and Reflector says that Rev. Mr. Oughton, who has been laboring as an English Baptist Missionary in Jamaica during the last sixteen years, recently preached several times in Boston. One evening he gave an account of the interesting scenes which occurred in Jamaica, at the time of the emancipation of the slaves on that island, in 1838. He described the entire failure of the apprenticeship system, and the desire of the Colonial Legislature, consisting of the slaveholders themselves, that it might come to an end. Mr. O. was present at one of the famous midnight prayer meetings of the pious slaves, held to usher in the ever memorable First of August. At this meeting the time was principally spent in remarks and audible prayer by the pastor, until ten minutes before twelve o'clock, when all prostrated themselves on their knees in silent devotion, supplication and gratitude to their Almighty Deliverer. When the clock struck twelve, the congregation, consisting of several thousands, arose and broke forth spontaneously in singing, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," &c. The next evening another prayer and conference meeting was held, near the close of which, somewhat to the surprise of the pastor, a large, black, gloomy-looking coffin was brought into the meeting-house, and placed on a bier in front of the pulpit. On the top of the coffin was engraved, "SLAVERY IN JAMAICA DIED 1ST OF AUGUST, 1838." They then cast into the coffin the various insignia and accompaniments of slavery. One threw in a pair of handcuffs, another a set of shackles, another a chain, a fourth the lash of a whip cut into a thousand pieces, followed by the handle of the same, which a strong man, over his knee, cracked into shivers; then by torch-light the coffin was carried, with a mock solemnity, to one of the most dismal spots in the neighborhood, and there buried in a deep grave, after which, in the open air, and in the midst of a dense forest, the congregation united again in singing the Doxology in long meter, "Praise God," &c. Mr. O. stated that next day an incident occurred equally expressive of the joy, gratitude and domestic happiness which liberty had brought to the slaves. Thirty couples, attended by twice that number of groomsmen and bridesmaids, appeared on the grass plot in front of his house, the church not being large enough to accommodate them, to be united in holy wedlock. A more joyous wedding never occurred.

REV. DR. PENNINGTON.

The purchase of the fugitive slave Rev. Dr. Pennington, was done on behalf of his friends in Scotland, who raised the necessary funds. When the legal papers were received, they called a public meeting at Dunse, and with much rejoicing presented him with the evidences of his right and title to himself—a thing indispensably necessary to enable him safely to return to New York, and "feed the flock of God, over which the Holy Ghost made him overseer." It was stated at the meeting, that the Committee had raised the sum of £78, of which £54 had been expended, and the remainder was to be applied towards paying the Doctor's expenses home. Speeches were made on the occasion by several individuals, who mingled with their gratulations expressions of their horror and indignation at the system of American slavery. Dr. Pennington spoke long and eloquently in reply to the congratulatory address accompanying the deed of manumission. We copy the following account of his sufferings and labors from a newspaper report of his remarks:—

"No one of the American denominations has ever undertaken any systematic measures for the Christian instruction of the free people of color. There are no provisions for educating ministers and teachers to them. The people have been obliged to get help where best they could to build chapels, and candidates for the ministry have had to seek their own means for education. These difficulties were at their hight when I studied. It was considered intrusive for a colored young man to offer himself as a candidate for admission to a class even in a Theological Seminary. I bought my own books, &c., and paid my own classical tutors. I was refused admission to Yale Seminary, but I was told that I could sit with the classes as a visitor, and hear the lectures, but my voice could not be heard in the class-room asking or answering a question. (Cries of Hear, Hear.) I could not get a book from the library, and my name was never to appear on the catalogue. After submitting to this, will any one tell me that I know nothing about oppression? After my visitorship at Yale Seminary, I was licensed to preach in 1838, and the year following I was ordained as a pastor. From that time till I left home to visit this country, I was constantly engaged as an Anti-Slavery pastor and teacher to the colored people in the Free States. (Cheers.) In connection with local pastoral labors, I have served as an officer of the Vigilance Committee in some of its most perilous and pressing times; also the Connecticut State Anti-Slavery Society, the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and the American Anti-Slavery Missionary Society; besides these, many demands have been made upon my time in connection with all the popular movements for the immediate relief of the oppressed. But these labors have all been performed under the constant embarrassments and liabilities connected with the position of a self-emancipated but unredeemed man; so that I find myself under a debt of profound gratitude to the kind friends in Dunse, Berwick, and Kelso, &c., who have furnished ample means for this ransom. I am deeply indebted to the Committee at Dunse, and especially to Mr. James Thomson, the honorable chairman, and Mr. Thomas Thomson, the secretary, (cheers,) for having, in connection with my faithful negotiator, John Hooker, Esq., in America (great cheering) managed so admirably the business part of the matter. I am more than ever satisfied, that in the chattel principle lies the diabolism of slavery. A shackled man cannot think, feel, and act freely and fully as a man. This deliverance deepens my experience on the subject. I feel now that I can go and stand up among the men of my country. I shall ever esteem it to be one of the greatest events in my whole life, that by your aid I have been delivered from this property principle of slavery (loud cheering.) I may also, in conclusion, tender you the thanks of my church and Christian congregation in New York, and many other dear friends who have suffered and sympathized with me in all I have suffered, and who are only now impatient to rejoice with me in the result (applause.) I have wrought in your pulpits, I have wrought in your school-rooms, yea, and that my right hand might not forget her cunning, I have wrought a little in some of your blacksmiths' shops (laughter.) I believe I may say, too, that I have introduced the question of American slavery into more Christian pulpits in this country than any preceding visitor from America; and, in addition to the platforms of this country and England, it has been my good fortune to advocate the cause of the slave in three countries of the Continent." (Cries of Hear, Hear.)

CANADIAN REFUGEE HOME SOCIETY.—Under this title a Society has been formed in Michigan for the purpose of raising money to purchase fifty thousand acres of Canada land, which is to be divided into plots of twenty-five acres, and deeded to the family of any refugee from American slavery who is disposed to settle upon it. It is said that there are now between thirty and forty thousand of these exiles in Canada, many of whom are anxious to settle upon farms, and obtain a livelihood by agricultural pursuits. The Canada Company has for sale, in the southern and western parts of the Province, 700,000 acres of land, with a rich soil, well stocked with timber, and in a climate as mild and genial as parts of New York, Ohio, or Michigan. From this it is proposed to purchase as fast as the necessary funds can be raised. Several agents have been commissioned to make collections for the object.

THE COLORED PEOPLE OF INDIANA.—The laws of Indiana are very stringent against the colored people, and a convention was recently held to consider the subject. It is said that there existed among its members a strong inclination to remove out of the State of Indiana to some other country, where they hoped to enjoy greater social advantages. After much debate, a resolution was adopted by a large majority, providing that, should the laws of the State become so oppressive as to be intolerable, they would recommend their people to emigrate to Canada, Jamaica, or elsewhere, in preference to Liberia. Among the countries spoken of for the purpose of migration, besides those mentioned, are Mexico, New Grenada, and Central America; but Canada is generally regarded as most eligible, on account of its accessibility. At last accounts the Convention had under discussion a resolution somewhat contradictory to that which had just been passed, as mentioned above. It asserts, in substance, that the free negroes have a right to remain, if they choose, in the United States, the land of their nativity; and it accordingly recommends them to stay there and strive for their social, political, and intellectual elevation.

CINCINNATI THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The Independent learns from the Presbyterian of the West, that Rev. Willis Lord, D. D., pastor of a Congregational church in Cincinnati has been unanimously elected a professor and has accepted the appointment. All the professors are pastors of churches, and one of them, Dr. N. L. Rice, is also editor of the paper referred to. Should it succeed on this basis, it may suggest plans applicable to other cities and other denominations. The editor says:—

"The entire success of this seminary, if it has been at any time regarded as problematical, can no longer be so considered. With a central position in the Great West, with a most inviting field within which young men may labor during their course, with boarding and expenses as cheap as in any other seminary, with the advantage of access without charge to an extensive and rapidly increasing library and reading-room, and with a full faculty, we entertain no fears for the future."

A WISCONSIN COLLEGE.—Beloit College, in Wisconsin, held its commencement on the 9th of July. The exercises were in the open air, and the number of graduates three. Concerning the prospects of the College, a correspondent of the Prairie Herald says:—

"This is the first class that the College has graduated. It is the first ripe fruit of the prayers and self-denying efforts of the founders and patrons of this institution. And it was a glad day to the many friends of the College who were present; an earnest of the rich harvest they may hope to reap in coming years. The College is in a very prosperous condition. It has an able faculty of a president and four professors, besides a tutor in the languages, and affords ample advantages for a thorough course of collegiate study. Fifteen have already been admitted to the new Freshman Class."

ANTI-MISSION MOVEMENT IN INDIA.—A correspondent of one of the London papers, writing from India, says that the suspension of the State allowance to the temple of Juggernauth, and some cases which have been decided in accordance with the recently-passed Toleration Act, have given rise to an anti-missionary movement among the orthodox Hindoos at Calcutta. At all three Presidencies an English education is considered by all classes of natives as the shortest road to wealth, and the only cheap English education obtainable is that afforded by the mission schools. Many thousands of native children are accordingly educated at these institutions, and now and then a Hindoo youth is converted, much to the scandal of the native community. Many of these, on arriving at years of discretion, are desirous of returning to the religion of their fathers, but they have hitherto been prevented from so doing by the impossible severity of the mode of expiating loss of caste (wandering 48 years as an ascetic) hitherto insisted on. A great meeting of orthodox Hindoos has accordingly been held at Calcutta, for the purpose of substituting a milder form of expiation. It was stated at the meeting, that there were 50 Christian converts at Calcutta, who would return to the Hindoo creed as soon as the milder form of penance was assented to."

ITEMS OF RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Rev. Dr. Baird is now on a visit to Europe. His objects is said to be, to procure a number of well-qualified missionaries to labor among the different classes of emigrants landing on our shores, each in his own tongue, to be sustained by the American and Foreign Christian Union. It is also his purpose to establish, if practicable, American preaching-chapels in Paris, Turin, and other cities in Southern Europe.

Rev. Doctor Baker, an energetic missionary of the Old School Presbyterian Church in Texas, visited the North last year for the purpose of obtaining the means of erecting a College in that State. He lately reported himself to have succeeded in collecting the handsome sum of $36,500, with which he proposes to commence the erection of suitable buildings in Austin the present fall.

Rev. William M. Rogers, the founder, and, until recently, pastor of the Central Congregational Church in Winter-street, Boston, died of paralysis on Monday, Aug. 11, in the 46th year of his age. Mr. R. was born in Aldney, England, but educated at Harvard and Andover. His original name was Sam'l Kettle; but he adopted the name of a relative as the required condition of inheriting his estate.

An effort is making to endow the Delaware College, (situate at Newark, Del., and under the auspices of the New School Presbyterian denomination,) by establishing one thousand scholarships at $100 each, i. e., every donor to that amount being entitled to the free instruction of one scholar forever thereafter.

In February, 1850, a chief in Duketown, near Old Calabar, Africa, died, and seventeen slaves were instantly killed and buried with him, and twelve more were bound and doomed to death, but were rescued through the efforts of Mr. Anderson, of the United Presbyterian Church.

The choice and well-selected library of the late Dr. Neander, of Berlin, has been purchased for the use of Lane Seminary, at Cincinnati, for $3,000. It contains 4,600 volumes, and is peculiarly rich in ecclesiastical history, the special province of the learned German.

A number of colored persons, both slave and free, were arrested in New Orleans, not long since, for the crime of assembling to worship God! A New Orleans paper mentions, as an evidence of criminality, that one of them had a Bible and three prayer books.

Dr. Olin, President of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., died on Sabbath morning last at his residence in Middleburg. Dr. Olin was a man of eminence in the Methodist Episcopal Church in this country.

We see it mentioned that Rev. Mr. Wade, of the Burmese mission, has assumed the charge of the church formerly under the care of Dr. Judson. The number of church members is 149.

At the late Maine Methodist Conference, a donation of $500 was made by R. C. Dunn, as the nest-egg of a permanent fund for the support of the widows and orphans of deceased preachers in that State.

Father Mathew has converted an eminent brewer of Cincinnati to temperance principles. He has closed his establishment, discharged his hands, and will neither drink himself nor brew any more for others to guzzle.

At the late Commencement of Hamilton College, N. Y., the Honorary Degree of D. D. was conferred upon the Rev. Eli Noyes, pastor of the Roger Williams Free-will Baptist Church in Providence.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions will hold their annual meeting the present year in Portland, Me., during the second week in September next.

Letters have been received, stating that Mrs. Judson, for whose safety fears had been entertained, was at Cape Town in good health on the 26th of May, to sail for England.

Rev. Daniel Temple, for many years a Missionary of the American Board in Smyrna, recently died at Reading, Mass., where he has been for several years settled as a Pastor.

Thirteen colleges have been enjoying the outpourings of the Spirit of God since the concert of prayer for colleges in February.

SIGNIFICANT INSCRIPTIONS.—A correspondent of the Cleveland True Democrat says that the following inscriptions were taken from the grave-stones of a man and his wife, (who were Africans by birth,) in the town of Jaffrey, N. H. They strike him, and probably will others, as not consonant with that line which describes this country as "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

A CONVERT FROM POPERY.—A distinguished French priest, by the name of Massiot, has recently published a powerful document, in which he renounces Romanism, and avows all of Protestantism but the name. The work is done in a bold and yet Christian spirit. Perhaps his standing aloof from Protestants for the time being may subserve his usefulness. But he cannot and will not stand there long, if he is in truth what his document shows him to be. He says: "I have ceased to be a Roman; I have become again a Catholic." In the sense in which he claims to be Catholic, all true Christians are Catholics.

DROWNING OF A PICKNICK PARTY.—On Fifth-day, Aug. 14, a boat containing a picknick party of thirty-five persons, was upset near Kingston, Canada, and fifteen females and four males were drowned. The boat was ballasted with iron, and went down immediately. Twelve of the bodies had been recovered at last accounts.

European News.

Three Steamers from Europe arrived at New York last week, bringing intelligence one week later.

The question of demolishing the Crystal Palace has been postponed till next Spring.

There has been some further discussion in Parliament relative to the case of Mr. Salomons, the Jewish member elect, which resulted in declaring him ineligible to a seat, by a vote of 123 to 68.

Parliament was to be prorogued on the 8th inst., and the members were making preparation for their annual grouse-shooting.

From the opening of the Exhibition till July 26, no less than 2,929,778 visits have been paid to it. £66,638 5s. has been received from the sale of season tickets, and the amount taken in payments at the doors has been £181,011 6s. With subscriptions, therefore, the total incomings of the Royal Commission now considerably exceed £300,000.

The Moniteur publishes the returns of the produce and consumption of beet-root sugar in France since the beginning of the season, from which it appears that there were 304 manufactories in operation on the 1st of July last; that the quantity of sugar manufactured or lying over since last year amounted to 79,463,332 kilogrammes, and that sold for consumption, or stored in the public bonding warehouses, to 70,002,616.

Letters from Warsaw say the defeat of General Neisterow at Serebrickow, and the flight of the Russians on the plains of Tiflis, is unhappily more than true. The loss of the army in men, ammunition, weapons, and horses, is far greater than has been sustained for years; nearely all the strongholds which had been conquered and maintained at such an immense expense, have been again lost.

The principal news from Bombay is of shipwreck. On the 11th of June the Atiet Rohoman, a ship having on board 350 pilgrims returning from Mecca, was wrecked on the Island of Tennery, while attempting to make the harbor in thick weather. Nearly 200 of her crew perished. On the same day the bark Charlotte struck on a reef at Jingoora, to the south of Bombay Harbor, and became a total wreck, her crew, with two exceptions saving themselves on rafts. The Charles Forbes, of Bombay, was also wrecked on the 18th of April, in the Straits of Malacca.

By the latest accounts from Hong-Kong, the progress of the rebellion in the southern province of China appears to be still unchecked, but there is great difficulty in obtaining authentic intelligence from the disturbed districts.

The Brigands of Greece are very bold about these days. A band recently stopped the mail on the road form Sparta to Tripolitza, and took from the bags all letters which enclosed any bank-notes. Two of the robbers had their faces blackened, and the whole of them were well dressed, and armed with costly weapons. Eighty travelers had been stopped and robbed on the same road. On the third of July, Calamata, accompanied by fifty-two brigands, attacked the village of Cheimernaki, in the commune of Ypate, and killed one of the inhabitants who had last year denounced him to the authorities. On the following day he went to the village of Kampia, and, after robbing all the inhabitants, set fire to and destroyed it. He told the villagers that he had procured a list of all traitors, and of all those who persecuted the brigands, that he might chastize them at his leisure. In order to inspire his victims with greater alarm, he told them—"At the village of Kyriacochori you will find Captain Protopapas, and at Selima, Colonel Pharmakis is quartered; go and ask them to assist you." Sixty brigands attacked the village of Gousiartza, and robbed all the inhabitants, and the village of Merali has met with a similar fate.

Three Days Later.

The U. S. Mail Steamship Baltic arrived at New York on Sabbath morning, 16th inst., from Liverpool, which port she left on the 6th inst. She made the passage in nine days and nineteen hours—the quickest passage on record. She brought 145 passengers, among whom was Horace Greeley.

The Ecclesiastical Titles Assumption Bill received the Royal Assent on the 1st inst. It makes unlawful and void all titles and jurisdiction conferred by the Pope, and imposes a fine of £100 for every offense in the way of obtaining and using such titles and jurisdiction.

The weather, which had been very unfavorable, had at last improved, and the Hay harvest was being completed, and that of the Grain commenced and prosecuted under favorable auspices.

Mary Rogers, a servant-girl, aged 28, was on the 2d inst. convicted at Shrewsbury of the murder of her own (illegitimate) child, aged two months, on the 6th ult.; and Maria Cage was convicted at Ipswich on the same day of poisoning her husband, by whom she had seventeen children. Both were sentenced to death.

A fearful occurrence is announced from Russia, which took place in Wladimir, on the 1st of July. According to ancient custom, a procession is held on that day, to carry the wonder-working image of the Virgin from a neighboring convent into the town of Wladimir and back again. This time the concourse was unusually great, and just as the procession was crossing the bridge, the latter gave way, and 149 persons lost their lives; 48 have been recovered, more or less injured during the fearful event.

From the Cape of Good Hope.

The bark Ocean Wave arrived at Boston on the 14th inst., with advices from the Cape of Good Hope to to the 21st June, being three weeks later. The accounts do not show that the British are any nearer a settlement of their troubles than when the war began. By papers captured from the enemy, it appears that the Caffirs and Hottentots intended, if successful, to establish a government of their own—a republic or monarchy, as the case might be—with Grahamtown for a capital. Discoveries have been made of traitors among the Hottentots, apparently favorable to the English. Several expeditions have been sent into the enemy's country, but with little effect thus far, as but few rebels have been killed or captured. At the same time, the enemy continued to steal large numbers of cattle, and also to burn and destroy.

At Theopolis (one of the oldest Missionary Stations) the Hottentots had burnt all the Missionary buildings, and had also murdered in cold blood a number of Fingoes. As the rebels retreated to join their camp in the mountains, parties of Europeans assembled, but were unable to cut off their retreat. A number of lives were lost of natives friendly to the English.

The powerful chief Keeli had gone over to the rebels, and had ordered all the missionaries out of his territories. Large and overpowering forces were gathering in the mountains, and the Boors were panic-stricken and refused to act. Fears were entertained that the enemy would massacre the farmers and their families by wholesale. In one attack the enemy captured 3,000 sheep and 700 head of cattle; they were afterwards attacked by a Cornet with ten men only, who shot 15 of the enemy, retook all the cattle and captured 14 guns.

Fifteen Days Later from California.

The steamship Prometheus, from San Juan de Nicaragua, arrived at New York on the 13th inst., bringing 360 passengers, $578,599 in gold dust, and two weeks later news from California. Her passengers were brought by the steamer Pacific, which left San Francisco on the 14th ult. and arrived at San Juan del Sud on the 29th. The passengers by the Nicaragua route came fifteen miles by land carriage; thence took the steamer Director across Lake Nicaragua; thence the new iron steamer Sir Henry L. Bulwer down the San Juan River to the Prometheus, in 32 hours' running time. They all expressed themselves very much pleased with the route, and say that the country is delightful. They had no sickness. It is thought that by this route the time between New York and San Francisco will be reduced to 25 days.

By this arrival we have, on the one hand, a sickening succession of murders, robberies and incendiary fires; on the other, a rapidly increasing list of trials, condemnations, and executions, perpetrated with relentless severity by the summary action of the people. The following synopsis of the two weeks' news, copied from Alta California of July 15, contains all that is important:—

Since the departure of the mail steamer on the 1st of the present month, the only event of moment which has transpired in San Francisco has been the trial, conviction and execution of a felon known as Jim Stuart, by the Vigilance Committee, a body of citizens of the highest respectability and standing in society. He was hung for a multiplicity of offences, and, by his own confession, voluntarily made, was a villain of the most desperate character. He was hung about 2 o'clock on Friday, the 11th inst., at the end of Market Wharf, in the presence several thousand citizens.

A Spanish woman was hung by the people in Downieville, in the Sacramento Valley, for murdering a man named Cannon on the 7th inst.

In Sacramento, Marysville, Stockton, and elsewhere, the citizens have felt themselves compelled to act in their own behalf, the laws having proved so utterly inadequate in themselves, and their administration by the properly constituted authorities so lax.

The recent execution of Stuart produced a temporary excitement among those who entertained opinions antagonistic to the action of the Committee; but it appears to be subsiding. His Honor Mayor Brenham issued a proclamation desiring all good citizens to withdraw from the Vigilance Committee or associations of a like character, and Judge Campbell, of the Court of Sessions, on the 12th instant, charged the Grand Jury of the County that all those concerned in the execution of Stuart had been guilty of murder, or were particeps criminis. The Vigilance Committee, however, still continues to exercise its powers, and is using its utmost endeavors to rid the community of the villains who have so long infested it. Their acts are sustained by a majority of the citizens. Organizations of a similar character have sprung up in almost all the prominent places of California, and the Courts have been forced, by the expression of public sentiment, to pay stricter attention to the administration of the law.

The intelligence from the North is by no means pleasant. A party of pioneer emigrants, who had been landed at Point Oxford, above Trinidad, consisting of ten men, under command of Capt. Kirkpatrick, were massacred by the Indians. The Indians in the entire vicinity of Rogue's River and the Klamath region have exhibited the utmost hostility against the whites, and being armed with guns and pistols, as well as bows and arrows, are a most formidable adversary. Several parties of whites were in arms and in pursuit of those who had committed depredations, at the last accounts.

The Indians are still troublesome in Sacramento Valley, and refuse to come in at the place specified by Dr. O. M. Wozencraft, one of the Indian Commissioners.

A rencontre took place on the 1st inst. between Geo. F. Lemon, City Assessor, and Wm. H. Graham, a young lawyer. Shots were exchanged, and Graham was shot in the mouth and left arm. Lemon immediately gave himself up, but his adversary having told him to draw and defend himself, and suited the action to the word, the Recorder discharged him. Graham is out and doing well.

The 4th of July was not celebrated with any great pomp, in consequence of the calamity which has so recently befallen the city. It was, however, observed by the firing of guns, parades, &c.

In Sacramento City a most aggravated highway robbery was committed on the 9th inst., in broad daylight. Impatient of the law's delay, the people, by their united expression, induced the court and the lawyers selected to defend the prisoner, to go into a trial immediately, and at last accounts one of the party was before the court on trial.

The Mormons are making a decided movement toward establishing a direct communication from the Salt Lake to the Pacific. A large party have recently arrived from Salt Lake through the Cajon Pass, about sixty miles from Los Angelos, with an expressed determination to settle in that section. They are said to be negotiating for the purchase of a very fine rancho belonging to Senor Antonio Longo.

The intelligence from the mines continues to be extremely encouraging, and a general spirit of contentment seems to prevail among the miners.

The effects of the late fire in this city are yet perceptible, but the energy and enterprise of our citizens appears to be unabated. The "burned district," although not entirely rebuilt, is pretty thickly studded with tenements of all descriptions, and brick and stone buildings of the most substantial character are in process of erection in all parts.

In the list of deaths in California, we notice the following:—

At Fremont, on Sunday, June 22, Mr. John Chase, formerly of Madison Co., N. Y., aged 27 years.

On the 12th of July, John P. Shannon, of Dansville, Livingston Co., N. Y., aged 27 years.

SHADRACH, THE FUGITIVE SLAVE.—A Montreal correspondent of the Cleveland True Democrat says:—

"Did you ever hear of one Shadrach Minkins; the one that ran away from Boston; the very same. Yes, here he is, 172½ Notre Dame-st. I went with Mr. R. Maxcey, a gentleman from Mississippi, to see Shadrach, at Mr. M.'s request. Shadrach is keeping a saloon and doing well, but says he had rather live in Boston, all other things being equal. Mr. Maxcey said of Shadrach: He is a smart fellow, but he knows too much. I would not want him among my niggers."

NOT EXPLAINED YET.—At Seekonk, R. I., a short time ago, the mutilated body of a woman was dug up, and on the supposition that it was the body of a Mrs. Cookson, who had been absent some time, her husband was arrested as the murderer. A few days afterwards, however, a dispatch was received from the State of Maine, that Mrs. Cookson and her child were alive in that State; consequently Cookson, who was in custody on a charge of murder, was discharged by the magistrates at Pawtucket, R. I. Cookson did not appear in the least surprised, saying he knew it would turn out a hoax. The question remains unsolved concerning the murdered woman at Seekonk, and her murderer.

DISASTER AND LOSS OF LIFE AT SEA.—In the month of April last the brig Englishman, Capt. Harris, of Bristol, England, was capsized in a tornado off the island of Fernando Po. It was supposed there were about thirty persons on board, only one of wnom, a native of Africa, was saved. He was picked up on the third day after the disaster, floating on a sbar, by an English ship from Caernarvon, bound to Fernando Po. Among those on board the unfortunate vessel, were Rev. G. W. Simpson and lady, of the Presbyterian Board of Missions of New-York, and Mrs. Harris, wife of the Captain.

SUMMARY.

During the storm on Saturday, says the Boston Commonwealth, a white oak tree, near a foot in diameter, fell upon the Contoocook Valley Railroad, in New Hampshire, carrying with it a maple seven or eight inches in diameter. The train coming upon them at a curve in the road, before the engine could be reversed, they were cut through and thrown off on either side, doing little damage save breaking the framework of the engine. The larger tree was partially decayed, the other was sound.

Mr. John Stevens, a broker on Exchange-st., Boston, and for many years Secretary of the Commonwealth Insurance Company, committed suicide at his office on the 14th inst. by severing the main artery. When discovered, he was sitting in a chair, dead—his leg resting upon a coal-hod, which had received his blood. He was respectably connected, and was married the previous Saturday in Groton, Mass. He leaves considerable property.

A steam tug designed for canal navigation has been experimenting in the neighborhood of Albany. It is propelled by an engine of fifty horse power. The wheel is in the center of the boat—the buckets of iron and saucer-shaped, throwing the water into a narrow channel through a groove in the bottom, so that there is no more swell than would be caused by any other boat of equal size, running at equal speed. It is proposed to tow 5 75-ton boats at the rate of 3 miles an hour.

An association of ladies, belonging to the denomination of Friends, has been formed in Philadelphia, for the the relief of sick children during the Summer season. They furnish gratuitously tickets for excursions, either by railroad or steamboat. In extreme cases, if preferred, board in the country is procured for mothers with their sick infants, free of expense.

In 1700 there was one death in England for every twenty-five inhabitants. At the present time there is only one death for forty-five inhabitants. The average length of human life has nearly doubled in that country in 150 years.

It is stated that one fourth of the population of the Canary Islands has been cut off by the cholera and its accompanying maladies. It raged from the 8th to the 20th of June.

Mr. Corry, of Lewis county, Mo., a native of Georgia, has removed a family of ten slaves to Cedar township, in Iowa, bought land for them, and entered into bonds for their good behavior—from motives of philanthropy.

During a recent assize in France, it was discovered that many fires had been promoted by agents of insurance societies, in order to terrify the farmers into insuring.

The Bounty Land office at Washington is now engaged in examining the claims that were lodged in December, 1850. They are taken up in the order of reception.

A small parcel of Polish bearded wheat, sent from the Patent Office, to St. Paul, Min., was sowed on about four yards square of ground, and yielded at the rate of 35 bushels per acre.

The people of Wisconsin are to hold a Mass Free Soil and Anti-Fugitive Slave Law Convention at Watertown on the 17th of September. The State Fair is to come off at Janesville, October 1st and 2d.

The farm of the late N. P. Rust, near Syracuse, was sold on the 14th inst. at auction for $17,500. C. A. Wheaton was the purchaser. It contained 41 acres, and sold at the rate of $428 per acre.

A violent hail storm visited Boston on the 13th inst., doing much damage, and injuring several persons, though none fatally.

In all parts of New-England whence we have accounts, the corn crop is exceedingly good. It has suffered slightly in some localities from drouth, but on the average it will come in heavier than usual. Potatoes have suffered, and in many places ripened prematurely from the dryness of the season; but the quality of those brought to market is generally excellent, and as yet we have heard very little of the rot. Of fruits there will be plenty in the way of peaches and pears, but apples will be short. On the whole, the season is a fair average one for productions in New-England.

On the night of the 2d inst., Mr. Christopher S. Thompson, of Chester District, S. C., while watching, with others, for a runaway slave who had been seen for some days lurking about in the neighborhood, was shot by a negro named Randal, the property of Miss Nancy Steedman. Supposing him to be the runaway, attempts were made to apprehend him, when he fired. How he came to be armed, or for what purpose, is not known. He is now in jail awaiting his trial.

A letter dated Cazenovia, (Madison Co.) Aug. 1851, says: The potato rot is becoming very severe in this part of the country. I do not undertake to prescribe a remedy, but I will explain the cause, which will be new to many people. The mischief is all done by an insect. Let any person go and look at the leaves which begin to decay, and he will find underside the leaves plenty of small green lice. They extract juice the from the leaves, and the leaves dry up and wither to almost nothing.

The summer complaint is prevailing in the Sing Sing prison to a considerable extent, and assumes quite a malignant form. About fifty are now confind to cots, and upward of ninety are under treatment. Several deaths have occurred, but Dr. Belcher, the Physician, informs us that he hopes that the disease has now reached its hight, and that from this time it will gradually subside.

In the Erie Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, recently held at Warren, Ohio, resolutions were introduced and passed by a decided majority, reprobating the Fugitive Slave Law, and declaring it to be the duty of Christians to obey the commands of God rather than the inhuman enactments of men.

The Bangor Whig says that a Vermonter has invented a machine for making brick by steam power, by which the clay is shoveled up, dried, pulverized, and pressed dry into the moulds, at the rate of fifty thousand a day, and placed in the kiln for burning, no sun-drying being necessary after the bricks come from the mould. The bricks come out in a very handsome and solid shape.

Daniel Burlew, an old gentleman residing in South-Amboy, N. J., while mowing last week in his fields, was struck with paralysis, and being unable to move or make known his situation, remained for two days and two nights in the open air without food or water. A diligent search was made for him by his friends and relatives, but without avail until the lapse of time stated.

The receivers of the Pawtucket Bank, Mass., (Messrs. H. P. Knight, and Wm. Dehon,) give public notice that all claims proved against the Bank will be now paid, on demand, with interest. The circulation of the Bank is now only about $4,500, and will be received at the Suffolk Bank, Boston, and at the Merchants' Bank, Providence.

A National Mass Convention of "Spiritual Rappers" is to be held at Rochester, New-York, in Febauary next, at which it is expected that all the "Mediums" in the United States will be present. There are said to be almost four hundred mediums in the country. If these knockers should assemble at one point, look out for earthquakes.

A Harvest Home is to be held at Lambertville, Hunterdon Co., N. J., on the 23d inst. Several eminent speakers, and a band of Music, are engaged. The day will be ushered in by the firing of cannon, &c. All are invited to attend, and celebrate the ingathering of a fruitful harvest in a becoming manner. The committee of arrangements consists of 43 citizens of the neighborhood.

A dispatch dated Burlington, Vt., Monday, August 11, 1851, says the body of Burdick Sprague, of Morristown, missing for two years past, has been found in Lake Memphramagog with the throat cut. The body was in a remarkable state of preservation, so as to be at once recognized by his friends. Sprague is said to have been wealthy, and was undoubtedly murdered.

The colored people of the city of Albany engaged in an excursion to Hudson the other day, and had "a good time;" though The Republican, while it compliments them for their appearance and decorum, is "forced to allude to the misconduct of a number of persons who were white without, and black enough within to interfere with their peaceful pleasures."

Our exchanges give accounts of a most destructive rain and hail-storm on the eastern part of the Ohio Reserve. The Portage Whig sums up the damage, as near as it can be done with any degree of accuracy, as follows: 3,000 panes of window-glass were broken; 40 acres corn totally destroyed; 500 acres corn partially injured; with a large quantity of oats and some wheat.

Rev. James Hildreth, formerly and for several years pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Haverstraw, N. Y., and two of his children, died by cholera at Savannah, Ill., on the 20th of July. They died at the same hour, and were buried in the same grave. His wife was attacked first, and lay senseless within a few feet of him at his death. She recovered, and with her remaining children, is still at the West.

John M. Smith, United States Deputy Surveyor, and Oscar W Lyman, a young man in his employ, were both killed on the 24th ult. by the falling of a tree upon their camp. The party were surveying on Wolf River, Wisconsin. A young man by the name of Davis was badly hurt.

Letters from Athens announce that workmen employed, four miles from the city, in draining the field of Marathon, found the place of sepulture of the warriors who fell there in the memorable battle 490 years before the birth of Christ.

St. Joseph is severely afflicted with sickness. The Gazette of the 30th ult. notices the death of several valuable citizens in the previous week. Ten or twelve persons had died of cholera in eight days.

A Committee of gentlemen of Louisiana and Mississippi, appointed for the purpose, have issued a Circular, in which they propose a Convention of Delegates from the States of Texas, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, Indiana, Illinois and Ohio, to unite with the people of Louisiana and of New-Orleans, to deliberate upon and concert such measures as will be likely speedily to influence the construction of a system of railroads connecting the Gulf States with those of the West and the Northwest, and radiating throughout all the interior.

Workmen are employed at present in repairing the cases containing the orange trees of the Tuilleries garden. These trees are of great age, some going back as far as 700 years, and the youngest 300. Every 20 years the earth in each case is changed, and during the three following years they appear sickly. They then acquire fresh strength, and throw out an immense quantity of blossoms. It is this periodical change of nourishment which has led to their longevity.

The sheriff of Ontario County offers a reward of $100 for the arrest of James Slater, who is accused of the murder of O'Brien, in Canandaigua, on the 7th inst. Slater is an Irishman, 30 years of age, 5 feet 4 inches high, rather thick-set, sandy complexion, light hair, and usually wears a home-made straw hat. When last seen, he had on light summer clothing. He came from Bath, Steuben County, and was a laborer on the railroad.

Dr. Leavitt, of Maysville, Ky., the inventor of a new process for making linen from unrotted flax and hemp, recently showed in New York some samples of linen yarns of excellent quality, fine enough for shirt linen, which he says can be produced as cheap as cotton yarns of the same fineness. He showed also samples of the raw material in the various stages of preparation. His process is entirely different from Claussen's invention.

By the arrival of the bark Cyane, Capt. Loveland, from Rio de Janeiro, which port she left on the 10th ult., we learn that the U. S. surveying steamer Jefferson was lost in June last, at the mouth of the Straits. A portion of the machinery would be saved, but the vessel would prove a total loss.

The Geographical Society of Paris has presented to Commander Lynch, U. S. N., "a grand silver medal," for his voyage to the Dead Sea, and as a "testimony of its estimation of the valuable results for which geographical science is indebted to his learned researches in countries little known but for him."

A dispatch dated Albany, Wednesday, Aug. 13, 1851, says: While the Troy stage was attempting to get on board the ferry boat for the Albany road, at 7 P. M., it got overboard with thirteen passengers inside. Both horses were drowned. All the passengers very narrowly escaped.

Jordan L. Mott, Esq., has forwarded to the Smithsonian Institute several muskets and a blunderbus, which have been recovered from the wreck of the English Frigate Hussar, in Hell-Gate Channel. Professor Henry has acknowledged the receipt of the relics.

The treaty with the Sioux, negotiated by Col. Lea and Gov. Ramsey, gives the United States 23,000,000 acres of land, for which the sum of $1,650,000 is to be paid, in ten yearly installments—about eight cents per acre.

In Buffalo, N. Y., last Sixth-day, a fugitive slave named Davis, who had been serving as cook on the steamboat Buckeye State, was arrested, examined, and sent back to Louisville.

Over 28,000 emigrants arrived at New York last week. The whole number arrived from Jan. 1 to Aug. 13, 1850, 133,810; from Jan. 1 to Aug. 13, 1851, 179,213—increase this year, 45,403.

Wilkins Tannehell, the oldest member of the editorial fraternity now living in Tennessee, has been struck with paralysis.

Halifax papers of the 7th inst. state that the herring fishery along the coast of Nova-Scotia has been an entire failure.

Mr. Ross, the new Governor of Tobago, was killed by being thrown from his gig on his return from the celebration of the Queen's coronation-day.

Purse gloves, which have a pocket inside to contain money, railroad tickets, &c., have been patented in England.

Thirty varieties of cotton have been found growing spontaneously in West Africa, some of it equal to the finest quality of American growth.

Last year the legacy duty was paid on £45,815,694 10s. 11d. in Great Britain, which duty amounted in the one year to £55,633 7s. 6d.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Remarks.

All the English branches usually taught in our Eastern Academies, together with the Classics, and the Modern Languages, (French, German, and Italian,) will be taught in this Institution. The mode of instruction will be in accordance with the latest and most popular method adopted in our best Eastern Institutions, aiming, primarily, at a thorough and practical qualification of School Teachers, and preparing students for an advanced standing in a College course.

This Institution is located in the healthy and delightful village of Milton, at the junction of the Milwaukie and Mississippi and the Northern and Southern Railroads, amidst an enterprising and moral community, and removed from the vices and temptations ever attendant on large villages and cities.

Weekly meetings are held in the village by three different evangelical denominations, either of which students can attend.

The plan of instruction and government of this Institution will aim at a harmonious development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of students, in a manner to render them thorough scholars, and practical, useful citizens; and the public may feel assured that no exertion shall be wanting on the part of the teachers and proprietors of the school to render it worthy of patronage and confidence. au14 4t

MILTON, Rock Co., Wis, July 11th, 1851.

In sending the notice of our school to the Recorder, we will take the opportunity to assure such Seventh-day Baptists and other friends at the East as may contemplate removing to this State, and yet wish to enjoy the advantages of a good school, that it is intended to afford as good facilities for study and improvement in this school as can be found in any other Academy.

Union Bible Dictionary.

PREFERABLE TO ANY OTHER.—It is unquestionably preferable to any other manual adapted to aid the young in studying the sacred volume. [N. Y. Obs.

FULLER THAN ANY OTHER.—It is nearly a complete summary of all the most valuable learning on the subjects embraced in it. [The Independent.

It is, by far, the completest and most perspicuous Bible Dictionary of its size to be found. It condenses a great amount of learning, and has a fullness of information, for which one would not look in so unpretending a volume, and which is all that most Bible readers would desire on the subject. [N. Y. Evangelist.

CHEAPER THAN ANY OTHER.—There is probably no book, except the Bible itself, in which so great a quantity of matter can be purchased for so small a sum; and happily, it is matter of an important character, all of which helps to elucidate the Bible. It explains the meaning of words, and the names of persons, animals, and objects, which are not defined in ordinary dictionaries. The images of things are also given in pictures, wherever this method is necessary to a just perception of them, or can be made to convey a more ready and accurate idea, than a mere verbal description. It is a sort of sine-qua-non for a Sunday-school teacher, and should be in the hands of the more forward pupils.

THE BEST OF ITS KIND.—I feel free to express my general approbation of the "Union Bible Dictionary," as a work well calculated to extend the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and especially to be a valuable assistant to teachers and scholars in our Sunday-schools.

[Rev. Dr. Alexander.

The mass of various and important information compressed within so small a compass is almost incredible.

[Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Mass.

I regard the present volume as the best of its kind.

Miscellaneous.

A Western Steamer.

Rev. J. P. Thompson, one of the editors of the New York Independent, who has lately been on a Western tour, thus sketches a Western steamer:

"A Western steamboat is at first sight a novelty to one familiar only with Eastern models. The boats on the Western waters are very slightly built, mere shells of pine, shallow, long, narrow, flat-bottomed, open and flaring on all sides, just as represented in Banvard's panorama. There is no cabin either below the deck or upon it. The engines are placed immediately on deck, two huge furnaces flaming upon you as you enter the boat, and giving you rather uncomfortable hints of a choice between fire and water in making your exit from the world. This passing suggestion grows into a fixed apprehension when you notice the carelessness of the structure, and the recklessness of the engineers and firemen. Huge flaming brands and coals are dropping continually upon the thinnest possible sheathing of sheet iron, in many places worn through to the plank; heated pipes on which you cannot bear your hand are in immediate contact with boards as dry as tinder, and perhaps already charred; goods, you know not how inflammable, are strown promiscuously around the boilers, while huge piles of dry pine wood, waiting to be consumed, are crowded in the vicinity of the fires. But not every traveler has the habit that I confess to, of prying into everything about him, and therefore few, probably, enjoy the peculiar sensation of sailing on the rim of a volcano. However, there is nothing like getting used to it, and I learned to sleep quite soundly directly over the boiler; for one most commonly chooses a state-room either over the boiler or alongside the wheel.

The cabin is up stairs, and extends nearly the whole length of the deck, over which it is perched upon sundry rough, unpainted posts, that seem too frail for the summer's breeze; this is divided into a long, narrow saloon from stem to stern, and a row of state-rooms on either hand. An apartment for ladies is curtained off at one extremity, while the main saloon is used for meals, conversation, promenading, card-playing, and whatsoever one may list. The kitchen, pantry, bar, &c., are all contiguous to the saloon; with every convenience for 'life above stairs,' so that passengers may spend days in and around this saloon, without knowing anything of the deck life below. Some of the state-rooms that open both into the saloon and upon the guard, are very airy and pleasant. If, however, there is any deficiency in regard to neatness and comfort, it is in this department of the boat.

Girard College,

As sketched by a visitor, in a letter to the Illinois Advocate.

Ministers are not admitted. Fortunately for us, we are only a professor, and leave what few figments of divinity may chance to cleave to us in the porter's lodge, while we inquire for President Allen, our teacher sixteen years ago. He is grown so portly that we scarcely know him, and he, with equal difficulty, recalled the idea of our physical man; but, once fairly introduced, nothing could exceed the pleasure of our mutual recognition and discourse over the olden time. He conducted us, in person, to all parts, and through all the departments of this magnificent establishment.

The main edfice is modelled after the Parthenon at Athens. Its colonnade is Corinthian, and single; that of the Parthenon was double, and Doric. But here the comparison is at an end. The friezes of the Parthenon were the work of Phidias, and the pride not only of Grecian sculpture, but the architectural glory of the world. The Parthenon cost six millions; Girard College two. It is probably the proudest monumental pile this side of the Atlantic. Each of these magnificent columns cost fourteen thousand dollars; sufficient, column by column, to erect a substantial college edifice.

On entering the lofty door-way, thirty-six feet in height, pay your respects to Stephen Gerard. There he stands right before you, in marble, with his hands crossed before him, in plain citizen's dress, just as he walked the streets of Philadelphia. A plain iron railing surrounds the statue, and keeps all comers at a respectful distance. At the right is the spacious council-room of the directors; at the left, the door-way of the great chapel. Beyond are recitation-rooms. In one, a professor was lecturing to the larger boys on anatomy. When he proposed a question, dozens arose from their seats, and waved their hands in token of being able to answer. The fortunate fellow to whom he nodded, shouted the reply. In the rooms above, were large classes under the care of female teachers. The tender age of the orphans requires, at present, maternal influence; and this they receive, both at the hands of their instructors, and from the matrons of the boarding establishments.

The rooms upon the third floor of the College are lighted from the roof. Here is the library; here is the wardrobe of Girard—the old pantaloons patched upon the knee with pieces of different colors, worn by the millionaire a short time before his death. Here are boxes of shipping papers, his secretary, and iron safe.

From thence clamber to the top of the immense structure. A roof of marble! Six thousand tons of marble in the roof alone, will give the imagination or calculation of the reader some data for the estimation of the enormous weight of the other structure, or of the building as a whole. The building is all marble. Only one little staircase, leading to the roof is wood; the rest is all solid masonry. The reverberations of the lofty ceilings totally unfitted the rooms for school purposes. This had to be remedied by interposing an artificial ceiling of canvas or cotton cloth, to muffle the sound, or stifle the echoes which the slightest word or footfall generated by the million, in the vaulted chambers. In the school-rooms, the desks and seats are elevated by the thickness of a single plank, lest the coldness or dampness of the stone-flagged floor should induce cold feet, and thus injure the health of pupils.

At 5 o'clock we went to the chapel for prayers. Across the entire west end of the chapel is an elevated platform. In its center is a regular pulpit or reading-desk, occupied by the President, in isolated dignity. At his left was a splendid piano; on either hand, on settees and chairs, the faculty of the institution, and visitors, of which they have from one hundred and fifty to two hundred a day. Here collected, in quiet and order, three hundred orphan boys, each section under the care of its own director. Each had his hymn book and Bible. Here three hundred voices joined to sing in moving melody,

"Come, let us join our cheerful songs
With angels round the throne."

No chance for infidelity or heterodoxy here, thought we, as the charming volume of infant voice rolled forth the sentiments, impressing themselves, doubtless, by the power of the ever-present Spirit, signally upon the infant heart:—

"Worthy the Lamb that died, they cried,
To be exalted thus,
Worthy the Lamb, our hearts reply,
For he was slain for us."

When the President took up the Bible, after the singing, every pupil opened to the chapter named, and followed the reading with attention; and when he said "Let us pray," every one kneeled reverently in his place, before that God who has promised to be a "father to the fatherless, and the widow's God." The sight was beyond measure affecting.

Under the efficient management of President Allen and the able Board of Directors, every thing has been reduced to the most perfect system. The lads retired from the chapel as quietly as they had entered it. Merry was the shout that arose from the lawn appropriated for their play ground, when, the restraints of the day over, they were permitted to exercise themselves before tea, in the open air. We saw them at supper. They repair to the dining hall in the same admirable order, section by section. As the procession, two and two, enters the door, they divide at the head of the table, and one line goes down one side, and the other the other, each to his appropriate seat. The fare is simple. Weak tea or water, bread and butter, or bread and molasses, constitute the healthful regimen. The washing-room is a curiosity. Every boy has a tin basin, towel, hair-brush, clothes-brush, tooth-brush, and looking-glass to himself. The supply of water from hydrants was plentiful, and once a week, or oftener, they were required to bathe in rooms or tubs prepared for the purpose. Every boy had drawers or shelves for his clothing, labelled with his name, and in the dormitories, every one was provided with an iron bedstead, with plenty of bedding, covered with a counterpane of spotless whiteness. Nearly all the orphans are from the city and county of Philadelphia. To prevent the interference of friends, they are all indentured apprentices according to the laws of Pennsylvania.

Executions in China.

The New Heaven Palladium publishes a letter from Canton, which contains an account of the horrid butcheries that are perpetrated under the name of capital punishments. During the past year, there have been 444 executions in that city. One female, who had been convicted of adultery and the murder of her husband, was condemned to be cut to pieces, or, as the sentence ran, to be executed by eight strokes or cuts of a knife. The death-warrant, as translated, was as follows:

"According to the imperial will, cut to peices, that she die, the culprit woman, named She Wang, who, listening to the adulterer, poisoned her husband, so that he died—and expose her head to the public."

The mode of punishment is thus described:

The two first cuts are by a small knife, by which the eyebrows, with the skin above, are so sliced that they fall over the eyes. The two second cuts displace the muscles of the fleshy part of the arm above the elbows, so that they fall below. The next two cut the breast, so that they are turned over. At the seventh stroke, the knife is changed for a larger one, which the executioner seizes with one hand, and with the other takes a palm-leaf fan, and puts it before the breast of the criminal. He next thrusts the knife horizontally through the fan into the breast, then turns the blade perpendicularly, and cuts down through the entire abdomen. The eighth stroke takes off the head. The fan is used to prevent the blood from flying upon the executioner. This punishment, whether performed with eight or thirty-six strokes, is inflicted upon those who kill their parents, and upon wives who kill their husbands. All the criminals carry their death warrants to the execution ground. Their wrists are tied behind them, and they hold in their hands, in a perpendicular position, a bamboo stick.

Observations on the Mammoth Cave.

The May number of Silliman's Journal contains an interesting account of the Mammoth Cave, in a letter addressed to Prof. Guyot by Prof. Benj. Silliman, Jr., who has recently made an exploration of its mysteries, and also, in connection with Mr. R. N. Mantell, made a collection of the animals found there. One atmospheric phenomenon attracted the attention of these gentlemen, and tasked their ingenuity for a satisfactory explanation viz.: The blast of cool air blowing outward from the mouth of the cave, which renders it nearly impossible to enter with a lighted lamp. If the external air has a temperature of 90° Fahrenheit, the blast amounts to a gale; but if the air without has a temperature of 59° or 60°, no current is observed, and the flame of a lamp held in a favorable position indicates none. "It immediately occurred to me," said Prof. Silliman, "that there must be two currents, one above of warmer air, passing inward, and one below of colder air, passing outward, and the reverse; but experiment soon satisfied me that this was not the case. Only one current could be discovered; and on inquiry of our intelligent guide, I found that this phenomena had attracted his attention, and that he was satisfied from many observations that only one current existed, and that this flared out when the external air was above 60°, and inward when this was below 60°."

The phenomena is accounted for by Prof. Silliman on scientific principles as follows: The mouth of the cave is the only communication between the external air and the vast labyrinth of galleries and avenues which stretch away for many miles in the solid lime-stone. The air in these underground excavations is pure and exhilarating, which may, in part, be accounted for by the nitre-beds of incredible extent, as the nitrogen which is consumed in the formation of the nitrate of lime must have its proportion of free oxygen disengaged, thus enriching this subterranean atmosphere with a larger portion of the exhilarating principle. The temperature of the cave is uniformly 59°, summer and winter, and this is probably very near to the annual mean of the external air. The expansion which accompanies an elevation of temperature in the outer air is immediately felt by the denser air of the cave, and it flows outward, in obedience to the law of motion in fluids, and the outward current continues without interruption as long as the outer air is possessed of a higher temperature than the cave.

The phenomena of life within the cave are comparatively few, but interesting. There are several insects, the largest of which is a sort of cricket, with enormous long antennæ. There are several species of Caleoptera, mostly burrowing in the nitre-earth. There are some small species of watch-insects, supposed to be crustaceous. Of fish there are two species, one of which, as is well known, is entirely eyeless; the other has external eyes, but is quite blind. The only mammal, except the bats, is a rat, which is very abundant. Prof. Silliman is of opinion that the excavations of the Mammoth Cave have been formed by water, and by no other cause.

Indian Scenes.

The Northwestern papers have interesting intelligence from the treaty ground up near the head-waters of the Mississippi, were commissioners, at the latest accounts, had been for two weeks gathering in the Indians for the purpose of negotiating sales of their lands. This treaty ground is at Traverse des Sioux. On the 4th ult., the Indians began to come in, the Sisseton band, numbering about 200, being among the first. These Indians, never having been victimized by whiskey sellers, are described as better looking, better dressed, and cleaner, than the bands lower down the river. On the following Sunday, the Indians, then numbering about 1000, were remarkably quiet, though in the afternoon 250 of them engaged for a while in their favorite ball play. Of the hundreds of squaws present, it is stated not a dozen over thirteen years of age are unmarried. On the 12th, while the commissioners were awaiting the approach of thousands of the remoter bands, an Indian marriage took place in one of the marquees. The man was 30 years old, and the bride 14. Educated in seclusion at the Mission House, she came in, writes one, "trembling like a young falcon." A Justice of the Peace performed the ceremony after the Episcopal form. A dinner and lemonade followed. After this, 19 young Dakota girls, and 15 young men, held the virgin feast.

The vicinity of the treaty ground is described as a region of thunder storms, and the Indians, who dislike rain and fear thunder, had a meeting to consider the matter, and see if they could not secure better weather. Walking Thunder made a speech. He said the high water was unusual. The Great Spirit growled at them. Something did not suit him. Their corn fields were deluged; their young men could not hunt, because their powder was wet, and would not burn. He continued:

"But we are poor, very poor. Our ribs may be counted like the poles of a lodge-frame, through the skin. Corn will not grow without sunshine, and if we have nothing to eat, we must starve. Our horses are thin. We thought they could run some; but even Shasta Wasta's (Mr. Tyler's) horse can out-run our fastest buffalo nag. Our dogs are lean, very lean. They are too poor to bark. They howl a little sometimes, but very feebly. We are glad our Father came up here with a litte corn and a little beef, and it may be a few slices of pork, for us to eat. We were very hungry, and we are yet. The red man is always hungry. The white young men are fat. They look very sleek and greasy. The reason is that the Great Spirit gives them more food. We do not like so much rain; it is more than there is any use of. [Ho! ho!] Our tents are soaked with water. It pains us to have our women loaded down with wet baggage when we travel. We cannot bear it. It may be the steamboats drove this flood up the river when they came. The boats brought up a little corn, and a litte beef, and it may be a slice of pork. They are welcome. [Ho! ho!]"

Finally, the orator said it was whispered to him in a dream that, if they had a round dance, it might appease the Evil Spirit, allay the storm, and save them much thunder, lightning and rain. The wing of the Thunder bird, he said, which had been dashed upon the head of the Blue Earth river, and which had opened the fountain out of which the freshet came, must be broken. Accordingly, the round dance took place in the afternoon. The commissioners and upwards of 1000 Indians were present. The dance was called a religious one. An area like that of a circus was closed by aspens. We give a full account of this ludicious scene:

"A pole was planted in the middle of the area, with an image cut out of bark, designed to represent the Thunder bird, hanging suspended by a string from its top. At each of the four arched gateways stood another pole and image of the same description, but smaller than the one in the center. Near the central pole was a little arbor of aspen bushes, in which sat an ugly looking Indian, with his face blackened and a wig of green grass on his head, who acted as sorcerer, and uttered incantations and prophecies with fervent unction, and beat the drum, and played on the Indian flute, and sung by turns, to regulate the various evolutions of the dance.

"Before this arbor, at the foot of the central pole were various mystical emblems—the image of a running buffalo cut out of bark, with his legs stuck in the ground; also a pipe and a red stone, shaped something like a head, with some colored shavings, moss or other material, on the cranium, to represent hair. This red stone is said to represent the Spirit of Evil to be appeased. At a signal given by the sorcerer, the young men sprang through the gateways and commenced a circular dance, in procession, around the sorcerer, who continued to sing and beat his drum, and occasionally changed the order of dancing, or afforded the dancers a respite, by blowing upon his flute. The dancing is the same sort of double-hop, or Shaker step, which we see in their medicine and scalp dances. After fifteen or twenty minutes of violent exercise, the dancers ran out of the ring, returning after a short respite.

"In the third set, a few horsemen, in very gay fastastic costume, accompanied the procession of dancers within the area, by riding around outside of the inclosure. In the fourth and last set, a multitude of boys and girls joined the band of dancers in the area, and many more horsemen joined the cavalcade that rode swift and more swiftly around the area, some dressed in blue embroidered blankets, others in white; and every horseman, as he skillfully and swiftly rode was a subject for the painter, the music quickening and the excited performers flying like a whirlpool of fantastic men and horses—an exhibition so rare and strange, that in New York a Welch would make a fortune out of it in a month, as an equestrian show. Suddenly at the end of the fourth act, several rifles were discharged at the poles upon which the Thunder birds, were suspended, cutting them all instantly down; when the curtain fell, and all dispersed. So ended the Round dance—the most imposing exhibition, probably, that is ever seen among the Sioux."

The Germans—By Horace Greeley.

I have been but two days wholly among the Germans, but I had previously met many of them in England, Italy, and Switzerland. They are seen to the best advantage at home. Their uniform courtesy (save in the detestable habit of smoking where others cannot help being annoyed by their fumes) indicates not merely good nature but genuine kindness of heart. I have not seen a German quarreling or scolding any where in Europe. The deference of members of the same family to each other's happiness in cars, hotels, and steamboats has that quiet, unconscious manner which distinguishes a habit from a holiday ornament. The entire absence of pretense, of stateliness, of a desire to be thought a personage and not a mere person, is scarcely more universal in Switzerland than here. But in fact I have found Aristocracy a chronic disease no where but in Great Britain. In France, there is absolutely nothing of it; there are monarchists in that country—monarchists from tradition, from conviction, from policy, or from class interest—but of Aristocracy scarcely a trace is left. Your Paris boot-black will make you a low bow in acknowledgment of a franc, but he has not a trace of the abjectness of a London waiter, and would evidently decline the honor of being kicked by a Duke. In Italy, there is little manhood but no class worship; her millions of beggars will not abase themselves one whit lower before a Prince than before any one else from whom they hope to worm a copper. The Swiss are freemen, and wear the fact unconsciously but palpably on their brows and beaming from their eyes. The Germans submit passively to arbitrary power which they see not how successfully to resist, but they render to rank or dignity no more homage than is necessary—their souls are still free. And their manners evince a simplicity and frankness which might shame or at least instruct America. On the Rhine, the steamboats are so small and shabby, without state-rooms, berth-rooms, or even an upper deck—that the passengers are necessarily at all times under each other's observation, and, as the fare is high, and twice as much in the main as in the forward cabin, it may be fairly presumed that among those who pay the higher charge are none of the poorest class—no mere laborers for wages. Yet in this main cabin well-dressed young ladies would take out their home-prepared dinner and eat it at their good time without seeking the company and countenance of others, or troubling themselves to see who was observing. A Lowell factory-girl would consider this entirely out of character, and a New York milliner would be shocked at the idea of it.

Cholera among the Indians.

In a conversation with Maj. P. Picot, of the American Fur Company, who came down a few days since on the steamer St. Ange, the Editor of the St. Louis Republican obtained a detailed and full account of the prevalence of cholera among the Indians in the past two years.

About Fort Pierre, in the year 1850, the first case of cholera occurred on the 4th of July. Other cases followed this, and the disease continued to spread until some 300 or 400 Missouri Sioux Indians had fallen victims to it.

The ravages of sickness were not confined to the Indians, it would appear. The cholera communicated to the cattle, and Maj. Picot states that from his own knowledge only, some fifty head of cattle died of a sickness for which he cannot account, unless it were cholera. They were seized suddenly with vomiting and purging, and in many instances, indeed in the majority of instances, death ensued after five or six hours from the manifestation of the first symptoms. The fact that cholera should declare itself on animals may appear singular, but is nevertheless true as strange. We recollect very well one case of this kind which occurred in 1839, when the epidemic was at its greatest hight. The steamer Alexander Hamilton, bound for the Missouri River, carried on board two horses, who were seized at about the same time with violent purging, and who died, despite all the ordinary remedies that were applied, a few hours only after the first indications of illness.

When the disease was raging most violently among the Indians, a council was held, after whose decision the entire nation struck camp, and separated for various quarters. A portion of them took refuge in the mountains, and the remainder journeyed toward the north. The cholera followed the party who had repaired to the mountains, and continued to commit sad ravages among them. To add still more to their misfortunes, the small-pox broke out among them about the same time, and while it ran its course there were from five to six hundred of their number who fell victims to it. The traders did all that lay in their power to alleviate the sufferings about them. They were fortunately well provided with vaccine matter, and Major Picot supposes that no less than from fifteen to twenty thousand Indians were vaccinated by them, to start from the occurrence of the first case. The most frightful panic spread itself among the Indians on the appearance of cholera in such a malignant form. Neither interest, nor friendship, nor parentage, were sufficient bonds to keep them together in this time of affliction. Wives were abandoned by their husbands, parents by their children, and friends by their friends. The cholera, as also the small-pox, lingered from July, 1850, to July 1851, abating in the winter to a considerable extent.

New Calculating Machine.

An extraordinary calculating machine is now placed in the Russian Court. It is the invention of a Polish Jew, named Staffel, a native of Warsaw, and works sums in addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, with a rapidity and precision that are quite astonishing. It also performs the operation of extracting the square root and the most complicated sums in fractions. The machine, which the inventor calls Arithmetica Instrumentalis, is about the size of an ordinary toilet, being about four inches high. The external mechanism represents three rows of ciphers. The first and upper row, containing 13 figures, is immovable; the second and third, containing 7 figures each, immovable. The words addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, are engraved on a semi-circular ring to the right, and underneath is a hand which must be pointed to whichever operation is to be performed. The figures being properly arranged, the simple turn of a hand is then given, and the operation is performed at once as if by magic. The most singular power of the instrument is, that if a question be wrongly stated—as, for instance, a greater number being placed for subtraction from a lesser—it detects the error, and the ringing of a small bell announces the discovery. The inventor has exhibited the powers of this wonderful calculating machine to the Queen, Prince Albert, and several persons of distinction. The inventor also exhibited a machine for ascertaining by weighing the fineness of gold or silver, but this is to be submitted to further and more severe tests. Both machines are, to say the least, extremely curious, and have been rewarded with a silver medal by the Russian Government.

Petrifaction and other Curiosities.

The steamer St. Ange, Captain Labarge, arrived yesterday, says the St. Louis Intelligencer, from the Yellow Stone, after a voyage of fifty-two days. Capt. L. informs us that for ten years past he has, in every successive annual trip, observed a remarkable-looking solitary cedar tree standing upon a bleak and elevated point, about fifty miles below the mouth of the Yellow Stone. While coming down, this last trip, he saw that his old acquaintance had fallen to the earth. Curiosity led him to the spot, which was about half a mile from the river, and perhaps 700 feet above its level, when he found, to his surprise, that the whole tree was in the most perfect state of petrifaction. Judging from the shortness of the interval since he had seen it standing, it must have been in that condition while standing erect as it had grown. The trunk was about thirty-six inches in diameter. A fragment from it is now lying upon our table, and is decidedly the most perfect specimen of ligneous petrifaction we have ever seen.

Dr. Evans, U. S. Geologist, who came as a passenger on the St. Ange, found, near the same spot, the shoulder-blade of a mastodon, measuring nearly 3½ feet across—also some enormous foot bones of the same animal. Fossil shells, the head of a snake, and other curiosities, were found by Dr. E. in the same locality.

Among the notabilities of the trip was the catching of a beautiful specimen of the linnet—a bird very rarely seen—by some of the boat hands. Its plumage is beautiful, and the melody of its song is most charming.

Mr. Berthold, who also came on the boat, brought with him the stuffed skin of one of the mammoth mountain sheep of the Yellow Stone region. It stands about as large as an ordinary milch cow, and is indeed a remarkable curiosity.

Captain Labarge brought down some beautiful specimens of the rocks found on Cannon Ball River, whose name is derived from them. They are perfectly spherical, and, without a very close inspection, would pass for real cannon balls any where. They are of sizes ranging from that of a common toy marble to the bulk of a half-bushel measure. They are seen in measureless abundance, projecting from the face of the steep banks between which the river runs.

French Account of an English Soiree.

The following amusing account of the recent soiree of the Society of Arts in London, is given by a correspondent of The Paris Constitutionnel:—

"I have been to a learned soiree. There were a great many cabs at the door, with a great many pundits inside. When my turn came, I entered like the rest. A polite old gentleman, with courteous address and gray hair came up to me. 'Monsieur,' said he, 'have the goodness to step up stairs, and there leave your hat and stick.' As I had been told, so I did. Then I entered the soiree. All the learned pundits were talking about abstruse science and recondite art, so I had no chance. None of the learned pundits knew me, and I knew none of them. Therfore I spoke to no body, and no body spoke to me. Under these circumstances, I sat down in a chair. A drowsy hum provoked sleep. I felt drowsy—then sleepy—and then slept—how long I know not; but I was awakened by the polite old gentleman with courteous address and gray hair, who said, 'Monsieur, have the goodness to step up stairs and fetch your hat and stick.' And so ended the soiree!"

Heavy Land Claim in Ohio.—The people of Defiance County have held a public meeting to remonstrate against the claim of J. W. Allen to a large body of land in the County. It is said that the claim is based on an agreement between Gov. Ford, in behalf of the State, and Mr. Allen, by which the latter was to have one-third of the lands, the title to which he, as the agent of the State, should get released from the General Government. Under this arrangement, Mr. Allen obtained a released of some 75,000 acres, his portion of which (25,000 acres) he selected in the neighborhood of Defiance. Considerable hostility to this state of things is entertained by the people of that County, for fear it shall build up a land monopoly in their midst, and thus retard the settlement and improvement of that region. This resistance to the claim is founded upon a denial of Gov. Ford's authority for making such an agreement. Gov. F. acted upon power granted to him by an act of the Ohio Legislature, passed Feb. 15, 1850, authorizing the Governor to employ such means as he might deem best for the interest of the State, to obtain from the United States any lands to which Ohio was entitled under former grants. It is estimated at Independence Creek, Nebraska Ter., May 30, that more than 6,000 emigrants have started over the Plains this season for the Pacific coast; 200 wagons had passed Fort Kearney for Oregon up to June 15; 1,700 wagons have left Council Bluffs.

In a case tried in New York last week, it was decided that unless a passenger by steamboat places his baggage under the charge of the owner or agent, the owner is not liable for it in case it is lost or stolen.

Minnesota is, to travelers from Europe, a region of great interest and attraction. Almost every steamboat brings up foreigners of education, who are traveling for excitement, information, and pastime.

The contracts are made for extending the Rock River Railroad, Wis., from Fond-du-Lac to Janesville, 86 miles, and 20,000 tons of rails are on the way from England.

Central Railroad of New Jersey.

Summer Arrangements, commencing Monday, March 31, 1851.

THIS Road extends from ELIZABETHPORT, 35 miles, to WHITE HOUSE, N J, reducing the staging between the terminus of the Road and EASTON to 25 miles.

This line leaves New York by steamboat Red Jacket from pier No 1 North River, and connects with trains on the New Jersey Railroad, which leaves New York from foot of Cortland-st.

TRINS UP—Leave New York by steamboat Red Jacket, pier No 1 North River, at 9 A M, passenger; 1 P M, freight; and 5 P M, passenger; and by N J Railroad, foot of Cortland-st, at 9 A M, and 2 and 5¼ P M.

Trains leave White House and following places for New York as follows:

White House at 3¼ A M, freight; 5 40 A M, passenger, at 1 40 P M.

Somerville at 4 30 A M, freight; at 6 05 A M, passenger, at 2 05 P M.

Bound Brook at 4 50 A M, freight; at 6 15 A M, passenger, at 2 15 P M.

The Christian Review.

THE removal of this Quarterly to New York more than a year since, and its elevation in character, the Publishers are happy to say, have greatly increased its circulation. Seeing this readiness to appreciate and patronize their efforts, they are determined to spare no pains or expense in raising the work to the highest point of excellence, every way worthy of its position in the metropolis of the nation, and as the organ of one of the most numerous and respectable denominations in the land.

TERMS.

For a single copy, three dollars per annum. No subscriptions received for less than a volume commencing with the Jan. No. of each year.

Every person forwarding the subscription price of four copies, shall receive a fifth copy gratis.

POSTAGE PRE-PAID.

When paid in advance, the postage will be pre-paid by the Publishers; or, the postage will be pre-paid on all numbers issued after the payment of the subscription. ☞NEW POSTAGE LAW.☜

This offer of pre-payment of postage is of more importance in consequence of the new law. The postage under 500 miles is the same as before; over 500 and under 1,500 miles the postage will be double; over 1,500 and under 2,500 miles, treble; and over 2,500 and 3,500, quadruple.

☞ If, however, the postage is pre-paid it is only one-half the above rates.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

This periodical has at last taken its true position. It will now challenge comparison with the best religious Reviews—proving that the Baptists have intellectual power and diversity enough to maintain a denominational Quarterly of the highest standard. [Watchman and Reflector.

In tasteful and correct mechanical execution the "Review" is not surpassed by any of the Quarterlies. . . . Every minister should have it; and we wonder that more of our lay brethren, of educated mind, literary taste, and pecuniary ability, do not subscribe. [Michigan Christian Herald.

This is one of the best Quarterlies in the United States, and may, in fact, be regarded as a model of its kind. [Western Literary Messenger.

THE SABBATH QUESTION.

Messrs. Editors,—Your correspondent who furnished an article in your last in answer to a letter from "An Inquirer after Truth," has confined himself within such narrow limits as to be unable to meet fully the arguments he opposes. I have, therefore, ventured to send you a few lines, that I may help to supply what has been left undone. I, for one, am glad that "Inquirer" has written. I am sorry that he holds the views he advocates; but, since he does hold them, it is honest to declare them.

The main positions of "Inquirer" are—that the moral law is abrogated—that not only the Jewish, but the patriarchal and paradisaical observances are done away, and that, consequently, although the Sabbath was one of the precepts engraven on stones, and although found amongst the usages of earlier times, it has passed away with the introduction of the gospel dispensation.

In reply, I would observe—1. That Christ said he came not to destroy the law, but to fulfill it. (Matt. 5 : 17.) He could not mean the ceremonial law; that was repealed. (Col. 2 : 14.) Much less could he refer to the ceremonial as distinguished from the moral law. The eighteenth verse confirms this interpretation. "Till heaven and earth pass," continues the divine teacher, "one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law." See also Rom. 3 : 31.

"Inquirer" has endeavored to parry the force of these words by saying that Christ refers to the moral law of the universe. Suppose so, then it is the moral law of this world, and the moral law of the graven stones. Indeed, "Inquirer" says, the decalogue was a national declaration of this universal moral law. That is, this law was gathered up, concentrated, and exhibited in the decalogue. They are, then, essentially the same. If, therefore, this moral law of the universe remains undestroyed or unrepealed by Christ, so does the moral law of the decalogue.

2. "Inquirer" has assumed that the passage in 2 Cor. 3 : 7, teaches the absolute abrogation of the moral law. How any such sense arises from the verse adduced, it is hard to conceive. Even if the word covenant be supplied from the sixth verse, no such meaning is given. Adding the eighth verse to complete the sentence, the passage would then read, "But if the ministration" (of the covenant) "of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance, (which glory was to be done away,) how shall not the ministration of the covenant of the Spirit be rather glorious?"

The truth taught here is, that the old ministration or covenant of death had less glory than belongs to the ministration or covenant of the Spirit. The eleventh verse speaks of the glory of something that is done away, and the greater glory of something that remains; and, so far as the language of the whole passage is concerned, the apostle appears to be placing in opposition the ministration of the two economies. He magnifies his office. He shews that the ministry of the gospel, and not of the law, was committed to him and his fellow laborers. They were able ministers of the New Testament.

Dr. Bloomfield thus paraphrases the 7th and 8th verses: "If the ministry or office of promulgating a covenant which, in the letter," (when written on tables of stone,) "brought nothing but death with it, was glorious," (namely, by the appearance of angels with the cloud of glory,) "and so glorious, that the children of Israel were not able to look at the face of Moses, because of his countenance, which glory was soon to vanish, how much more shall not the ministration of the spiritual or the spirit-giving dispensation" (i. e. the Gospel) "be glorious?" If, then, we apply the words "done away," found in the 11th verse, to the whole passage, the sense would appear to be, that the ministry of the old covenant had been superseded by the ministry of the new.

I will not, however, insist that this is the meaning of the passage. Many ancient, and several eminent modern commentators, suppose that the opposition is between the two dispensations, and think that some term ought to be supplied or understood which would give this meaning. On one thing, however, it is fair to insist, viz., that the words, "written and engraven on stones," shall not be taken to designate the moral law as distinguished from other parts of the Mosaic economy. We must supply, not moral law, but dispensation, economy, or, more properly, covenant. We must supply that which was the subject of the ancient ministry. And who doubts that the old covenant has been displaced by the new?

3. Your correspondent does not help his argument by asserting that patriarchal and paradisaical usages have been abrogated with those which are Jewish. "That which was imperfect," he says, "in all these times, has given place to that which is perfect." To this statement I have no objection, but maintain that certain things, which could not be shaken, remain. Say, for illustration, that sacrifices were offered by Adam, by Abraham, and by Moses; these offerings must have ceased; but it does not follow that certain moral and abiding requirements might not have been associated with these things that pass away.

This point was argued in Mr. Young's communication in your October number, the drift of which your correspondent seems to have misconceived. In a foot-note he says, "I cannot help pointing out what strikes me as an error in the article in your last number. 'A man,' says Mr. Young, 'is put to death for gathering sticks on the Sabbath day, which would not be done in gospel times. Does it follow that the Sabbath itself cannot belong to this dispensation?' The answer is obvious. It follows that it does not belong to this dispensation as an enactment in the Jewish law. If attended to on account of the enactment in Jewish law, the whole law must be obeyed." Now, that the Sabbath was binding as a Jewish enactment was the very reverse of Mr. Young's conclusion. I understood him to argue, and I would argue with him, that the Sabbath was in force before it became a Jewish enactment, and independently of it. But if I do not hold a moral precept to be binding as a Jewish enactment, I hold that it may be in force notwithstanding it has been a Jewish enactment; and so must "Inquirer," according to his own showing. "The horns of the dilemma," then, are not for Mr. Young, but for him.

"The decalogue," "Inquirer" says, "was a national declaration of the moral law of the universe." Then it became a Jewish enactment. Yet as a universal law it is binding on all peoples. In being placed, therefore, under the moral law of the universe, all men are placed under what has been a Jewish enactment. For instance, a primary article of this universal law must be, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God." I cannot conceive of moral law for moral and intelligent creatures without such a requirement. Yet this was actually written and engraven on stones. As a part of the moral law of the universe, it must have been binding on Adam, Abraham, Moses, and Paul. And, since Christ came not to destroy it, it must now be binding on "Inquirer." Now, seeing that this has been a Jewish enactment, "Inquirer" must, according to his reasoning, either take the whole law and obey it, or allow me, that moral requirements may outlive certain observances with which they may have been temporarily associated.

I am, dear sirs, very truly yours,
A Baptist Minister.

The Sabbath Question.

We had intended this month closing the already too long continued discussion of this question. We have received many interesting and able letters, which we have been compelled reluctantly to pass by. We hope, however, that all our correspondents will have found their opinions expressed more or less fully already. We defer the close of the discussion for another month, only that we may insert the following letter, which expresses the views of a respectable class of Christians—larger in America than in England—with which, therefore, many of our readers may like to become acquainted. Our own concluding observations we hope to insert in our next number. Editor of The Church.

Messrs. Editors,—It has given me much pleasure to see the subject of the Sabbath introduced into your pages, and I agree with your correspondent T. W. B. in regretting that this important question is so seldom allowed to come fully before the public. The great liberality which you always manifest in matters of discussion, and especially in this, induces me to offer a few remarks on this much controverted subject, and I wish it were in my power more ably to advocate the views which I hold to be those taught in the Word of God; but I will refer your readers to the works of Bampfield, Stennett, Cornthwaite, &c., in England, and many others in America, who have, and are still most successfully setting forth the claims of the seventh-day Sabbath in such a light as I think unanswerable.

I would just make a few observations upon a passage or two in the article by Mr. Owen. He says, (after proving that the day which is now observed amongst most Christians is not the "Sabbath which God has commanded," in answer to the queries of T. W. B.,) "The only weekly Sabbath God ever appointed is not the first day of the week, but the seventh." Then, why is that day on which God rested from his work of creation, and gave to our first parents to enjoy, and again enjoined on the children of Israel at Sinai, (not as a new law, for he says, "Remember the Sabbath day," which implies that they had known it before, for he refers, in this command, to his own resting and hallowing the day,) to be now laid aside, and another substituted for it? I say that no law can, or ever has, set aside the law given at the mountain; our Lord never set it aside, for he says, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill; for verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled" (Matt. 5 : 17, 18;) and the apostle Paul, speaking of the law, says, "I had not known sin, except the law had said, 'Thou shalt not covet'" (Rom. 7 : 7;) and again, "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid; yea, we establish the law" (Rom. 3 : 31.) Surely he recognized the command in the same code which says, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." The apostle James also says, "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all" (Jas. 2 : 10;) and the beloved disciple, John, "He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him" (1 John 2 : 4.)

It is argued by some, that the decalogue was purely national, to be done away with at the coming of Christ, and a new covenant introduced; this is shewn to be a great mistake, in a few lines which I will quote from a very excellent tract.* "Admitting," says the author, "that it was delivered immediately to them [the Jewish nation] in the form of a national covenant, this does not in the least imply that it was not equally binding, as a rule of obedience, upon other portions of the human family. We might as well argue that the New Testament belonged merely to the primitive Christians, because it was delivered directly to them, and constituted the rule of their conduct, and the basis of their hopes. Yea, we might as well suppose that no nation except the Jews were bound not to have any other gods before the Lord, not to kill, not to commit adultery, not to steal, not to bear false witness, as to suppose that the decalogue was purely of a national character, and binding merely on that people during their continuance as a national church; and as the decalogue was not merely national as a whole, so there was nothing national in the fourth commandment."

Those who hold the perpetual obligation of the Decalogue, are driven to the expedient that, under christianity, the Sabbath has been changed frome the seventh to the first day of the week. Here, then, is their weak point. What law, what authority have they for their assertion? Shew us the command, and we will obey it; until another positive law, in so many express terms is given to us, we must consider that the command of God standeth fast; no pretended example of the apostles, no traditions of the church, are of any authority. As Mr. Owen very properly observes, "I cannot see how those Protestants who hold the Sabbath to have been transferred by God form the seventh day to the first, can answer him [the Papist] who relies on the authority of his church for the command to keep the first day of the week." Mr. Owen sees no command for it; neither do I. Then, upon what loose ground does he stand, when he rests upon "the examples of the apostles and the churches they planted, in conducting church affairs on this day, (Acts 20 : 7; 1 Cor. 16 : 1, 2), together with the resurrection of Christ, and his repeated visits to the disciples in their assembly on it, and especially in the second week, there being no recorded appearance of Christ to them, from the day he rose till that day week, and the giving of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost on that day." I will endeavor to shew, as concisely as I can, the mistake into which Mr. Owen has fallen, in supposing that any thing of a sacred character is imputed by the apostles to that day.

In the first place, "the examples of the apostles, and the churches they planted, in conducting church affairs on this day" (Acts 20 : 7; 1 Cor. 16 : 1, 2.) The first of these passages mentions a meeting of Christians "to break bread" on the first day of the week; but if the reader will refer to the common translation, he will find that there is no authority for the word day; why, then, might it not be the first night of the week? which would, according to Scripture reckoning, be the evening after the Sabbath—a continuation of their Sabbath meeting. Paul was ready to depart on the morrow, (the first day,) and the brethren were anxious to obtain as much of his counsel and comfort as they could; he, therefore, continued his speech until midnight, in order that he might continue his journey at the break of day, i. e., the first day of the week. But even if this is thought to be a strained explanation of the passage, his breaking bread amongst them carries no proof that they were sanctifying the day; for it is said in Acts 2 : 46, that they did so daily; and what was done daily, could not be peculiar to the Sabbath.

The second passage that Mr. Owen quotes is, 1 Cor. 16 : 1, 2. Here, again, there is no proof of the christians meeting together for any religious purpose; on the contrary, it was their temporal affairs that the apostle wished them to attend to. The common English reader does not perceive that the original much more distinctly expresses the private nature of the command; but it would be better translated thus, "Let each of you by himself," &c., i. e., at home, not in the treasury of the church, as is sometimes asserted. This proves that they were attending to their secular business on the first day, and therefore I shall dismiss this passage as containing no proof whatever.

2. "The resurrection of Christ" on that day. Where does Mr. Owen find that our Saviour rose on the first day of the week? In Luke 24 : 1, 2, we find, "Now, upon the first day of the week, very early in the morning, they [the women] came unto the sepulchre, bringing the spices which they had prepared;" and in John 20 : 1, "The first day of the week cometh Mary Magdalene, early, when it was yet dark, unto the sepulchre;" and in Matt. 28 : 1, "In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene." A very good translation of this latter passage, I quote from a review by the Rev. W. H. Black. "The true rendering is," mentioning this verse, "at the end of the week, on the [night] which shone towards the first [day] of the week. The word sabbaton occurs alike in each place, and certainly in the plural form, without an article, it means week, not Sabbath. Besides, the moon was at the full, and shone all night. These two facts appear to have been generally overlooked by translators and critics."* All these passages tend to prove that the Saviour had risen before the first day had begun, and at the end of the Sabbath; therefore they have no ground to stand upon who rely for the observation of the first day upon the supposition that the resurrection took place on that day.

3. "His repeated visits to the disciples in their assembly on it, and especially in the second week; there being no recorded appearance of Christ to them from the day he rose till that day week." The first appearance of the Saviour to his disciples I find to be to two of them, as they were going to Emmaus the first day of the week. Surely they could not have attached any sanctity to the day, for they were going a distance of "threescore furlongs," which was more than a Sabbath day's journey; and no doubt our Lord would have upbraided them if they had thus broken the Sabbath. Mr. Owen says, "especially in the second week." I suppose he refers to where it is said our Lord appeared to them after eight days; what proof is there that that was the next following first day? Can eight days after the first day mean the first day itself? I take it to be the second, or third, or any day after.

4. "The giving of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost on that day." "It is far from being conclusively proved (says the author of the tract before alluded to) that this event occurred on the first day of the week. It is much more likely to have occurred either on the fifth or the seventh. Indeed, it is quite manifest, from the best calculations that can be made, from the time of eating the passover supper, the first paschal Sabbath, the crucifixion, and the resurrection, that it occurred on one or the other of these days." (Page 21.)

Thus, I hope, I have proved satisfactorily to the minds of some of your readers, that the example of the apostles does not warrant the change of the day; and the perpetuity of the moral law has been fully proved by Mr. Young, in your number for October.

In conclusion, I cannot help referring to a passage by "A sincere Inquirer after Divine Truth," where he says, "If there was a permanent Sabbath law issued at the creation as commemorative of the resting of Jehovah from his works, it is time we went back to the old practice, for, according to our present custom, we do not obey it." I wish, indeed, the old practice were restored; and I hope the author, who is "a friend of truth," will soon see the untenableness of his views, and return to the good old way. One remark must be made on the assertion of Mr. Leigh in the December number: "He is a bold and dangerous innovator who would now tell us, after 1800 years, that the 'faithful in Christ Jesus' have, during that lengthened period, mistaken their Lord's will with regard to such an important matter as the observance of the Sabbath." The argument, I think, by a Pædobaptist, might be turned against him, in his observance of believers' baptism, (which, I suppose, most contributors to "The Church" practice,) that he must be a bold and dangerous innovator, if he tells the "faithful in Christ Jesus," who think differently from him, that they have mistaken their Lord's will, in observing infant sprinkling instead of believers' baptism. I am, dear Sirs, yours truly,

A Seventh-Day Baptist.

ON DEATH.

Translated for the Independent from an ancient German Hymn.

My God! I know too well that I must die;
I am but man who soon departeth.
I here inherit no propriety
That long and fast abideth.
Now therefore show me graciously,
How I may meet my death happily.

My God! I know not when I must
Away; no moment glides securely.
How soon a potsherd breaketh into dust!
The flower—it fades how easily!
Therefore but make me ever ready
Now in time for my eternity.

My God! I know not how I am to die,
For death its ways hath variously.
To one there is a bitter sev'rance of life's tie;
Another passeth off most peacefully.
Still as thou wilt; grant me only this,
My end may be not reasonless.

My God! I know not where I am to die,
Nor what 's the sand 'neath which my grave shall lie;
Still let but this my blessed heirship be,
That thy good Word to Life shall waken me;
Then take I gladly any clime whatever,
For all the earth is thine in every part forever.

Now, dearest God! if I indeed must die,
Then take thou, to thee take my spirit,
Christ's blood its only bath and merit,
And have I Jesus only to me nigh,
Then 'tis all one to my poor heart,
When, how, and where I must depart. H.

THE JOYFUL SURPRISE.

In an English village, the name of which is unnecessary for me to give, there dwelt, till lately, an old man whom I shall call John Roberts. Although poor, he was rich in faith, and had acquired an influence which gold could not have bought. He was unwearied in doing good, and particularly in that kind of it which consists in visiting and ministering to the sick. However infectious the disorder, John Roberts shrunk not from the errand of mercy. Where others quailed he went boldly forward, giving consolation to the dying believer, and leading the penitent sinner away from dependence upon himself to a trust on the crucified One.

Flesh and blood will sometimes shrink, however, and murmuringly imagine that no good is done, when no fruit is seen. After a course of usefulness, John Roberts was at one time disposed to grow weary and faint in his mind. How often does such a temptation beset the Christian! How often does he think the precious seed lost, when it is but hid in the ground, ready to spring forth and fructify.

One evening, when betrayed into this state of mind, our hero (for does not such a man deserve the title?) was invited by a friend to call upon a sick man, in a neighboring village. John half doubted the utility of his errand, but at last shook off the temptation. "I will go," he said to himself—"'let us not be weary in well-doing; in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.'"

Arrived at the village, he was not long in finding the place of his destination. It was an ordinary cottage, with a neat plot of garden-ground before it. On knocking, the door was opened by a respectful-looking woman, to whom John explained his errand.

"Come in, sir; he will be so happy to see you, I am sure. The doctor has just left, and has said that he cannot live out the night."

The sick man was found reclining on a bed, which, like the other furniture of the apartment, was plain, but at the same time scrupulously clean.

"My friend," said John, after a few kind inquiries of a general nature, "it is a solemn thing to lie as you now do, with the prospect of so soon going before a holy God, to give in an account of the deeds done in the body."

"Ay, ay, sir, it is a solemn thing," replied the dying man; "but 'I know in whom I have believed.'"

It was cheering to have such an answer; but John Roberts was not one to take things easily for granted. He knew that an apparently strong confidence sometimes rests on a sandy foundation, and that not every one that calls Christ "Lord, Lord," shall enter the kingdom of heaven. The weakest faith that leans on the Saviour is preferable, it has been well said, to the strongest that leans on self. A few other questions, however, brought forth replies which showed that in this case, at least, the work was a genuine one. The poor invalid, convinced of sin, had fled as a penitent to the Saviour, and yielded himself up, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, to his light and easy yoke.

"And how long," said the gratified visitor, "is it since you first knew the Lord?"

"About twenty years ago. Ah, sir!" continued the sick man, turning his eyes full on the visitor; "my conversion was a wonderful one. It was wrought, do you know, by a miracle."

"A miracle!" said John; "all true conversions are miracles. It is as great a wonder for a man dead in trespasses and in sins to be born again by the Holy Ghost, as for a corpse to be brought to life."

"Ay, ay, sir," said the dying man, "that is very true; I don't mean that; mine was a real miracle; as much as any in the Old or New Testament."

"Impossible, impossible, my friend," said John, incredulously; for he was now afraid that, after all, the invalid must have been resting on some delusion.

"You may think so, at first, I dare say; but you won't, I am sure, when you have heard me out," rejoined the invalid. "About twenty years ago, I was living a very ungodly life; I had no fear of God before my eyes. I was a burden to myself and others. I drank, I swore, I profaned the Sabbath. It happened, however, that I was one day sent into a field to mow some hay. I had made an engagement in the evening to meet some companions in the ale-house, and have a night of folly. Well, as I was saying, I went into the field and took my dinner with me, for it was some distance to walk home again. It was only some bread and cheese, for I was kept too poor by drinking to buy any thing better. When I got to the field, I looked about for some place to put it in, and taking my handkerchief, I wrapped it up, and hid it in a hole in the hedge. There was nobody in the field but myself; of that I am quite sure. Well, dinner time came, and I went away to get my bread and cheese. There was the bundle as I had left it. I opened it, all unconcerned, and inside, to my astonishment, lay a little tract. I could not believe my eyes at first, but there it was. I opened it and read it, trembling all over as I did so. I knew that no one else had been in the field, or I must have seen him. God himself must have sent some angel with it, I thought. So I read, and as I began to read it, it told me of my lost and sinful condition, and warned me to flee from the wrath to come. I fell down on my knees then and there, and prayed, 'God be merciful to me a sinner!' I resolved that as he had sent down this tract to me, I would henceforth give myself to my Saviour, and lead a new life. I did not go the ale-house that night, you may be sure. It was long before I got any peace or hope; but at last I was able to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and was filled with joy, and peace, and love. Ever since then, I have been, I trust, a new creature; and soon I hope to be with him and praise him for all his mercies to me. Now, sir, was I not right in saying that my conversion was caused by a real miracle?"

As he concluded, the old man looked at John Roberts. The countenance of the latter seemed strangely agitated by the narrative. "How long did you say it was since this happened?" he inquired.

"Twenty years ago, come Michaelmas next," said the old man.

"Was not the field called Ponder's Bush, and did it not belong to farmer Jones?" continued Roberts, in an eager voice. "Praised be God! I can explain your miracle. That morning I myself had gone out to walk along the footpath near that field, when I happened to see through the hedge a man in the neighboring field, looking about as if he wanted to hide something. I was curious to know what it could be, thinking, at first, he had been doing something wrong; and, standing still, I watched till I saw where he put his bundle. On getting nearer I found it was only his dinner, and had a mind to leave it and walk on. Having some tracts in my pocket, however, I said, 'It can do no harm to leave him one.' So I slipped in the tract, and left it; for, thought I, who knows but God may bless it to the man when he comes to read it?"

We must leave our readers to imagine the scene that followed; the tears of pleasure that ran down John's cheeks as he thus found the good seed returned to him after many days; the wondering and yet grateful feelings of the poor man as the mystery that so long had puzzled his simple intellect was thus cleared up. He died shortly afterwards, filled with joy and peace in believing. John Roberts returned home, re-animated and encouraged in his work and labor of love, for he had indeed had a joyful surprise.

A CONVERSION AT MADRAS.

V. Streenavassa Charry, a young Brahmin of the highest or Iyenger caste, unsolicited, and without any intercourse with missionaries or other professors of the Gospel faith on the subject of religion, has spontaneously and deliberately embraced it. He received his education at the Madras University, where theological subjects are not introduced; but, being obliged by his narrow circumstances to seek for employment, he entered about three years since into that of Mr. V. Seth Sam, as a Tamil and Teloogoo Translator. While thus engaged he had free access to Mr. Sam's Library, of which he gladly availed himself, but we are positively assured that no attempt was made by that gentleman to convert him. His own convictions, formed on the Scriptural truths which he had studied, alone brought him, under Divine grace, to forsake the idolatry of his countrymen, and to lay hold on the Christian faith. Obedient to his new convictions, Mr. V. Streenavassa Charry left his home and family on the evening of the 3d instant, and placed himself under the charge of Rev. Mr. Symonds, for the purpose of obtaining baptism; which rite was administered to him, Mr. Symonds having fully satisfied himself of the sincerity of the convert, and of his fitness for admission into the Christian church.

The relatives and friends of the youth, and indeed the members of his caste in general, are, of course, powerfully agitated by his renunciation of Hindooism, which is the greater blow to them, that they cannot attribute it, as is usually done, to the acts and persuasions of missionary zeal. Every effort has been made by them to win him back from the true faith, although his having broken caste in the most decisive manner, places him, we imagine, irreparably without the pale of his quondam religion. Very painful meetings have taken place between himself and family; but notwithstanding the distress occasioned to him by their sorrows, he was enabled to hold fast the good profession he had made. His great desire, we believe, is to become a messenger of Christ to his countrymen, and especially to those of his own caste. [Madras Spectator.

SOLACE OF THE GOSPEL.

The Paris correspondent of the London Christian Times relates an instance of the happy effects produced by the gospel of our blessed Lord upon a very poor and wretched old peasant woman, who earns a scanty living by weeding gardens in a town some leagues from the metropolis:—

"Since I embraced the Protestant faith," she said one day, "I have been perfectly happy. Before that, I used to be constantly complaining and unhappy at my condition, saying I was an unfortunate woman, and envying all who were better dressed and better fed than myself. Now, just as I am, I am happy to the bottom of my soul, and I would change conditions with no one; for since it has pleased our God and dear Saviour to make me what I am, I know it is for my good, and I only ask to do the will of my Heavenly Father. There are some who pretend to say that there should be no rich people; I do not think so now; for I see in the gospel that there always have been rich folk; but I do not wish to be one of them, for it is very difficult for the rich to enter into the kingdom of heaven. I have also heard that there are people unhappy enough to say there is no God? How dreadful! The beautiful sun that lightens me—this rose-tree that I am now clearing—but, above all, my heart, my soul, cry aloud that he creates all things, directs all things, and all out of love to us, who are, alas! so bad and ungrateful!" Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes.

REMINISCENCE OF PRES. EDWARDS.

A correspondent of Zion's Herald, in writing from Enfield, Ct., makes the following reference to a well-known occurrence in the life of President Edwards:—

"This place is situated in the town of Enfield, in the north-western corner of Connecticut, and on the banks of the beautiful river which gives name to the State, eighteen miles from Hartford, and eight miles from Springfield, Mass. It was in the Congregationalist church in this town, now situated about a mile and a half from this village, that Jonathan Edwards, of Northampton, during 'the great awakening,' July 8th, 1742, preached his famous sermon on 'Sinners in the hands of an angry God,' from Deut. 32 : 35—'Their foot shall slide in due time.' At this time, the revival, which had commenced in Northampton eight years before, had not reached this place; and previous to the contemplated visit of Mr. Edwards, much prayer was offered by the friends of the work, and the neighboring society, for a blessing on his labors, on this occasion. When he commenced, the audience was as gay and thoughtless, and as undevout as well could be; but before he closed, loud sobs and cries for mercy broke forth from all parts of the house; while the old pastor, who was with him in the pulpit, alarmed and terrified beyond measure, not so much at what he saw, as by the doctrine of the sermon, was seen standing by his side, exclaiming, 'O, Mr. Edwards, is not God a merciful God?'"

THE LIGHT OF NATURE.

The celebrated Mr. Hume wrote an essay on the sufficiency of the light of nature, and the no less celebrated Robertson wrote on the necessity of revelation, and the insufficiency of the light of nature. Hume came one evening to visit Robertson, and the evening was spent in conversing on this subject. The friends of both were present, and it is said that Robertson reasoned with unaccustomed clearness and power. Whether Hume was convinced by his reasonings, or not, we cannot tell; but at any rate he did not acknowledge his convictions. Hume was very much of a gentleman, and as he was about to depart, bowed politely to those in the room, while, as he retired through the door, Robertson took the light to show the way. Hume was still facing the door: "Oh! sir," said he to Robertson, "I find the light of nature always sufficient;" and he continued, "Pray, don't trouble yourself, sir," and so he bowed on. The street door was open, and presently, as he bowed along in the entry, he stumbled over some thing concealed, and pitched down stairs into the street. Robertson ran after him with a light, and as he held it over him, whispered, "You had better have a little light from above, friend Hume." And raising him up, he bade him good night, and returned to his friends.

More frequent Preaching.—I would encourage theological students to preach more frequently than they generally do. I would not have them neglect their studies. But an important branch of studies should be the composition and delivery of sermons; and the maxim that "practice makes perfect," applies to no one more truly than to a minister. I shall never forget the remark made to me, when I was a young preacher. When once putting the day of preaching afar off, under feelings of unfitness and despondency, my honored tutor observed: "The way to learn to preach, is to preach." Those words have come to my mind at distant intervals for more than forty years; and I am more confirmed in their truth than when they were first delivered. I would have young men study prayerfully, diligently, patiently, perseveringly. I would have them meditate on all good and appropriate knowledge; but until they accustom themselves to the utterance of their thoughts, they will never acquire the proper capacity to do so. "The way to learn to preach, is to preach." [Rev. Dr. Sharp.

THE MEETING-HOUSE AND THE GRAVE-YARD.

It is well known, that we have no particular reverence for the wood, brick, and mortar, of which a church edifice is composed, nor do we consider them any more holy than similar materials laid into any other building. Neither do we believe that the building in its finished state, adorned and garnished with all the furniture necessary for a house of public worship, is any more holy than a common building. Certainly it is not holy in any such sense as the Temple of the Old Dispensation was holy, that is, as typifying "good things to come." Nevertheless, as a building dedicated to the worship of Almighty God, the very sight of it naturally reminds us, by a principle of association of ideas, of the great object of our fear, and calls forth the reverential feelings which are becoming to us as the creatures of his hand. Who, that is not hardened in iniquity, can take his seat in such a house, or even walk round about it, without reflecting upon the greatness and power of the Being that is worshiped there? Who does not have his sense of accountability quickened into greater activity? For our own part, we look upon every building dedicated to the worship of the Most High as something calculated to remind us of God and heaven, of Christ and eternal life, of death and our accountability to the Judge of all. And if we do not, when in it or near it, repress our levity and hush our lips in silence and awe, let that be set down to our depravity, and may God have mercy on us. Some may regard this as superstition, but we believe it to be nothing more than the reverence which befits every one who thinks of the Almighty. And, in our opinion, one who habituates himself to looseness of behavior in the house of God, or allows himself to treat the building itself with contempt, is in danger of losing his reverence for the great Being to whom such building has been dedicated. The thoughtless young man, who notches the seats with his knife, or carves grotesque figures upon them, or scratches the walls with his pencil, or even squirts his puddles of tobacco juice upon the floor, forgets that God is there.

We have been prompted to these remarks by seeing the shameful neglect with which houses of worship are sometimes treated, even by those who have built them and set them apart for the service of God. How does it look to see a meeting-house, with its doors standing wide open from one Sabbath to another, affording a harbor for dogs, swine, and whatever else may choose to enter? Or how does it look to see the windows broken in a dozen or twenty places, and remaining so for weeks and months together? How does it look to see the weather-boards loose, and hanging by a single nail, when a little timely attention would remedy the matter? And how unseemly, that the floor should remain unswept for weeks, and be allowed to accumulate mud and dust till decency itself is outraged! And how shameful to leave noxious weeds, and briars, and bushes, growing all around, such as no tidy farmer would allow to remain upon his land! In the course of our peregrinations, lately, we saw a meeting-house so hemmed in with elder-bushes and briars, that, had we seen them about a private dwelling, we should at once have set down the proprietor of it as a drunkard. Such things are perfectly shameful. What is such neglect but a positive injury inflicted upon the house of God? Wherever we see it, we regard it as prima facie evidence that the cause of piety with that church is low. We fear that the members have not the highest reverence for the God they profess to worship. The boy that whittles away the back of the pew with his knife, is regarded as irreverent. But what better is the church that allows the elements to commit their ravages, and time to do its waste, without any attempt at preservation? If irreverence does not steal over the hearts of such people, and steal them away from God, we are mistaken as to the laws of the human mind. Yet these very people will perhaps spend hundreds and thousands upon the improvement and adorning of their own premises. "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses, and the house of the Lord lie waste?"

Akin to this is the neglect of the Grave-Yard. It does strike us as a sort of profanity to treat the last resting place of the dead as some do. Sometimes, instead of a neat fence and handsomely trimmed grounds, we see an apology for an enclosure, of old broken rails, with openings here and there for every cow and sheep that roams at large to enter and trample upon the graves, while hogs are rooting the ground in all directions. There are brambles, and thorns, and thistles, too, covering the whole area; and scarcely an indication is given that the memory of the departed is dear to surviving friends. We cannot abide such things. We love to see the grave-yard kept in good repair. We could scarcely consent to have our remains deposited where the swine trampled and rooted at will. Philosophy, it is true, teaches that it could make no difference to the dead; and after we are dead, we shall not probably offer this objection. But while we are living, we have some feelings which neither philosophy nor logic will control; and we are not sure but what these feelings find some justification in the Word of God. But apart from this, it is fit and becoming that the grave-yard should show the respect of the living for the memory of the dead. Fathers and mothers, and brothers and sisters, and wives and children, were dear to us while they lived. And who does not love to linger about the spot where lies entombed the body which was once the lodging place of a soul whom we loved? If one looks with interest upon the house where once a beloved friend resided, much deeper is the interest with which he contemplates the body in which that friend's soul once dwelt.

We are not sure whether these remarks will hit any of our Seventh-day Baptist churches. But if there is any of them whose meeting-house finds a daguerreotype in our description, or whose grave-yard answers the forlorn picture we have given, we hope that our remarks will serve to stir them up to duty. We confess that we cannot help entertaining an unfavorable opinion of any church that hangs out such unequivocal signs of their own want of public spirit.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Crystal Palace on Sundays—Sunday-keeping in Paris—Jesuits in Ireland and England—The Anti-Popery Bill—Church Property.

GLASGOW, August 8th, 1851.

A correspondent of the Times complained lately, that friends of the Commissioners were admitted free, in large numbers, to the Crystal Palace on Sundays, and that photographs were on that day taken of various pieces of statuary and other objects, without the knowledge or concurrence of the exhibitors. A statue, he affirmed, was mutilated on Sunday week, while being removed to a favorable situation for the process. The statue had been previously sold, but the purchaser had, in consequence, refused to implement the bargain. Col. Sibthorp, in the House of Commons, gave notice that he would put questions to the Government on the subject, which he accordingly did, in the early part of the present week. The questions bearing on the above facts seem to have been distinctly enough put; but Mr. Lewis, in reply, stated that in consequence of the Colonel's notice of motion, he had felt it to be his duty to make inquiry of the gentleman at the head of the Board of Customs, under whose care the building is, and that he had been informed that no goods under bond had been liberated on Sunday. Having been reminded what the questions really were, he replied, that he could say nothing about what may have been done by the Committee of Management; he could only speak for the Board of Customs.

The Lord Mayor of London and civic authorities, with nearly five thousand friends, having left London for Paris, and been feted there, serious complaint is made by the friends of Sunday observance, that Sunday was included among the days of amusement, when 100,000 persons went to Versailles, and his Lordship did not duly maintain the sanctity of the day in the French capital. The favorable opportunity of showing to the members of the Church of Rome how much more strictly the members of the Church of England are pleased to keep the day which Rome set apart, was thus lost, and its dignity compromised on an important occasion. Paris certainly makes little pretense of giving the sacred obligations of Sabbath to the Sunday. Even their Courts of Justice seem to be held upon it; for, on Sunday, July 13th, two booksellers were condemned in the Court of Assize of the Seine at Paris to three months' imprisonment, and a fine equivalent to about £12 sterling, for selling three books. It is true that these books are asserted to turn the Catholic religion into ridicule; but if there had been a strong feeling of sacredness as belonging to Sunday, it would surely have enabled both priests and police to bear the reproach one day more, and postpone the trial till Monday, seeing the culprits could hardly escape.

A return was presented at the close of last month to the House of Lords of the number of Jesuits resident in England and Ireland, (omitting Scotland, we know not why.) From this return it would appear that not a few in this country are members of this dangerous Society, who have not been known as such. On their own showing, also, they can be traced as under the direction of leading members at Rome—whom they are bound by their oaths, as Jesuits, implicitly to obey. Need we, then, be surprised if cabals are formed and disturbance arise? In a lecture delivered last month by the fervent Dr. Newman, he is reported to have spoken thus: "Astonishing to say, Queen Victoria is distinctly pointed out in the Book of Revelation as having 'the number of the beast!'—the number 666. Now she came to the throne in '37, at which date she was 18 years old. Multiply, then, 37 by 18, and you have the very number 666, which is the mystical emblem." We have seen not a few remarkable attempts to penetrate this mystery, but none could surpass in cool assurance the man who can palm even on a Papist audience such a piece of absurdity. The quotient, in a question of simple multiplication, is here correctly stated; but both the multiplicator and the multiplicand a Jesuit only could have found and used for such a purpose. The Queen did not ascend the throne in 37, but in 1837—but this number multiplied by 18 would not give the desired result; it is therefore discarded without ceremony, and 37 conveniently adopted. And the man who thus unblushingly treats the Word of God, calls himself a priest—the priest, too, of a church which attaches importance as to what a priest intends when celebrating its observances.

The Ecclesiastical Titles Assumption Bill has received the Royal Assent, and is now, therefore, the law of the land. What effect it will have remains to be seen; but with such men as Dr. Newman, just referred to, and with a church which holds that the end sanctifies the means, we have no other expectation than that the law will be evaded, as, indeed, it is said, Wiseman, by anticipation, did by the manner in which he contrived to consecrate two English Bishops on the 25th of last month. The Tablet (a Popish newspaper) more openly talks defiance, and declares that the priesthood will give obedience to the Pope's decrees, rather than to acts of Parliament, when the two are opposed—and this is indeed just what might be expected where they have the power to choose, but it is what they have often enough denied.

The Episcopal and Capitular Estates Management Bill had reached to a third reading in the House of Commons, but was then negatived by a majority of 45 against 34. The amount of Church property in one form and another is great, and its management is far from being perfect. In such questions, Sir B. Hall is often a thorn in the sides of the Bishops, who have contrived to secure a much larger revenue than was intended at a former settlement. He opposed this Bill, saying he thought it was a measure "open to some suspicion," but refused to give farther explanation. The assurance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it "was intended only for the good of the Church, and not for that of any private individual," did not save the Bill—a majority seeming to be of the opinion that it was "open to some suspicion."

On the 29th of last month, the House of Commons, by a majority of 75 against 47, addressed Her Majesty the Queen, praying her that measures be taken to preserve the Crystal Palace until the 1st of May, with a view of ascertaining if it could be adapted to purposes of public utility and recreation. The answer given is, that it requires grave consideration; but it is probable, from the interest generally expressed, that it will be made permanent.

The telegraph has just brought the intelligence that Parliament was prorogued this afternoon. There seems to be nothing in the Queen's speech on the occasion requiring notice. J. A. BEGG.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

There was a great gathering of temperance men at Saratoga on the fourth and fifth days of last week for a National Convention. Hon. Reuben H. Walworth presided on the occasion, and among the speakers were some of the most distinguished advocates of the Temperance Cause. The most prominent topic of discussion was the principle embodied in the Maine Liquor Law, viz., that it is the right and duty of the State not only to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, but to destroy all such liquors found on sale as a beverage. The following resolutions, adopted by the Convention, express the general spirit of its deliberations:—

Resolved, That the evils of intemperance cannot be prevented while the traffic in intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage is continued, and that it is the right and the duty of the people, in self-defense, by legislation and other suitable means, to bring such traffic to an end.

Resolved, That the recent discussion and action in the Legislatures of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Vermont, Illinois, and Indiana, on this subject—the constitutional exclusion of all licenses in Michigan and Ohio—and the entire outlaw of the traffic in spirituous and intoxicating liquors, as a beverage, in Iowa and Maine, are gratifying tokens of advance in public sentiment, and give reason to hope that, with the divine blessing on judicious and persevering efforts, this immoral and pernicious traffic will ere long be done away.

Resolved, That the principle assumed and carried out in the Maine law, that spirituous and intoxicating liquor, kept for sale as a beverage, should be destroyed by the State, as a public evil, meets the approbation of this Convention, as consonant with the destruction of the implements of gambling and counterfeiting, of poisonous food, infectious hides, and weapons of war in the hands of an enemy; that if the liquor destroyed is private property, it is only so as are the implements of the counterfeiter, dangerous and deadly to the intesests of the community; that its destruction is no waste of the bounties of Providence, more than the destruction of noxious weeds, while its very destruction enriches the State exceeding the amount for which it could have been sold; that it tends to put an end to all subterfuges, frauds, and secret sales, and to the demands for it in the community; that it makes the State a perfect asylum for the inebriate; it is a solemn manifestation to the world of the vile and worthless nature of the article destroyed, and an unmistakable token to the vender of the end to which a righteous public sentiment will ultimately bring his business. For these and other reasons the Convention give it their hearty approbation, and they do strongly recommend to all the friends of Temperance, to cherish it as the sure, and the only sure, triumph of their cause, and continually to urge its adoption upon every Legislature.

THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW.—The enactment of laws, on the part of Maine Legislature, excluding rum, as a beverage, from the State limits, can no longer be considered as an experiment of doubtful issue. A Portland correspondent of The Newburyport Union says:

"The Temperance Law is operating much more favorably than was anticipated. There is less resistance on the part of the sellers, and a strong determination with the authorities to drive the whole family of rum from the State. Should the law be supported, it will no doubt lead te its adoption throughout New-England. They look upon and treat the means of drunkenness here, as you do the means of gambling, which are confiscated. For two months there have been no commitments for intemperance in the city, and I learn from the Overseers of the Poor, that it is having a visible effect in that department. If the reform continues, an alms-house may yet become the retreat of the unfortunate and the invalid, free from all association with vice and crime."

COLORED PEOPLE IN INDIANA.

We grieve to say, that the people of Indiana, at their late election, have by a special vote ratified the following, and made it part and parcel of their New Constitution:—

SEC. 1. No negro or mulatto shall come into or settle in this State after the adoption of this Constitution.

SEC. 2. All contracts made with any negro or mulatto coming into this State contrary to the foregoing section, shall be void; and all persons who shall employ, or otherwise encourage such negro or mulatto to remain in this State, shall be fined in any sum of not less than ten dollars nor more than five hundred dollars.

SEC. 3. All fines which may be collected for a violation of the provisions of the above article, or any law which may hereafter be passed for the purpose of carrying the same into execution, shall be set apart and appropriated for the colonization of such negroes and mulattoes, and their descendants, as may be in the State at the adoption of this Constitution and may be willing to emigrate.

SEC. 4. The General Assembly shall pass laws to carry out the provisions of this article.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

In the British Parliament, recently, while a vote of £60,000 for expenses under the acts for the abolition of the slave trade was under consideration, Lord Palmerston made the following very gratifying statements, from which it appears that there is good reason to expect the speedy termination of the Slave Trade:—

"On the coast of Africa, by the great vigilance of our cruisers; by the treaties with native chiefs, which had been observed with great fidelity; by the progress made by the colony of Liberia; by the coöperation of the authorities in the Portuguese settlements, and by the active and friendly assistance of the French and American officers, a great impression has been made on the slave trade on that coast, and, as far as the Line, it might be said to be at present almost extinguished. On the coast of Brazil, the British cruisers having been more concentrated, their operations were becoming more effectual, whilst the Brazilian Government, which had passed a law declaring the slave trade piracy, had at last exerted a proper degree of vigilance and power in enforcing its regulations, and the result had been that, in the course of eight months, they had almost extinguished the Brazilian slave trade. The number of slaves imported into Brazil in 1850 was not above half that brought in former years; in the first quarter of the present year, very few slaves had been brought, and the Government of Brazil was now co-operating heartily with that of England, and fulfilling the obligations of the treaties between the two countries. In Africa itself, legitimate commerce was increasing; an anti-slave-trade feeling was growing up in Brazil, where capital was withdrawn from the traffic of slaves and invested in other speculations; so that, both in Africa and Brazil, there had been a most happy change. That this change would be permanent he also confidently anticipated. At last, therefore, our perseverance had been rewarded, if not by the annihilation of this abominable traffic, at least by having brought it within the narrowest limits."

CHURCH RATES IN ENGLAND.

Rev. Isaac Doxsey, a Congregational minister, whose goods had been seized and sold for church rates, has published a correspondence between himself and the Archbishop of Canterbury on the subject. Mr. Doxsey wrote at considerable length, with much directness and Christian simplicity. We copy from the Independent the last paragraph of his letter, and the very curious archiepiscopal letter in reply:—

"I only need remind you that no legislation can make that right which is wrong per se. Probably this outrage is according to law, (though of this I am rather doubtful,) but the real character of the act is not thereby altered in the sight of God. And whether the Saviour can regard with pleasure the consecration of a week in commemoration of his last sufferings, and the desecration of one day of that week by so gross a violation of his laws, in the legal robbery of one of the humblest of his followers, I leave you to determine.

"Praying that all concerned in this unchristian transaction may receive pardon from our God, and in heart exercising it toward them,

"I beg to subscribe myself,
"Your 'Grace's' injured brother in Christ,
"ISAAC DOXSEY."

"LAMBETH, April 22, 1851.

"SIR:—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, treating on a subject which you will hardly expect me to argue with you. But pardon me if I observe, that though you cite several texts from Scripture, there is one passage which you have overlooked, and which, if duly pondered, may perhaps in future justify you in your own opinion, if you submit to similar demands, even while you object to the principle or right by which they are enforced. I allude to Matt. 5: 40—41.

"And remain, Sir, your obedient humble servant,
"Mr. I Doxsey. J. B. CANTUAR."

"ATTENTION TO LITTLE MATTERS."—The following paragraph from an article on this subject by the editor of the Western Watchman, speaks our sentiments exactly:—

"Nothing so clearly marks a truly honest man as honesty in little things. 'He that is faithful in little is faithful also in much, but he that is unjust in little is unjust also in much,' says the Saviour of the world. A truly honest man will never ask to have his paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid. He will never refuse to take his paper from the office till he has paid up fully, as law and justice require."

BAPTIST STATISTICS.—The Baptist Almanac for 1852 (just published) makes the total number of Baptist communicants in the United States 784,028, of whom 62,738 are anti-mission. Baptisms in one year, 52,398. There are 614 Associations, 10,895 churches, 6,406 ordained ministers, 1,211 licentiates. In the State of New York there are 42 Associations, 803 churches, 738 ordained ministers, 91 licentiates, 85,858 communicants, and 3,058 baptized within a year.

MADISON UNIVERSITY.—The Commencement Exercises of Madison University, at Hamilton, Madison Co., N. Y., were held last week. On Sunday evening Rev. Dr. Dowling of New York preached before the Society of Inquiry, on the subject of Missions. The following evening was occupied with an address before the Literary Societies, by Wm. Tracy, Esq. of Utica, followed by a Poem from Wm. H. Burleigh of Syracuse. The next morning Rev. Robert Turnbull preached before the Education Society, and in the evening Rev. S. D. Burchard addressed the Alumni. On Fourth-day came the orations of the graduating class; after which a large number of persons received the title of A.M., and that of D.D. was conferred upon Revs. J. L. Hodge, S. D. Burchard, and R. Turnbull.

COMMENCEMENT AT LEWISBURG, PA.—The first annual Commencement of the University at Lewisburg was celebrated last week. The performances of the graduating class (seven in number) were highly creditable to themselves and to the institution. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon the Rev. Horatio G. Jones of Lower Merion. After the conferring of degrees, Professor Bliss delivered his Inaugural Address as Professor of Languages, and the Rev. Dr. Malcom was installed as President of the University. The occasion was one of deep interest to the patrons and friends of the institution.

A MISSIONARY SHIP.—Some two years ago the juvenile friends of missions in England made a contribution, and purchased a missionary ship, which they named the "John Williams." She sailed recently from one of the English ports, taking out seven missionaries and 5000 copies of the Bible in the language of Rarotonga. One of the missionaries, Mr. Darling, has been engaged in the work thirty-five years; another, Mr. Bazacott, has translated the entire Scriptures. Of the others, Mr. William Gill is appointed to Mangaia, Mr. Geo. Spencer and Mr. Ling to Tahiti, and Mr. Law to Samoa.

SUNDAY OMNIBUSES.—Williamsburgh, L. I., is the scene of quite a controversy in relation to running omnibuses on Sunday. It seems that the Board of Trustees licensed one line to run on Sunday, whereupon other lines commenced running on that day so as not to be outdone. This induced the Trustees to pass an ordinance imposing a fine of $25 for each offense. Since then numerous petitions, pro and con, have been sent in, and it is uncertain how the scale will finally turn.

A NEW COLLEGE PROPOSED.—The denomination known as "Christians" propose to establish a Literary Institution to be called "Antioch College." The funds are to be raised by subscriptions and scholarships; and it is said that more than $10,000 have already been subscribed in and about the beautiful village of West Dresden, twelve miles south of Geneva, N. Y., on the west shore of Seneca Lake, and strong hopes are entertained of securing the location of the College at that place.

BRITISH ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.—The British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society held its annual meeting at Exeter Hall, London, on the 21st of July, Samuel Gurney presiding. Among those on the platform were Rev. Messrs. Beckwith, Eddy, Dresser, Garnet, and Henson, from the United States. The report stated the whole number of slaves to be 7,450,000, the increase in the Spanish Colonies, Brazil, and the United States, being 1,650,000, or 550,000 more than have been emancipated by Great Britain, France, Denmark, and Sweden united.

SCIENTIFIC CONVENTION.—The American Association for the Advancement of Science held its Annual Meeting at Albany last week. Papers on scientific questions were read by a number of distinguished scholars, among whom were Profs. Henry, Agassiz, Pierce, Rogers, and Hosford, Lieut. Maury, E. G. Squier, Dr. LeConte, and Dr. W. I. Burnette. The People and the Authorities of the city seem to have paid considerable attention to the scientific visitors from abroad, entertaining them very hospitably, and showing them round to whatever is curious or interesting in the neighborhood.

EDUCATIONAL CONVENTION.—The American Association for the Advancement of Education met at Cleveland, Ohio, last week. The session is represented by those in attendance as one of unusual interest. The new system of Collegiate Education recently introduced in Brown and Cleveland Universities, was the subject of much discussion. Pres. Mahan, of Cleveland, read a paper explaining and vindicating it. This led to a nine-hour debate between President Mahan, Prof. Green of Brown University, and others on one side, and Dr. Southerland of Philadelphia, Prof. Agnew, Rev. Dr. Duffield of Detroit, Rev. Dr. Anderson of Miami University, Rev. President Manly of the University of Alabama, Bishop Potter, &c., upon the other. The new system was vigorously assailed, but not less vigorously defended.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.—A letter from A. B. Spaulding informs us that arrangements have been made with Messrs. Allen & Co., stage proprietors, to convey delegates from Utica to Leonardsville—fare 62½ cents. Delegates from the East should leave New York on the evening of Third-day, Sept. 9, which will bring them to Utica at 11 o'clock A. M. of Fourth-day, and to Leonardsville that afternoon. Delegates from Allegany County and vicinity, who come by public conveyance, will find the route by Elmira, Geneva, and Utica, the pleasantest and most economical.

ECCLESIASTICAL RIGHTS.—The decision of the referees in the libel suit between Rev. Mr. Fairchild and Rev. Dr. Adams, of Boston, has been rendered, and is regarded with much interest by the Congregational Churches, as deciding some important points of ecclesiastical polity. The Referees were men of character and ability, whose deliberate decision will have great weight in the action of councils and churches. The suit was brought against Dr. Adams, first, for oral slander in stating in an Ecclesiastical Council his belief of the guilt of the plaintiff in the matter for which he was on trial before that body; secondly, for libel in publishing, as Scribe of the Council, the vote of the Council which excommunicated Mr. F. from the Church for that crime. Dr. Adams pleaded his right to express his opinion in an ecclesiastical trial, and to publish the proceedings of an ecclesiastical body. The Referees decide that a person acting in the discharge of any duty, legal or moral, and in good faith, is privileged in making accusations against another without being held to prove their truth, if made on proper occasions, and that every Christian body has a right to use all requisite means for maintaining its discipline, and to make known its decisions by publication, even though that publication affect the character or standing of the accused. Dr. Adams was, therefore, acquitted on each charge.

ENGLISH BISHOPS.—We find a statement in the papers showing the annual salaries of the Bishops of the English Established Church to be as follows: Archbishop of Canterbury, $217,000; Archbishop of York, $135,520; Bishop of Durham $140,200; Bishop of London, $296,400; the remaining 25 Bishops, $725,000. Making the enormous aggregate of $1,514,100 annually plundered from the people of England, by a single order of the priesthood of the Established Church of that country. Of this vast sum $789,000 is paid to four individuals, making $197,025 each, a salary seven-fold greater than that of the President of the United States. The remaining sum of $725,000 is divided among twenty-five persons, affording each an annual salary of $29,000, which is greater than the pay of the first political officer of this nation.

COLORED PEOPLE IN CANADA—The Board of the Baptist Missionary Convention of the State of New-York have recently sent Messrs. Wheelock and Sheldon, as a deputation to ascertain the condition of the colored people in Canada West, particularly those belonging to Baptist churches. They report the number of colored people in Canada West at about 30,000; and say that the white inhabitants represent them generally as moral, industrious, and good citizens, with no greater proportion of the ignorant and vicious than among whites. They report their Baptist brethren there as worthy of being assisted by the Convention in maintaining schools and the ordinances of religion.

CHINESE IN CALIFORNIA.—The British ship Henrietta arrived at San Francisco, June 25. She is last from Hong Kong, and brings 523 Chinese passengers, a list of whom is before us. The Herald exclaims:—

What a collection of Amungs, Atings, and Achoys! Of the 523 names, 190 commence with the letter A, usually terminating with G, or a Y, and in every instance, two syllables in length. But the most singular circumstance connected with this cargo of celestials, is, that out of the whole number, 221 are shoemakers, one a doctor, and one a merchant. Here is destruction to the sons of St. Crispin. Two hundred and twenty-one Chinese cobblers! The idea is terrible! Where, in the name of their patron saint, are the understandings to come from upon which they are to exercise their skill.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF THE PAPAL STATES.—Horace Greeley, writing from Civita Vecchia, thus describes his first impressions of Italian industry:—

"Aside from those engaged in fleecing us, I saw but three sorts of men in Civita Vecchia—or, rather, men pursuing three different avocations—those of Priests, Soldiers, and Beggars. Some united two of these callings. A number of brown, bare-headed, wretched-looking women were washing clothes in the hot sun of the sea-side, but I saw no trace of masculine industry other than what I have described, and the place contains 7,000 inhabitants."

CHEAP RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS.—The New York Observer, one of the oldest religious papers in the country, speaking of the present mania for cheap papers, remarks:—

"We have a right to know something of the cost of newspapers, and will give the result of some experience in the matter of getting them up. The proposition to make and publish a newspaper to compare and compete with the present religious newspapers, and at the rate of one dollar a year, is as idle and preposterous as would be the proposal to bridge the Atlantic."

A HINT NOT EASILY MISTAKEN.—A gentleman in New York, who recently received a letter, unpaid, asking information of use only to the inquirer, sent the following reply:—

"Yours asking information in regard to the cotton market is received, and below you have the latest quotations. I am always happy to serve you, but can do so at less cost if you will prepay your letters, for which purpose I enclose a dozen of the new postage stamps."

COVETOUSNESS.—The Lutheran Synod of Virginia, at its late meeting, passed the following resolution, which other denominations might well adopt:—

Resolved, That it be the duty of each pastor during the synodical year to preach at least one sermon on covetousness which is idolatry.

RELIGIOUS REVIVAL.—The Norfolk Argus states that a great revival in the Methodist church has lately taken place in Nansemond county. Many zealous and able divines were present, and their labors were rewarded by the addition of seventy-five persons to the church.

ITEMS OF RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Annual Report of the Maine Missionary Society, recently published by Dr. Tappan, gives some interesting statistics respecting that State. Of the thirty-two original founders of the Society, in 1807, three only are now living. In little more than a year, three-fourths of the Sewall family, Henry, (æt. 79,) Samuel, (æt. 78,) and Jotham, (æt. 90,) who were all missionaries, have deceased. The Society has kept 90 missionaries in the field, ministering to 104 churches in 30 towns, where no other churches exist—making an aggregate of labor equal to 68 years' service of a single minister.

Rev. Mr. Adlam, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Newport, R. I., issues proposals for the republication of a curious relic of the Baptist persecutions of early times, entitled "Ill News from New-England, an account of the persecution endured by Dr. John Clark, the founder of the Baptist Church, and of John Crandall and Obadiah Holmes, at Lynn and Boston; which resulted in their imprisonment and sentence to be severely whipped; which sentence was publicly inflicted in Boston on one of the party in 1657."

The venerable Dr. Beecher is employing the leisure of his old age in preparing for publication his previously published works, and such sermons and other productions as he desires to be associated with his memory and name. Dr. B. has done good service to his generation—not the least of which is to have reared six sons for the Christian ministry, all of whom are faithfully perpetuating the views and influence of their honored father.

Two Lutheran merchants of Baltimore some time ago resolved upon adopting the plan of laying aside one-tenth of their incomes for benevolent purposes. They had supposed themselves liberal before; but they state in an article in The Lutheran Observer, that the system has enabled them to give much more largely as well as wisely; and with such increased facility and comfort that they unite in urging all benevolent persons to adopt the plan.

The Catholic Telegraph claims that, while 650,563 slaves are owned by the various Protestant sects, not a Catholic bishop or priest in the country owns a single slave. On the other hand, The Presbyterian of the West affirms that slaves are held in several instances by Catholic religious societies at the South, which are under the control of the clergy; and that slaveholding is as common among the Roman Catholic laity, in proportion to their number, as among Protestants.

The Lutheran Missionary periodical states that a very encouraging progress has been made during the year among the Churches of the Norwegians and Swedes in the Northwest. Several new Synods have been organized—a religious newspaper in the Norsk language has been started—tracts have been printed and circulated—congregations organized, and churches erected. Large accessions have been made by emigration, including several clergymen of ability and character.

The New York State Colonization Society have decided to send a vessel to Liberia early in September. About forty persons have signified their wish to go out. The Sea Mew is daily expected from Africa, and on her arrival every exertion will be made to prepare her to return to Liberia. Donations of farming utensils, seeds, clothing, stationery, books, &c, will be gratefully received at the Colonization Office, Brick Church Chapel, in this city.

There is now going on in Chandlersville, Ohio, a public discussion between Rev. Messrs. Ferguson and Anderson, Old School Presbyterian ministers, and Rev. Mr. Parker, a Methodist clergyman, on the five points of polemics which, from olden time, have been in controversy between Calvinists and Arminians—Divine Decrees, Extent of the Atonement, Saints' Perseverance, Natural Ability, and Sinless Perfection.

Bishop Chase, of New-Hampshire, states in his recently published Diocesan report, that he administered baptism in the hypothetical form to Rev. Willard Presbury, a prelate of the diocese of Mississippi, on a visit to his native State. Mr. P. had received baptism in his infancy at the hands of a sectarian minister; but being in doubt whether that baptism was valid, the rite was performed a second time in the hypothetical form.

An elder of the Dutch Reformed Church at Grand Rapids writes to the Board of Missions of that Church that a congregation of 250 Hollanders exists in that place, and a church of 75 members, most of whom have been converted since their residence there. They are now expecting the arrival of a Netherlands minister, who can preach both in English and Dutch.

A great North American Convention of Colored People is summoned at Toronto, on the 11th, 12th and 13th of September next. In Canada and at the Northwest, efforts are making for a numerous and efficient delegation. One of the main topics of consideration is expected to be the important question of Colonization.

Rev. Calvin Durfee, formerly pastor of the Congregational Church in Dedham, Mass., has been on a tour of exploration among the fugitive slave population of Canada West, in behalf of the American Bible Society. He promised a full supply of Bibles wherever they were needed, and the amount required will soon be sent.

The New School Presbyterian Synod of the Western Reserve, at its late meeting, passed a minute condemning the practice of dancing, and enjoining on Church sessions to institute discipline whenever it occurs among their members.

Rev. Dr. Ide, of Philadelphia, has edited and published a work on Baptism, once famous in the annals of polemics—"Infant Baptism, a part and pillar of Popery," by the celebrated Dr. Gill, the Commentator.

Elder John Blain, an eloquent and pious Baptist clergyman, formerly of Providence, has been excommunicated at Buffalo for holding and preaching the doctrine of the final annihilation of the impenitent.

Recent intelligence from a Methodist Missionary in China states that Rev. Mr. Collins, the Superintendent of the Mission at Fuh Chau, has been obliged by ill health to abandon his work.

Rev. William L. Stilwell, thirty-one years pastor of the Methodist church in Chrystie-street, in this city, performed the marriage ceremony nearly 8,000 times, and read the burial service over 7,000 times.

European News.

The steamer Canada arrived at Boston on the 19th inst., bringing Liverpool dates to the 9th.

The British Parliament was prorogued by the Queen in person on the 8th inst., on which occasion Her Majesty delivered a speech, in which were enumerated all the principal measures of the session, but containing no feature of special importance. The prorogation is until the 4th of September.

The revenue returns for the last year show a surplus of three million pounds sterling, which is regarded as affording indisputable evidence of the progress and prosperity of the various branches of trade, especially of the manufacturing interests.

A collision on the London and Southwestern Railway occurred on the 7th inst., which, although not attended with loss of life, was productive of serious injuries to about 15 or 20 persons.

Late Paris papers are filled with glowing accounts of the brilliant festivals with which the Parisians have welcomed their English visitors.

There is nothing of importance from Rome. Reinforcements of French troops are finding their way into the city. Arrests on political grounds continue to be made.

The Revolution in Cuba.

By the arrival at New York of the steamer Cherokee from Chagres, we learn that another attempt has been made to revolutionize Cuba. Gen. Lopez, with 450 men, landed on the Cuban coast, forty miles west of Havana, on the night of August 10th, since which he is reported to have had several engagements, resulting in the loss of a good many lives. But about his movements there is a great deal of uncertainty. A party of men connected with Lopez's expedition have fallen into the hands of the Spanish authorities. The Spanish war steamer Habanero captured four boat-loads of men—fifty persons in all—at a place called Bahia Honda, about 40 miles west of Havana. It is said that the men were not armed, and that they were steering in the direction of New Orleans. They were brought to Havana by the Habanero, on Saturday morning, at 1 A. M., (Aug. 16,) and placed on board a Spanish frigate lying in the harbor. We have not learned whether any form of trial was held. They were executed at 11.15 A. M. of the same morning. They were shot on the public road in Havana. After the execution they were thrown into hearses by six or eight at a time and taken away and buried. About 20,000 spectators were assembled to witness this horrid spectacle. Many of them were negroes, slaves and free, and possessed themselves of the hats and boots and portions of the clothing, and fixing them on sticks marched through the streets with curses upon the "Fillibusteros," the "Pirates," &c. The following are the names of the victims:—

Col. W. S. Clendennen; Capts. F. S. Sewer, Victor Kerr, T. B. Veacy; Lieuts. James Brandt, J. O. Bryce, Thomas C. James; Doctors John Fisher and K. A. Tournique; Sergeants J. Whiterews and A. M. Cotchett; Agt. R. C. Stanford; Privates M. H. Homes, Samuel Mills, Edward Rulman, George A. Arnold, B. G. Wregy, William Wiseman, Anselmo Torres Hernandez, Patrick Dillon, Thomas Hearsey, Samuel Reed, H. T. Vinne, M. Phillips, James L. Manville, G. M. Green, J. Salmon, Napoleon Collins, N. H. Fisher, Wm. Chilling, G. A. Cook, S. O. Jones, M. H. Ball, James Buxee, Robert Caldwell, C. C. Wm. Smith, A. Ross, P. Brouke, John Christades, Wm. B. Little, Robert Cantley, John G. Lanka, Jas. Stanton, Thomas Harnott, Alex. McIlcer, John Stubbs, James Ellis, Wm. Hogan, Charles A. Robinson. Total, fifty.

Storm and Loss of Life.

A letter in the Burlington (Iowa) Telegraph, dated Muscatine, Iowa, Aug. 11, furnishes a detailed account of a frightful storm and flood at that place, on the night of the 10th inst., which resulted in the loss of four human lives and great destruction of property. It seems that a storm set in about 12 o'clock on the night of the 10th, and that the rain fell in ceaseless torrents till 4 o'clock in the morning, when the Pappoose Creek, an ordinarily insignificant stream, which runs through the center of the city, had risen to a hight heretofore unknown, becoming a broad and furious torrent, sweeping away houses, fences, and bridges before it. One dwelling, says the letter before us, was completely destroyed, the inhabitants barely escaping with their lives, losing a great portion of their furniture, &c., and one horse was drowned in a stable, from which it was impossible to rescue him.

Near Sixth-st. a small frame building, occupied by a widow woman who supported herself and three small children by her own exertions, was surrounded by the flood, on the lower side sixty feet in width, and four or five feet deep, on the other thirty or forty feet wide, and fifteen feet deep. The cries of the unfortunate woman aroused her nearest neighbors, but they could render no assistance. She had got out of the window, and was supposed in the darkness to be on the roof with her children, and her screams, and the cries of her babes heard in the gloom, amidst the roar of the flood, were heart-rending to the powerless spectators.

A large tree torn from its roots, and fragments of buildings and drift-wood, swept down with violence against her frail home. It stood the shock, but it is inferred that at this juncture the poor woman, losing her presence of mind, and unable to hear what was said from the shore, attempted to stem the flood and escape with her babes. This was her destruction—all perished, the mother and her three children. Her body was found when light came, partially buried in the huge drift-wood, one hundred and thirty yards below her dwelling.

The Ashtabula Telegraph says that large numbers of the fowls of Ohio find their way to the New York market, when they discover themselves to be worth two and sixpence to fifty cents per head, instead of the dime which bought them in their native barn-yard. Three cents a head covers all costs of freight. One week there were shipped in good order from the port of Ashtabula, twelve boxes of chickens, each holding seventy-five—nine hundred in all—and one box of turkeys, all for New York City, and the profits will come up to $200, to say nothing of the eggs laid by the way.

Gross Outrage.—On Saturday night, Aug. 16, as we learn from the Albany State Register, the house of Hiram Shaw, of Berlin, Rensselaer Co., was invaded and broken into by fifty or sixty ruffians, who dragged a young lady out of her bed and compelled her to furnish them with a light. They then proceeded to the bedroom of Mr. Shaw and dragged him out by main force. After allowing him to dress, he was taken out of doors, placed in a wagon between two Indians, and, amid the yelping and howling of an escort of savages, driven about five miles to the yellow meeting-house in Stephentown. Here they compelled him to strip, and applied to him a plentiful coat of tar; and then, after threatening him with further and greater outrages, if he should ever do any more business for Lansing & Pruyn, and denouncing against him the penalty of death, in case he sold any more sixty-year lease land on which any one lived, they let him go. Mr. Shaw, says the Register, is a highly respectable citizen of Berlin, in the County of Rensselaer, a farmer possessed of considerable property, and has been, for eight years, a magistrate of that town. He has at times acted as agent for Mr. Van Rensselaer and others, and latterly for Messrs. Lansing & Pruyn.

—Since the above was in type, a statement has been put forth that the indignities to Mr. Shaw were not as great as he represented. Gov. Hunt has issued a Proclamation, however, warning citizens against taking part in such outrages, enjoining the magistrates to be diligent in discharging their duty, and offering a "reward of Five Hundred Dollars, to be paid to any of the persons engaged in the commision of the said offense, who shall be the first to make a full disclosure of all the facts relating thereto, giving the names of the conspirators and exposing the particular action of each of them as far as practicable, in the seizure and abduction of said Shaw, which reward shall be paid under the direction of the Court upon the conviction of any of said offenders, and to such persons, not exceeding five, as the Court shall certify to be entitled thereto; and the persons so disclosing and testifying shall be relieved from punishment by the Executive clemency."

The Kingston Calamity.—The Kingston (C. W.) Argus, in giving some account of the recent calamity in that vicinity, by which nineteen lives were lost, says:—

"It seems that a party of thirty-four (fifteen of which were ladies,) proceed on a pic-nic party, in a new sailing boat or yacht just built by Mr. Jenkins. Everything went well until they got within a mile or two of French Creek, (being then about three quarters of a mile from the shore,) the wind light, and consequently carrying full sail. Whether, in the enjoyment of the moment, they were not upon the look-out, but a sudden flaw of wind struck the little vessel, and brought her nearly on her beam ends. The little deck being crowded, the unfortunate passengers naturally were all propelled toward the lower side, which completed in a moment what the wind had begun, and down she went. Our informant, who was one of those saved, informs us, that the females, rushing down to the lower side of the vessel, actually, for the most part, plunged into the water, and disappeared."

Dreadful Casualty.—On the morning of Saturday the 8th inst., a man by the name of William Stafford, accidenatlly shot Mr. David Rea, in Shelby township, Ia. The circumstances are these: Mr. Rea, the day previous, had been into the woods and killed three wild turkeys. When he went home he related his good success to Mr. S., and told him the vicinity in which he killed them. The next morning about daylight they both repaired to the place—neither knowing the design of the other. Mr. Rea got upon the ground first, concealed himself by the side of a log, and commenced squalling, in imitation of the turkey, by blowing through an instrument made for the purpose. Mr. S. being a short distance off, heard him, and looking in the direction of the noise, saw Mr. Rea's head rising above the log. Supposing it to be a turkey, he took deliberate aim and shot him in the head, producing instant death.

Mob Law in Columbus, Ga.—A correspondent writes to the N. Y. Tribune, that on the 11th inst., at 4 o'clock P. M., 1,000 persons, principally Irish and rowdies, proceeded to the jail in Columbus, Ga., well armed with every offensive weapon, from a pen-knife to a musket, and proceeded to break open the door. They in fact smashed down three doors, and on reaching the dungeon, dragged forth a negro man, who had been condemned to die for ravishing a white girl. The respectable citizens of Columbus, and of the County at large, had petitioned Gov. Towns to pardon said negro, which he did, but the mob would not let him go. A rope was tied around the negro's neck, by the brother of the girl, and he was carried to the edge of the town on a dray, and hanged, or rather choked, by being tied to the limb of a pine tree. The Sheriff was the only one who offered any resistance.

The Caterpillar.—On Tuesday, says the Charleston Mercury, we noticed the presence of the army-worm in the immediate vicinity of the city; they made their appearance simultaneously in the parishes of St. Andrew and Christ Church, adjoining Charleston on the east and west. They are not, strictly speaking, the cotton worm, being somewhat of an omniverous character, generally commencing their attacks on the grasses and small grains, and extending thence to young corn, rice, &c. On one plantation every blade of grass in the pasture was destroyed in the course of twenty-four hours from their first appearance. In the cotton-fields they were scarcely less destructive, stripping the plant of leaves, and also perforating the young bolls, which perish immediately.

The Buffalo and New-York City Railroad, as we learn from the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, is to be put under contract immediately, between Buffalo and Attica. This, says The Commercial, settles the question in relation to this section of the road, and secures its early completion through its entire length. Between Attica and Hornellsville the road is now rapidly approaching a readiness for the superstructure along the whole line. We learn that it is the intention of the Company to have the road in operation between Hornellsville and Portage by the 1st of November, and between Portage and Attica by the 1st of January next.

SUMMARY.

There is a female now residing in Clarke County, Georgia, who is 133 years of age. She is quite active, lively and cheerful, converses fluently, reads well without the use of glasses. She says she does not feel the effect of her age, except as regards her hearing—she is slightly deaf. This, too, is partly the result of accident. She has, now living within one mile of her residence, grand-children to the sixth generation. So says The Augusta Constitutionalist.

In Concord, Ky., Joseph Moore, 78 years of age, a veteran of the last war with England, was married to Mrs. Tolen, aged 84 years. The magistrate who officiated on the occasion was 72 years old. This union makes the third wife to the groom, and the fifth husband to the bride. Mr. Moore has obtained a land warrant under the act of Congress of 1850, and intends to settle upon it.

The phenomenon of the whirlpool in a funnel always moving in the same direction, if not counteracted, has long been a subject of unsuccessful investigation among scientific men. E. D. Saunders, of Pottsville, Penn., has submitted a demonstration of the principle to the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia. It traces the cause to the earth's rotation. The demonstration will appear in the next number of the Academy's proceedings.

The slave-catcher, Rust, who knocked down and narrowly escaped killing the negro, Daniel, at Buffalo, was held to answer for an assault and battery. He soon after appeared before the Police Justice, plead guilty, and was let off with a fine of $50! For helping a fugitive to escape to freedom it costs one thousand dollars, besides imprisonment; but for knocking one down and nearly killing him, when the object is to send him to slavery, it only costs $50!

Jerry Blake, a clerk in the store of E. Claussen, of Utica, was drowned at the foot of of the first flight of stairs, at Trenton Falls, last week. He was there on a visit with his wife, who was ascending the stairs a little before him, and upon turning around to speak to him, she discovered him struggling in the water, from which it was impossible to rescue him.

The Oregon Spectator confirms the report heretofore received of the death of Capt. Stewart, in an action with the Indians. It took place on the 17th of June, at Table Rock, on Rogue River, twelve or fifteen miles from the traveled road. The Indians were lying in ambush, and fired on the riflemen as they passed. A conflict ensued, in which about twenty Indians were killed, and many were wounded.

A Bear was shot a few days ago in the notch of the White Mountains. The day before he was seen to cross the Saco on a log near the Willey House, by a gentleman of New-York and a lad from Boston, as they were fishing for trout. As they had nothing but fish poles in their hands, they suffered him to pass on to meet his doom as above.

Christian Roselius, Esq., of New-Orleans, has just succeeded in recovering the lost $114,000 of bonds of the First Municipality, with interest coupons attached, which were stolen from the house of the late John Mc Donogh, shortly after his death. How they were recovered is not stated.

Dr. Wilbur's idiot school at Barre, Mass., is in a flourishing condition, and was visited by a Committee in behalf of the New York State Asylum for Idiots, consisting of Ex-Governor Marcy and John C. Spencer, a few days since, and the result will probably be an invitation for Dr. Wilbur to take charge of the New-York Asylum.

The steamer Union went ashore in a fog on the 5th July, at 3 o'clock A. M., four days out from San Francisco, on St. Quinten's Reef. She is a total wreck. She had 300 passengers on board, and $300,000 in gold dust. The passengers and dust were all saved. No freight saved.

The Richmond Times understands that the Grand Jury there on Saturday presented John M. Daniel, Esq., editor of The Examiner, for sending a hostile message to Edw. W. Johnston, Esq., of The Whig, a short time since. Other gentlemen, concerned in bearing the message, were, it is stated, likewise presented.

On Sunday afternoon, August 17th, a severe thunderstorm occurred at New-London, in Chester County, Pa., during which the Methodist church was struck by lightning. The Rev. Mr. Bissey, who was preaching at the time, was struck dead, and several of the members were prostrated by the electric fluid.

The tolls collected upon the New-York Canals up to the 14th of August, show an increase over the amount collected last year to same date, of $293,761. This rate of increase, says The Albany Journal, through the season of navigation, would give an aggregate increase of half a million.

Mr. I. Marsh Denman, of Newark, has raised some figs much superior in size and quality to any raised in this climate that we have ever seen before—demonstrating what may be done here by careful and skillful culture.

The sickness which a few days since assumed such a formidable aspect in the Sing-Sing Prison is disappearing; but four have died, the residue of the sick are convalescent, and but few new cases are occurring.

The British ship Cecrops was lost on the Roman Beach, near Roman River, on the 26th of June. She was on her passage from Jamaica to Truxillo. She was a total wreck, and two lives were lost.

A dispatch dated Chicago, Saturday, Aug. 23, 1851, says: The Cholera has nearly disapeared from our vicinity. The Board of Health report that there was no case yesterday, and none to-day. The weather is very fine, clear and cold.

Commodore Vanderbilt is arranging a regular steamship line from San Francisco via Nicaragua and New-York to Liverpool. His magnificent new steamship Northern Light is to run hence to Liverpool.

The New-York State Canal Revenue Loan was taken last week at a premium of ½ to 5 per cent. $1,000,000 was advertised, and bids were received for $4,500,000.

On Saturday morning a man by the name of Kelly was run over and instantly killed by a locomotive of the Long Island Railroad.

The Jeffersonian says: "The Rome and Watertown Railroad is steadily progressing, and will be so far finished that cars will reach this village in the course of three or four weeks. The depot, near this village, is nearly complet ed, the turn table is nearly ready for use, the engine house is going up rapidly, and the mason work for the bridge across the Black River is being pushed forward with commendable spirit and dispatch."

"Old Bucktooth," a very aged Indian, expired a few days since at his residence, a short distance below the mouth of Little Valley Creek, in Cattaraugus County. He was the last, with the exception of Gov. Blacksnake, of the aged Indians who have lingered so long in the land of the living. One by one, like our own Fathers of the Revolution, have the Indian chieftains passed away; and soon the last will be on his way to the "Spirit Land."

The Kingston Journal of the 13th says that on the morning of that day a number of men were engaged in deepening a well dug last year for R. Gosman. One of them went down; he did not return, and soon another followed, and passed out of sight; then a third, fourth and fifth went down, and the last was seen to reel and fall. The truth soon became known, that the whole five had perished by inhaling the fatal gas so often found in wells.

An accident occurred on the Midland Railway in England on the 19th of May last, in which a Mr. Blake was killed. His wife prosecuted the company, and has just recovered a verdict of $20,000, for damages sustained by the loss of her husband, it being proved on the trial that the accident was caused by care lessness of the Company's agents.

Last Sixth-day evening a terrific tornado struck in Watertown, Mass., and passed through the villages of West Cambridge, part of Somerville and Medford, to Madden, where it expended itself—its path, about five rods wide, presents a scene of fearful destruction. The total damage is estimated at $100,000.

It is stated that the Canal Commissioners of Pennsylvania have had an interview with the representatives of a large number of transportation companies, who desire a further reduction of tolls to enable them to compete with the New York Canals and Erie line. The result of the meeting has not transpired.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Board can be obtained in private families from $1 00 to $1 50 per week. Rooms can be obtained, by those wishing to board themselves, at a reasonable expense.

Remarks.

All the English branches usually taught in our Eastern Academies, together with the Classics, and the Modern Languages, (French, German, and Italian,) will be taught in this Institution. The mode of instruction will be in accordance with the latest and most popular method adopted in our best Eastern Institutions, aiming, primarily, at a thorough and practical qualification of School Teachers, and preparing students for an advanced standing in a College course.

This Institution is located in the healthy and delightful village of Milton, at the junction of the Milwaukie and Mississippi and the Northern and Southern Railroads, amidst an enterprising and moral community, and removed from the vices and temptations ever attendant on large villages and cities.

Weekly meetings are held in the village by three different evangelical denominations, either of which students can attend.

The plan of instruction and government of this Institution will aim at a harmonious development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of students, in a manner to render them thorough scholars, and practical, useful citizens; and the public may feel assured that no exertion shall be wanting on the part of the teachers and proprietors of the school to render it worthy of patronage and confidence. au14 4t

Milton, Rock Co., Wis, July 11th, 1851.

In sending the notice of our school to the Recorder, we will take the opportunity to assure such Seventh day Baptists and other friends at the East as may contemplate removing to this State, and yet wish to enjoy the advantages of a good school, that it is intended to afford as good facilities for study and improvement in this school as can be found in any other Academy.

Union Bible Dictionary.

PREFERABLE TO ANY OTHER.—It is unquestionably preferable to any other manual adapted to aid the young in studying the sacred volume. [N.Y.Obs.

Fuller than any other.—It is nearly a complete summary of all the most valuable learning on the subjects embraced in it. [The Independent.

It is, by far, the completest and most perspicuous Bible Dictionary of its size to be found. It condenses a great amount of learning, and has a fullness of information, for which one would not look in so unpretending a volume, and which is all that most Bible readers would desire on the subject. [N. Y. Evangelist.

Cheaper than any other.—There is probably no book, except the Bible itself, in which so great a quantity of matter can be purchased for so small a sum; and happily, it is matter of an important character, all of which helps to elucidate the Bible. It explains the meaning of words, and the names of persons, animals, and objects, which are not defined in ordinary dictionaries. The images of things are also given in pictures, wherever this method is necessary to a just perception of them, or can be made to convey a more ready and accurate idea, than a mere verbal description. [Ch. Mir.

It is a sort of sine-qua-non for a Sunday-school teacher, and should be in the hands of the more forward pupils.

The best of its kind.—I feel free to express my general approbation of the "Union Bible Dictionary," as a work well calculated to extend the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and especially to be a valuable assistant to teachers and scholars in our Sunday-schools.
[Rev. Dr. Alexander.

The mass of various and important information compressed within so small a compass is almost incredible.
[Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Mass.

I regard the present volume as the best of its kind.

Miscellaneous.

The Migration of Birds.

Birds migrate northward and southward; so that there is in our latitudes at least a periodical ebb and tide of spring and winter visitors. The former gradually work their way, as the season advances, from the warm South, were they have enjoyed food and sunshine, and arrive here to cheer us with their songs, and make our summer months still more delightful. The latter, being inhabitants of the arctic circle, and finding in the forests and morasses of that region a sufficient supply of food in summer, are only led to quit their homes when the early winter begins to bind up the lakes and surface of the earth, and to deprive them of their sustenance. It is then that they seek our milder shores; and accordingly, at the season when our summer visitants are leaving us to proceed on their journey southwards, these songless inhabitants of the north arrive to take their places, and to feed on such winter fruits and berries, and such insects and aquatic plants, as are denied to their own inhospitable climate. These visitors, though mute, are of no mean value, for many of them are considered delicate food; and, in consequence, the red wing, field-fare, woodcock snipe, pidgeon, &c., are wont to receive homage and admiration from those who could listen to the sweet warblings of the nightingale or the tender cooings of the turtle-dove with perfect indifference.

The visits of these birds, as well as of those from the south, depend greatly on the state of the weather, which appears to hasten or retard their flight as the season may be. Thus, we often find that a few of our summer birds leave the main body and arrive sooner than the rest, while the others have been kept back by a sudden return of unfavorable weather, according to the adage, "One swallow does not make a summer." It is a singular fact that the early comers are male birds, arriving, as it would seem, in search of a fit spot into which to introduce their mates. The bird-catchers are aware of this, and prepare their traps accordingly, so that nightingales and other singing birds are often snared on their first arrival, and spend the short remainder of their lives in captivity. Many birds return not only to the same country, but to the very spot they left in the preceding season, a fact which has been ascertained by catching and marking some of them, while others do not confine themselves to a particular country, but range from one country to another, as circumstances may dicate.

It has been observed that migratory birds do not leave their summer abode, unless the winter is one of unusual severity. This fact is surprising, and the question, "By what means is the bird instructed as to the coming season?" naturally presents itself to the mind, but still remains unanswered.

Most birds perform their migrations during the night; but there are some that travel only by day, and others that stop neither by night nor day. Among the first are the owl, black bird, &c., and a great number of aquatic birds; among those that travel by day, are the crow, pie, titmouse, wren, wood-pecker, chaffinch, goldfinch, swallow, lark, and some others; and of those which do not intermit their flight are the wag-tail, heron, yellow-hammer, stork, crane, plover, swan, and wild goose. These choose a bright moonlight season in which to set out on their journey.

The flight of birds has been estimated from fifty to one hundred and fifty miles per hour, though some heavy birds scarcely exceed thirty miles an hour. Bishop Stanley mentions, in his "Familiar History of Birds," an easy way by which the flight of birds may be determined with tolerable accuracy. Supposing any bird—a partidge, for instance—should rise from the middle of a stubble, and fly a stright line over a hedge, all the observer has to do is to note by the second hand of a watch the number of seconds between the bird's rising and that of its topping the hedge; and then ascertain the distance between the point from whence it rose and the hedge, by stepping, counting the number of paces; when, supposing each pace to be a yard, we have a common rule-of-three sum.

Thus, if a partridge in three seconds flies one hundred yards, how many yards will it fly in 3,600 seconds. or one hour?

Another method of ascertaining the flight of birds is by carrier pigeons. The same author tells us of a recent instance, in which fifty-six of these birds were brought over from Holland, and set at liberty in London. They were turned out at half past 4 o'clock in the morning, and all reached their dove cots at home by noon; but one favorite pigeon called "Napoleon," arrived about a quarter before ten o'clock, having performed the distance of three hundred miles at the rate of above three hundred miles an hour, supposing he lost not a moment and proceeded in a straight line; but, as they usually wheel about in the air for some time before they start, the first bird must have flown, most likely, at a still quicker rate.

Of all migrating birds, cranes may be considered the most remarkable. They seem to be endowed with foresight, and have the appearance of consultation and regular preparation for the time of their departure. They utter peculiar cries several days before, and assemble with much noise and bustle. They then form themselves into two lines, making an angle at the vortex, of which one of their number, who is looked upon as the general director of their proceedings, takes his place. The office of the leader seems to be to exercise authority and issue orders to the whole party, to guide them in inclement weather in their circling flight, to give the signal for their descent, feeding, &c. Piercing cries are heard, as if commanding and answering to the command. If the leader grows tired, his place is taken by the bird next him, while he retires to the end of the line; and thus their orderly flight is accomplished.

In order that birds may fly with ease, and continue long on the wing, they must fly against the wind; and patiently do they wait for a favorable time in this respect. The sudden change of the wind will sometimes cause numbers of quails, which are heavy in their flight, to be drowned in crossing the Mediterranean sea. Yet there are certain seafaring birds so wonderfully endowed as to remain almost continually on the wing, and which are often found at the distance of more than a thousand miles from land. The gigantic albatross is one of these, with its enormous expanse of wing, measuring fourteen feet, or even more, from tip to tip.

But the bird which surpasses all others in its power of flight is the frigate bird, which seldom visits the land except at the breeding season, and is never seen to swim or rest upon the waters. With such an instance of adaptation to the regions of the air, we need no longer wonder at the power by which our birds are enabled to remain so long on the wing as to perform their periodical migration to other lands.

It has been observed that the least willow wren and the stone curlew generally appear amongst us during the last week in March; while the following birds are not often with us till from about the 14th to the 20th of April—the nightingale, black-cap, chimney-swallow, red-start, yellow willow-wren, grass-hopper, lark, martlet, and pied fly-catcher. At the end of April and the beginning of May are seen the lesser red-sparrow, cuckoo, sand martin, great willow wren, spotted fly-catcher, black martin, and landrail; while, about the middle of May, the swift and the goat-sucker or fern-owl, usually join the throng.

> "Ye tell a tale of the beautiful earth,
> Birds that o'ersweep it in power and mirth!
> Yet, through the wastes of the trackless air,
> Ye have a guide; and shall we despair?
> Ye over desert and deep have pass'd;
> So shall we reach our bright home at last."

Jenny Lind and the Birds.

We find the following gossip in the correspondence of the N. Y. Tribune. A youthful stripling does the honors of charioteer to a party of travelers from Utica to Trenton Falls, and entertains them by the way with amusing chat about the notabilities of the season. He narrated or invented the following incident as occurring during Jenny's transit over the same thoroughfare:—

"Have you heard Jenny Lind, sir?" inquired my Antinous of the stables.

"Yes, often."

"Great woman, sir. Do n't you think so?"

"Most decidedly."

"She was here last week, sir—get up, Charlie!"

"Did you hear her?" I asked.

"Yes, sir, and I drove with her to the Falls—that is, Tom Higgins drove, but I sat on the box."

"And was she pleased?"

"Yes, sir; only when she was going to see the Falls, every body in the hotel ran to the door to look at her, so she went back to her room and then slipped out of the back door. But there was something better than that, sir."

"What was that?"

"She gave Tom Higgins fifty dollars when he drove her back. But there was something better than that, sir."

"Indeed! What was that?"

"Why, sir, as we came back, we passed a little wood, and she stopped the carriage and stepped out with the rest of the party, and Tom Higgins and I, and went into the wood. It was toward sunset, and the wood was beautiful, sir. She walked about a little and picked up leaves and flowers, and sang, like to herself, as if it were pleasant. By and by she sat down upon a rock and began to sing loud. She sings some, sir, and it sounded a great ways. But before she stopped, a little bird came and sat upon a bough close by us. I saw it, sir, with my own eyes, the whole of it—and when Jenny Lind had done, he began to sing and shout away like she did. While he was singing she looked delighted, and when he stopped she sang again, and oh! it was beautiful, sir. But the little bird would n't give it up, and he sang again, but not until she had done. Then Jenny Lind sang as well as ever she could. It seemed to fill the woods all up with music, and when it was over, the little bird was still a while, but tried it again in a few moments. He could n't do it, sir. He sang very bad, and then the foreign gentlemen with Jenny Lind laughed, and they all came back to the carriage."

Amusements at Madrid.

At Madrid, July 25, the Bull Circus of Aranjuez became the theater of a spectacle worthier of the age of the Romans of the empire than of the 19th century. Several wild beasts were introduced successively to fight in the arena. The Queen-Mother and her family, together with the King and the Duke of Rianzares, were present in the box. The first fight was, between a wolf and several dogs. The wolf looked at first excessively frightened, and made several leaps to clear the lofty iron grating which surrounded the arena. These efforts became desperate when he saw bound into the circus four powerful dogs, which in a few moments reduced him to such a pitiful state that it was necessary to withdraw him. The wolf stood on the defensive—he shook off the dogs, but he did not attack them. Next entered a hyena, against which four dogs were likewise loosed. One of the dogs distinguished himself greatly in this combat, and several times mastered the hyena alone, dragging him over to the ground, but he was so punished by the fierce bites of the wild beast, that his master was fain to enter the arena and withdraw him from the combat' amid salvos of applause. The hyena was then withdrawn in rather a mangled condition. The next wild beast that appeared was a sturdy, surly bear, against whom were launched as many as 13 dogs. The enemy was now evidently of a more formidable kind, for the dogs were no longer so eager to grapple with the object of their attack, but contented themselves with barking around him in a ring; and when any of the number ventured into closer quarters, he received a hug and bite which left him apparently lifeless during several seconds. The public now loudly called for the intrepid dog who had mauled the hyena. This was the first of the pack who dared to seize the bear with his teeth. The others imitated his example with less pluck, but no effect seemed to be produced by any of the assailants upon the shaggy beast, and the bravest of them seemed baffled by the thickness os his coat, which defied the gripe of his adversaries. The last act of the spectacle was that which had more particularly attracted crowds by railroad to Aranjuez. The fight was now between a lion and a bull. The first was one of the finest of his species. No sooner was he loosed into the arena and espied the bull than he made toward him at once, and attacked him with fury. But the lion only succeeded in seizing the tail of his horned foe, by which he clung on with his claws. The bull, thus attacked from behind, was unable to defend himself by his horns, but presently the lion, having bitten his tail close off to the rump, the bull turned on him, and frantic with pain charged with tremendous fury, tossing the lion, notwithstanding his size, into the air, which so damped the pluck of the latter that it became at once clear on which side the victory would be declared. The lion sat down dejected and moaning with pain, while the bull charged him several times in succession, instigated by the crowd outside the grating more than by his own will, for as soon as the lion was hors de combat the bull sought no longer to molest him, and would have left him alone, but for the stimulation which was applied to him by the spectators. The lion was killed.

Grand Bassa, Liberia.

The Congregationalist publishes an interesting letter to Commodore Gregory, of the U. S. Navy, from Capt Marston, an exploring agent sent out to Liberia. The following extract contains the most essential facts:—

The County of Grand Bassa, of which Bassa Cove, although not the most populous, is the County town, was formerly under the protection of the Pennsylvania Colonization Society, and is principally inhabited by emigrants from Virginia and Maryland, and a few from South Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky and Tennessee; with a very small number from New York and Connecticut. The town of Bassa Cove lies on the point formed by the junction of the rivers St. Johns and Benson, and almost immediately opposite, at the reunion of the St. John's and Mecklin rivers, is situated the town of Edina, and seven miles further up the St. John's is the town of Bexley.

Bassa Cove contains two hundred and sixty inhabitants, Edina four hundred and thirty, and Bexley three hundred and eighty, about one one-fifth of whom in each town are natives; the remainder are emigrants from the United States.

All these places are regularly laid out into streets running at right angles; and the squares are three hundred feet, allowing each building lot to be sixty feet by a depth of one hundred and fifty. The buildings are constructed chiefly of wood, which in my opinion is bad policy, as the constant interchange of wet and dry seasons causes them to rot; and, added to this, the myriads of insects which this climate supplies, make them soon go to decay. This could be avoided by substituting stone or brick, the latter article being now made in various parts of the Republic; but that which I should recommend in place of either of the above articles, is iron, which, I presume you are aware, is now used extensively, in a galvanized state, in the United States, for the construction of houses; and although the effects of galvinism would be fully tested in this humid climate, yet I doubt not that iron would form the best article for the construction of houses.

It gave me much pleasure to learn from all with whom I conversed, that the moral and religious condition of this part of the Liberian Republic is most cheering; there being but little vice, while a truly gratifying religious character is very apparent. Bassa Cove contains two churches, one belonging to the Baptists, the other to the Methodists. Edina has three churches, one to each of the denominations, composed of Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians.

Attached to each of these churches is a flourshing Sunday school, attended by natives, as well as American children. The average attendence in the above three towns being two hundred and eighty-five—of whom one hundred and twenty-one are native youths. There are also at Bexley two day schools; and Bassa Cove and Edina each has one. At these, however, are taught at present only the rudiments of an education; but this cannot continue long, as the desire for instruction is too strong to prevent the cause of education going ahead.

The condition of the people at Grand Bassa cannot but be considered as highly prosperous, as they are slowly but steadily increasing in agriculture and commerce.

The cultivation of coffee is receiving at this place special attention—Judge Benson alone having twenty-five acres devoted to that object; and there are others but little below him in that quantity of land. In the whole country there are twenty-nine thousand trees planted, so that Grand Bassa produces more coffee than all other parts of Liberia united, the quality of which is equal to the best Java. This article can be cultivated to any extent, as it is indigenous to the soil, and is found in great abundance.

The exports of Grand Bassa consist chiefly of palm oil, camwood, ivory, arrowroot, ginger, and as yet a small quantity of coffee, and amounted last year from Bassa Cove and Edina alone to about twenty-five thousand dollars. The imports embrace the usual necessaries of life, with but few luxuries, the amount of which I was unable to obtain.

Exploration of the Interior of Africa.

Correspondence of the Jour. of Commerce.

WASHINGTON, Thursday, Aug. 14 1851.

I recently mentioned that Lieut. M. C. Watkins of the Navy had projected a scheme for the exploration of Africa. He laid his plan before the Secretary of the Navy a few days ago. His offer is under consideration, and if the President should make no objection, I presume it will be accepted and the design put in execution without delay.

Lieut. Watkins' plan is simple, and costs the Government nothing. He simply asks leave of absence, on present pay, for himself, one midshipman, one engineer, and six mechanics, now belonging to the naval service, and doing little or nothing. He also asks for the use of a small iron steamer, to be built under his direction—which steamer he will take out to Africa in one of the Government store-ships. This boat will be made in two pieces, and will be so light that she can easily be carried around the falls and other obstructions that may be met with in the rivers. Mr. Watkins does not even ask for rations for his party, as he expects to procure supplies very cheaply by traffic with the natives. Ten thousand dollars will cover all the expenses of the expedition which the Government is called upon to pay. Mr. Watkins will take a draughtsman, a naturalist, and a physician, with his party. Suitable men, who are already acclimated, will volunteer for the enterprise. Six or eight colored men from Liberia, who are accustomed to the natives, and have been engaged in former explorations, will complete the exploring party. One of the men, Moore, accompanied Capt. Trotter, of the British navy, in his expedition.

Mr. Watkins will first explore the St. Paul's—a very interesting river—and trace it to its source. The valley of the St. Paul's is very rich and beautiful, and will be of great importance to Liberian commerce, by reason of its valuable products. He will next trace the Niger and Congo, and other important rivers, from their mouths to their sources, and proceed to explore the vast and now unknown regions of the interior, where, for aught we know, natural products of novel and rich character, new forms of civilization, and unknown races of men, may exist.

Mr. Watkins is confident, from the information which he derived in Africa, during his former visits, that he can find coal fields on the St. Paul's; and if so, one of the chief obstacles to the establishment of steam communication between this country and Africa will be removed. This expedition will greatly promote the success of the proposed African line of steamers; it will promote the colonization and civilization of Africa, by ascertaining and making known its resources and its geography; it will open to the native tribes of Africa a new subject for commerce, of a much more profitable kind than the slave trade; and it will widen the boundaries of modern science and knowledge. Certainly such an enterprise as this will, even if attended with partial success, reflect great credit on those engaged in it, and upon our naval service, and upon this country.

An Expedition to the Interior of Africa.

Our readers will remember that early in 1850, Mr. Richardson, an agent of the British Government, together with two German savants, and a select escort, started from Tripoli on an expedition to explore the interior of Africa. The latest information from these gentlemen is contained in a letter from one of them, Dr. Barth, to the British Consul General at Tripoli, dated the 28th February last. The expedition had reached Kano, on the road to the kingdom of Barnon, where they expected to arrive in the month of April. The expedition had passed through many dangers and difficulties, with no greater misfortune than the loss of a little property, of which it was robbed by the Tuariks. This is a powerful tribe who inhabit oases in the Sahara, or Great Desert, and are noted for their inhospitality to travelers. It is a singular and interesting fact, that these Tuariks, whose only food is camel's milk and a few dates, are the most powerful, athletic, and warlike race of the center of Africa.

Dr. Barth mentions a vast tract of fertile land through which he passed in the region of the Great Sahara, and which has remained entirely unknown to travelers and geographers. He describes it as being of considerable extent, beautifully wooded, with a number of small rivers passing through it, and susceptible of the highest degree of cultivation. It is inhabited only by animals, among which he mentions the elephant, buffalo, lion, giraffe, &c. During the progress of the voyage, Dr. Barth was very near perishing in the desert whilst the expedition was passing through the country of the Tuariks. Having left the caravan for a short time, for the purpose of making some geological investigation, he was unable to find it again, and wandered through the sands for three days and nights. He was found, when already in a state of delirium preceding a final dissolution, by a Tuarik, and brought back to his caravan. [Republic.

The Express Business.

A very important branch of business now is one which, indispensable as it is to every considerable merchant in all the large communities, is conducted by the express establishments. A few years ago expresses for business purposes were entirely unknown; now they are the most valuable auxiliary of commerce. Prior to the establishment of rail-roads, parcels, &c., used to be given to stage-drivers, boatmen, &c. A great deal was sent by private hands, and passengers had the felicity of filling their trunks half full of packages and letters for their acquaintances.

A rail-road conductor named Harnden, being daily laden with commissions of this kind, conceived the idea of making a business of it, and to him is due the credit of having originated the expresses. Relinquishing his situation as a conductor, he advertised that he was prepared to transport between Boston and New York such letters and small valuable parcels as he could carry in his carpet-bag. He found customers at once, and his business increased so fast that soon a single trunk could not hold all that was given him to carry. Presently it had grown so much that he was obliged to have messengers, clerks, crates and wagons, and a partner, Mr. Dexter Brigham, Jun.

Foreseeing the ultimate permanent success of this new description of public transportation, Mr. Alvan Adams, of Boston, started another express on the same route, and for about two years these two expresses were the only ones known in the world. Rich as he now is, Mr. Adams had no capital at that time, but on the contrary had many debts, (which he has since paid, principal and interest;) and only his indomitable perseverance, and the enterprise of his New York partner, Mr. W. B. Dinsmore, could have sustained the new express against the competition of the original establishment, which was then making money hand over hand.

At an early stage of the competition, Harnden & Co., elated by their well-merited success, extended their enterprise to Europe. But the concern met with an irreparable loss in the death of Mr. Harnden who was lost one cold winter night in the ill-fated steamboat Lexington, which was burnt on Long Island Sound. Mr. Brigham the remaining partner was chiefly occupied with their British and European operations, to which the firm of Harnden & Co., No. 51 Broadway, is now entirely devoted. The express business formerly pursued by them has passed through various hands to Messrs. Thompson & Livingston, the present proprietors, who paid undoubtedly a handsome bonus for the good will and name of Harnden's Express.

Agriculture in France.

A letter writer for the Republic says:—"A trip of six hundred and fifty miles, from the nothern to the southern extremity of France, justifies me in the expression of my opinion, that God's sun does not shed its rays on so fair a land, or one so thoroughly cultivated. The whole country is literally a garden. Every square foot, from the mountain top down to the lowest ravine, is made to produce something, if it be susceptible of it. Their mode of planting or sowing their crops, whether on plain or hill-side, produces the finest effect on the appearance of the landscape; the space allotted for each crop is laid out in squares or parallelograms, with mathematical precision, and, whether large or small, the best garden could not be divided with greater accuracy. As there are no fences or hedges, and as the different crops are in various stages of maturity, you can imagine the variety of hues that meet the eye, and the magnificence of the panorama that stretches out in every direction as far as the vision can penetrate. I am sorry to add in this connection, that seven-eighths of the agricultural labor is performed by females, while two or three hundred thousand stalwart men in uniform are idling away their time in barracks of the cities and villages. In the absence of fences, cattle secured by ropes are driven about their pasturage by females; and sheep are confined within the required limits by boys, assisted by shepherd dogs. Speaking of cattle reminds me that notwithstanding fresh pork is abundant enough in market, both in England and France, I have not seen a live porker in either country."

ARMY UNIFORM.—The New Army Uniform is minutely described in a general order lately issued from the Department of War, having received the approval of the Secretary. The old dress, it is said, may be worn by the commissioned officers of the army until the 1st of January next, after which time the new regulations are to be strictly enforced. The Washington Republic furnishes the following details of the most important changes made in the uniform heretofore worn: All officers are to wear a frock coat of dark blue cloth, the skirt to extend from two-thirds to three-fourths of the distance from the top of the hip to the bend of the knee; single-breasted for captains and lieutenants; double-breasted for all other grades. The uniform coat of all enlisted men is to be scarlet; infantry, light or Saxony blue; riflemen, medium or emerald green; and dragoons, orange colored. The caps for all officers and enlisted men are to be of dark blue cloth, according to pattern, and so ornamented and varied in trimmings as to denote rank and the several branches of service. Feathers give place to pompons.

SINGULAR CASE.—On the 1st of July, (says a Glasgow paper,) during the thunder-storm, a man named Raeburn, residing in the Croft, Paisley, was struck dumb. Raeburn, it appears, was standing near a window, when one of the flashes of lightning, more vivid than usual, had such an effect on his organs of speech that he could not articulate a syllable. The advice of several medical gentleman was obtained, but all to no purpose; and, what was strangest of all, no hurt or defect whatever could be observed. Next day, Raeburn was advised to try what galvanism could effect in his case, and he at once proceeded to Mr. Ferguson's galvanic operating rooms in Sneddon-st. Here, after the application for a few minutes of the battery to his neck, he was able to articulate one or two syllables; his joy at this, it may be imagined, was very great; and we are happy to say, that after six applications from the galvanic apparatus, his speech has all but recovered its former fluency. Raeburn is about 23 years of age; and all that he felt at the time he was struck dumb was a kind of giddy feeling for about a minute.

ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.—The Potomac (Mich.) Sentinel says, that some twenty-five years ago, Jacob McKinney, of that place, married a Miss ——. After residing together, rather unhappily, as man and wife for some years, and after having two children, they separated, and McKinney joined the U. S. army, during which time he was steward of an hospital for about sixteen years. Mrs. McKinney, supposing her husband dead, about twelve years ago married a Mr. Thornburg, an industrious and well-disposed man, by whom she has had a number of children, Recently, McKinney, after an absence of twenty years, returned to claim his wife, covered with scars and wounds received in the Mexican war. Under all the circumstances, as his children are both dead, the recommendation that Mr. McKinney should retire for another twenty years, is undoubtedly very good.

WATER-MELON SUGAR.—The Chicago Tribune, in acknowledging the receipt of a small quantity of genuine saccharine matter, extracted from the water melon, says:—"We have seen and used sugar made from cane, maple, corn, and beets, but we have never seen any so pure and deliciously sweet as this. To our mind it is equal to the best quality of honey. The water-melon possesses a great amount of saccharine matter in a very pure state, and we do not see why making sugar from it could not be made a profitable business, in a climate adapted to the growth of it."

WHITE WHORTLEBERRIES.—The editor of The Boston Journal has had presented to him some white whortleberries, picked on the farm of Jeremiah Gardner, in North-Kingston, R. I. They are about the size of the black whortleberry. Their color is pearly-white. They grow upon a bush of about the same size, and yield abundantly. There is upon Mr. Gardner's farm a plot of some twenty feet covered with the bushes which bear these white berries, while all around them the common black species grow in profusion. On no other spot on the farm or in that vicinity have the white berries been found.

HOW TO TOAST BREAD.—If you would have a slice so toasted as to be pleasant to the palate, and wholesome and easily digested, never let one partical of the surface be charred. Chestnut brown is even too far deep for good toast; and the color of a fox is rather too deep. The nearer it can be kept to a straw color, the more delicious to the taste, and the more wholesome it will be. This is done by keeping the bread a proper distance from the fire, and exposing it to a proper heat.

"STEALING MY THUNDER."—The origin of this singular phrase is thus explained in D'Israeli's Miscellanies. Jon. Dennis wrote a tragedy which the actors refused to perform to empty houses; but they retained some excellent thunder which Dennis had invented, and it rolled one night when Dennis was in the pit, and it was loudly applauded. He suddenly started up, and in a fit of passion, cried out to the audience at the top of his voice, "They won't act my tragedy, but they steal my thunder!"

There is only one way to boil potatoes, of which the majority of people seem to be profoundly ignorant. Have the water boiling before you put the potatoes into it; and after cooking them sufficiently, pour the water off, and allow them to "steam" about five minutes previous to serving up. You will find them deliciously mealy. The potato is a fine vegetable, but it is too often most barbarously cooked.

A village in Macedonia is a collection of mud huts with tiled or thatched roofs, one story high, having generally but one room, and that partly under ground, and quite likely has neither floor, window, nor fire-place, and only the scantiest furniture. The people sleep in the clothes which they wear during the day, and have little else than a blanket for bed and bedding.

Central Railroad of New Jersey.

Summer Arrangements, commencing Monday, March 31, 1851.

THIS Road extends from ELIZABETHPORT, 35 miles, to WHITE HOUSE, N J, reducing the staging between the terminus of the Road and EASTON to 25 miles.

This line leaves New York by steamboat Red Jacket from pier No 1 North River, and connects with trains on the New Jersey Railroad, which leaves New York from foot of Cortland-st.

TRINS UP—Leave New York by steamboat Red Jacket, pier No 1 North River, at 9 A M, passenger; 1 P M, freight; and 5 P M, passenger; and by N J Railroad, foot of Cortland-st, at 9 A M, and 2 and 5¼ P M.

Trains leave White House and following places for New York as follows:

White House at 3¼ A M, freight; 5 40 A M, passenger, at 1 40 P M.

Somerville at 4 30 A M, freight; at 6 05 A M, passenger, at 2 05 P M.

Bound Brook at 4 50 A M, freight; at 6 15 A M, passenger, at 2 15 P M.

The Christian Review.

THE removal of this Quarterly to New York more than a year since, and its elevation in character, the Publishers are happy to say, have greatly increased its circulation. Seeing this readiness to appreciate and patronize their efforts, they are determined to spare no pains or expense in raising the work to the highest point of excellence, every way worthy of its position in the metropolis of the nation, and as the organ of one of the most numerous and respectable denominations in the land.

TERMS.

For a single copy, three dollars per annum. No subscriptions received for less than a volume commencing with the Jan. No. of each year.

Every person forwarding the subscription price of four copies, shall receive a fifth copy gratis.

POSTAGE PRE-PAID.

When paid in advance, the postage will be pre-paid by the Publishers; or, the postage will be pre-paid on all numbers issued after the payment of the subscription.

☞ NEW POSTAGE LAW. ☜

This offer of pre-payment of postage is of more importance in consequence of the new law. The postage under 500 miles is the same as before; over 500 and under 1,500 miles the postage will be double; over 1,500 and under 2,500 miles, treble; and over 2,500 and 3,500, quadruple.

☞ If, however, the postage is pre-paid it is only one-half the above rates.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

This periodical has at last taken its true position. It will now challenge comparison with the best religious Reviews—proving that the Baptists have intellectual power and diversity enough to maintain a denominational Quarterly of the highest standard.

[Watchman and Reflector.

In tasteful and correct mechanical execution the "Review" is not surpassed by any of the Quarterlies. . . . Every minister should have it; and we wonder that more of our lay brethren, of educated mind, literary taste, and pecuniary ability, do not subscribe.

THE SABBATH QUESTION.

Editorial Remarks.

Perhaps most of our readers will except a few remarks from us on this subject; otherwise, since it is clear that we cannot please all of them, we would rather forbear. Of all the letters on the subject, that by Brother Owen of Cranfield, in our September number, approaches most nearly to the views of the writer of this article. We think the word "Sabbath" Jewish and inappropriate—the transference theory a pure figment, worthy only to be placed side by side with the transference of circumcision to infant baptism, and with not a tittle more of evidence in its favor—and our preference for the day, as the day of Christian worship, is founded on the simple fact, that it had its origin in New Testament times, and has been employed for the purpose so universally ever since, that, if other grounds failed, expediency would still demand its retention.

One circumstance of importance has not been brought forward, viz., the contrast of the New Testament legislation with the former one in regard to its positive character. The law of the Old Testament is distinguished as prohibitory, which is, indeed, the general character of law, since "it is added on account of transgression." "Thou shalt not" is its characteristic formula. "Touch not, taste not, handle not." In perfect harmony with this, thou shalt not work is the explanation of the command to keep the seventh day holy. In the New Testament, we meet with not a single syllable on the point of abstinence from work; but, in marked congruity with its distinguishing glory as a dispensation of "the spirit of life," of "love to God and man," its very genius is that of fellowship and worship. No one questions the daily or frequent "assembling of themselves together" by the disciples, or that the word "church" itself, the collective designation of Christ's followers, means an assembly. There was, in fact, no need to legislate that Christians should meet, at least weekly, for worship; the spirit which was given them was, in this respect, a law unto them. Nor can we easily conceive, now, of any devout mind being willing to employ the day in those secular avocations which must almost nullify its use as a day of worship.

On the subject of its obligation as a part of the moral law, there appears to us some little confusion in some of the views expressed in the correspondence. With Mr. Owen, we have never been able to see the morality of one part of the law as distinguished from the other. To those to whom it was given, all was equally moral, in the sense of being obligatory; but in the sense of its springing from the natural relations between God and men, or between man and his fellow-man, and being therefore perpetually binding, we can know how far it is so only by the light which Christianity throws on those relations, and not by mere position in the code. The grand intent of the Jewish Sabbath in its relation to Christianity, we hold, with Calvin (see Institutes, book ii. chap. 8), is to prefigure the REST IN CHRIRT, in which the christian ceases from his own natural work, and, taking Christ's yoke on him, finds rest to his soul. Paul, as he observes, when denouncing the observance of Sabbaths, &c. (Col. ii. 15, 17), does so because the body, the reality which the things typified, is Christ. The Jewish Sabbath no more typified a like institution under Christianity, than did circumcision and the passover; but, like these ordinances, foreshadowed a glorious and spiritual reality,—"the rest which remaineth for the people of God." In the same chapter, Calvin also states, that he would not bind the churches to slavery to the seventh day, not being concerned about that number; he would leave them free to observe any day, provided they did so without superstition.

It would grieve us much to know, that, through any letters admittted into our Magazine, any one should be led to slight or misuse "the Lord's-day." We do think it "the Pearl of days." But the grounds of its observance are quite another question, and we assuredly do think that much of a carnal Judaism has intruded here. In Churchmen this is natural enough, as also their Jehu-like zeal for legislative protection; but Baptists would do well to be cautious of sanctioning wrong principles of argument even for so good an end as the observance of the Lord's-day. With Dr. Carson, we must say that our appeal "should be to the New Testament alone, and that, much as we prize the day, we would not bring in a mass of Popish rubbish in order to retain it."

On this point, too, we may surely extend the most cordial indulgence to those who differ from us. It would seem as if we had been specially cautioned against "judging" each other in regard to days (Rom. xiv. 4, 5, 6; Col. ii. 16). Whether the "Spirit of Christ" lead us "not to neglect the assembling of ourselves together," but thankfully to use the Lord's-day for that purpose, or whether we hold ourselves bound to do the same thing by Sinaitic or Paradisiacal enactments, can make no practical difference; though to us the former will appear the view most in accordance with our dispensation, and the latter a retrogression even from the light obtained at the Reformation. The only general doctrine derivable from the fourth commandment, we conceive, with Calvin, to be, that "sacred assemblies should be diligently attended to, and those external helps made use of which serve to aid the worship of God."

We imagine the reasonings of our seventh-day friend will not seem conclusive to many minds, so far as they attempt to invalidate the common view of the New Testament passages he adverts to. As Christ was crucified on the Friday, with those who believe his own assertion that the third day he should rise again, it is clear he rose on the Sunday. As to Acts xx. 7, our translators are quite right. The humblest Greek scholar knowns that had the writer meant "night," that word would have been inserted. It meant "day" however, in the sense of the twenty-four hours, the commencement of which, very probably, was at sunset, as the meeting was held at night (see v. 8, 11). It should, of course, be remembered, that the Sabbath in the New Testament, as well as the Old, always means Saturday; and it is to be regretted, on three grounds, that the word should ever be applied to Sunday. 1st, because it appears to make the Apostle Paul condemn our day of worship. 2dly, because it obscures to common readers the narrative of the resurrection. And, 3dly, because it gives so comparatively low a view of the day itself. The associations of the word "Sabbath" are rather with severe and Jewish prohibitions, and the grave of Christ, than with the life-giving spirit of the new dispensation, and the crowning triumph of our risen Lord.

REMINISCENCES OF WASHINGTON.

Arthur's Home Gazette has recently given a series of articles by Arthur J. Stansbury, entitled "Recollections and Anecdotes of the Presidents of the United States," from which we select the following Reminiscenes of Washington.

HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

Gilbert Stuart, whose painting of him has immortalized, not his subject, but himself, and who, as one long familiar with the human countenance, is eminently fit to speak on such a subject, often said, that the head and face of Washington were unlike those of any other human being that ever had come under his observation. There was a breadth about the base of the nose, and a largeness and peculiar form of the sockets of the eyes, which distinguished the face from all others. It is not generally known, but it is nevertheless true, that there was a slight defect about the eyes; the eyelid did not rise entirely to its place; this communicated that peculiar downcast look which distinguished the eye of Washington, giving it an air of thought, of modest reserve, of composure, almost approaching to heaviness, which any one that saw him never forgot. It affected the carriage and motion of his head, occasioning him to raise it, when looking upon a stranger approaching him, more than would have been necessary, or natural, had the eyelid been entirely free. Yet so slight was the cause, that by most persons the effect only was noticed. Stuart failed to catch this expression, but Peale has preserved it with admirable fidelity in the portrait which hangs in the Senate Chamber at Washington. When he was reading or writing, you could not perceive it; when he was speaking, it gave modest gravity, and dignity to his expression; under strong excitement, as in the heat of battle, it vanished, and his eyes shone like stars.

REBUKED FAMILIARITY.

It need hardly be said, that the idea of personal familiarity with Washington never entered into the thoughts of the many, of all ranks, conditions, and endowments, who at different times approached him. The awe of his presence fell alike on all men.

There was, indeed, a person, (whether worthy of the name of a man, is doubtful, certainly not of an American,) who once, for a wager, made the venturous attempt of a familiar approach to him. As General Washington was walking up Chesnut street in Philadelphia, having shortly before left his lodgings, this individual, in the view of his companions on the other side of the street, who had witnessed the bet, and were curious to see the issue, came up to the General, and slapping him familiarly upon the back, exclaimed with a jocose air, "Well, my old fellow, how do you find yourself this morning?" Washington stopped; turned round; looked him full in the face; and with freezing solemnity said, "Sir, what have I ever said, or done, which induces you to treat me in this manner?" The man shrank into nothing, and was extinguished. No man ever repeated the experiment.

MY FIRST SIGHT OF WASHINGTON.

My first sight of him seems like a remote vision; it was only from a distance and in my early childhood. I had been walking up Market street, Philadelphia, when I saw approaching from the South a great cavalcade, attended and surrounded by floods of people, all whose looks seemed to be bent on one object. On a dark sorrel horse, which he rode with military grace and ease, was an officer of large size, wearing the triangular cocked hat, which appears in all paintings of the battle scenes of the Revolution, and attended on either hand by officers of his staff. They were all so heavily loaded with dust as to be entirely of one color. Hats, coats, boots, hands, saddles, holsters, horses, seemed all of one uniform drab, as if they had been riding for hours along a highway, without stopping to remove the dust as it accumulated upon them. They told me that was General Washington; and I afterwards heard my father read from the papers of the day, an account of his having been crowned, as he passed the bridge at Gray's Ferry, with a chaplet of flowers, and greeted by a band of beautiful young ladies, chanting a song of welcome to the Hero who had closed the eventful struggle for freedom by the then recent victory of Yorktown. I was too far off to recognize his features; but the mounted figure is even now before my mind's eye; and I instantly recognized it again, when I saw, for the first time, Trumbull's Picture of the Surrender at Yorktown, that now occupies one of the panels in the Rotunda of the Capitol. The Washington there drawn is precisely what I saw coming into the city by the road from Gray's Ferry.

WASHINGTON AT CHURCH.

My next view of him was a nearer and more distinct one—it was as a worshiper. My parents, who were Episcopalians, had a front pew in the gallery of Christ's Church, in Philadelphia; and from that favorable post of observation, I noticed, in the middle aisle, a pew lined with crimson velvet, fringed with gold, into which I saw a highly dignified gentleman enter, accompained by two others, younger than himself, and most respectful in their deportment towards him, who, as I have since learned, were members of his military family. I was but a young boy, and the impression, as I well remember, on my youthful mind was, that I had never seen so grand a gentleman before. Everybody else seemed to be of the same mind; for I do not consider it a slander on the respectable congregation worshiping in that church, to say, that far more looks were fixed upon that pew than on the pulpit, (unless, indeed, it happened to be occupied by that most excellent and venerable of prelates, Bishop White.) The deportment of Washington was reverent and attentive; his eyes, when not on the praper-book were on the officiating clergyman, and no witless or irreverent worshiper could plead Washington's example. I have since been in the church at Alexandria, in Virginia, which was his parish Church—have handled the prayer-book he used, and seen his well-known autograph in the front of his Bible; and here the same impresssion existed as to his regular and exemplary attendance and demeanor.

HIS ADDRESS TO CONGRESS.

But I once had an opportunity far more favorable, of beholding this greatest of men, under circumstances the best possible for exhibiting him to the fullest advantage.

I was but a school-boy at the time, and had followed one of the many groups of people, who, from all quarters, were making their way to the Hall in Chesnut street, at the corner of Fifth, where the two Houses of Congress then held their sittings, and where they were that day to be addressed by the President, on the opening of his second term of office. Boys can often manage to work their way through a crowd better than men can; at all events, it so happened that I succeeded in reaching the steps of the Hall, from which elevation, looking in every direction, I could see nothing but human heads; a vast fluctuating sea, swaying to and fro, and filling every accessible place which commanded even a distant view of the building. They had congregated, not with the hope of getting into the Hall, for that was physically impossible, but that they might see Washington. Many an anxious look was cast in the direction from which he was expected to come, till at length, true to the appointed hour, (he was the most punctual of men,) an agitation was observable on the outskirts of the crowd, which gradually opened and gave space for the approach of an elegant white coach, drawn by six superb white horses, having on its four sides beautiful designs of the four seasons, painted by Cipriani. It slowly made its way, till it drew up immediately in front of the Hall. The rush was now tremendous. But as the coach door opened, there issued from it two gentlemen, with long white wands, who, with some difficulty, parted the people, so as to open a passage from the carriage to the steps, on which the fortunate school-boy had achieved a footing, and whence the whole proceeding could be distinctly seen. As the person of the President emerged from the carriage, a universal shout rent the air, and continued, as he very deliberately ascended the steps. On reaching the platform, he paused, looking back on the carriage, thus affording to the anxiety of the people, the indulgence they desired, of feasting their eyes upon his person. Never did a more majestic personage present himself to the public gaze. He was within two feet of me; I could have touched his clothes; but I should as soon have thought of touching an electric battery. Boy as I was, I felt as in the presence of a divinity. As he turned to enter the Hall, the gentlemen with the white wands preceded him, and with still greater difficulty than before, repressed the people, and cleared a way to the great staircase. As he ascended I ascended with him, step by step, creeping close to the wall, and almost hidden by the skirts of his coat. Nobody looked at me; everybody was looking at him; and thus I was permitted, unnoticed, to glide along, and happily to make my way (where so many were vainly longing and struggling to enter) into the lobby of the chamber of the House of Representatives. Once in, I was safe; for had I even been seen by the officers in attendance, it would have been impossible to get me out again. I saw near me a large pyramidal stove, which, fortunately, had but little fire in it, and on which I forthwith clambered, until I had attained a secure perch, from which every part of the Hall could be deliberately and distinctly surveyed. Depend upon it, I made use of my eyes.

On either side of the broad aisle that was left vacant in the center, were assembled the two Houses of Congress. As the President entered, all rose, and remained standing till he had ascended the steps at the upper end of the chamber, and taken his seat in the Speaker's chair. It was an impressive moment. Notwithstanding that the spacious apartment, floor, lobby, galleries, and all approaches, were crowded to their utmost capacity, not a sound was heard; the silence of expectation was unbroken and profound; every breath seemed suspended. He was dressed in a full suit of the richest black velvet; his lower limbs in short clothes, with diamond knee-buckles, and black silk stockings. His shoes, which were brightly japanned, were surmounted with large square silver buckles. His hair, carefully displayed in the manner of the day, was richly powdered, and gathered behind into a black silk bag, on which was a bow of black ribbon. In his hand he carried a plain cocked hat, decorated with the American cockade. He wore by his side a light, slender dress sword, in a green shagreen scabbard, with a richly ornamented hilt. His gait was deliberate, his manner solemn but self-possessed, and he presented, altogether, the most august human figure I had then or have since beheld.

At the head of the Senate stood Thomas Jefferson, in a blue coat, single-breasted, with large bright basket buttons, his vest and small clothes of crimson. I remember being struck with his animated countenance, of a brick-red hue, his bright eye and foxy hair, as well as by his tall, gaunt, ungainly form, and square shoulders. A perfect contrast was presented by the pale, reflective face and delicate figure of James Madison; and above all, by the short, burly, bustling form of Gen. Knox, with ruddy cheek, prominent eye, and still more prominent proportions of another kind. In the semi-circle which was formed behind the chair, and on either hand of the President, my boyish gaze was attracted by the splendid attire of the Chevalier D'Yrujo, the Spanish ambassador, then the only foreign minister near our infant government. His glittering star, his silk chapeau bras, edged with ostrich feathers, his foreign air and courtly bearing, contrasted strongly with those nobility of nature's forming who stood around him. It was a very fair representation of the old world and the new. How often has the same reflection occurred to me since, on witnessing the glittering, and now numerous, company of foreign dignitaries collected round our Presidents on an inauguration day, or the recurrence of our national anniversary. True, the individuals who form that brilliant coterie are, for the most part, men eminent for general intelligence, as well as the virtues of private life, men who meet, and well deserve a cordial welcome on our shores, and often carry from it the sincerest regrets. But how do the personal attainments and characters of the men themselves put out the blaze of the gold and diamonds with which their governments has covered them? And if, even in the unadorned presence of his successors, these decorations seem puerile in republican eyes, how would they have faded away and been lost in the chilling grandeur of the public presence of Washington.

Having retained his seat for a few moments, while the members resumed their seats, the President rose, and taking from his breast a roll of manuscript, proceeded to read his address. His voice was full and sonorous, deep and rich in its tones, free from that trumpet ring which it could assume amid the tumult of battle, (and which is said to have been distinctly heard above all its roar,) but sufficiently loud and clear to fill the chamber and be heard, with perfect ease, in its most remote recesses. The address was of considerable length; its topics, of course, I forget, for I was too young to understand them; I only remember, in its latter part, some reference to the Wabash river, (then a new name to my ear,) and to claims or disputes on the part of the Indian tribes. He read it, as he did every thing else, with a singular serenity and composure, with manly ease and dignity, but without the smallest attempt at display.

Having concluded, he laid the manuscript upon the table before him, and resumed his seat; when, after a slight pause, he rose and withdrew, the members rising and remaining on their feet until he left the chamber.

The paper was then taken up by Mr. Beckley, the Clerk of the House, and again read from beginning to end. Beckley's enunciation, by the by, was admirably clear, giving every syllable of every word, and, I may say, he was almost the only officer whose official duty it is to read, whom I ever heard read well.

This form having been gone through, the members of the Senate retired, and I took advantage of the bustle to descend from my unwonted and presumptuous elevation, and mingle with the dissolving crowd.

A PREDETINARIAN ROMANCE.

By the clear light of the moon we could distinguish the emaciated form and features of an old Jogee. He was sparingly dressed, in the usual ochre-colored cotton clothes, and sat upon the ground with his back against the trunk of the tree. As he caught sight of us, he raised himself upon his elbow, and began to beg in the usual whining tone. "Thy gift will serve for my funeral," he said with a faint smile, pointing to a few plantain leaf platters, containing tumeric, red powder, rice, and a few other similar articles. We inquired into what he considered the signs and symptoms of approaching dissolution. It was a complaint that must have caused him intense pain, which any surgeon could have instantly alleviated. We told him what medical skill could do; offered to take him at once where assistance could be procured, and warned him that the mode of suicide which he proposed to carry out, would be one of the most agonizing description. "I consider this disease a token from the Bhagwan (the Almighty) that this form of existence is finished!" and he steadfastly refused all aid. We asked whether pain might not make him repent his decision, perhaps too late. His reply was characteristic of his caste. Pointing to a long sabre cut, which seemed the length of his right side, he remarked, "I have been a soldier, under your rule. If I feared not death in fighting at the word of the Feringe, am I likely, do you think, to shrink from it when the Deity summons me?"

It is useless to argue with these people; so we confined ourselves to inquiring what had made him leave the Company's service. He told us the old story, the cause of half the asceticism in the East, a disappointment in an affaire de cœur. After rising to the rank of naick, or corporal, very rapidly, in consequence of saving the life of an officer at the siege of Poobah, he and a comrade obtained leave of absence, and returned to their native hamlet, in the Maharatta hills. There he fell in love, desperately, as Orientals only can, with the wife of the village Brahman. A few months afterward the husband died, and it was determined by the caste brethren that the relict should follow him, by the suttee rite. The soldier, however, resolved to save her, and his comrade, apprised of his plans, promised to aid him with heart and hand. The fire was heaped up, and surrounded by a throng of gazers collected to witness the ceremony so interesting and exciting to a superstitious people. At length the suttee appeared, supported by her female relations, down the path opened to her by the awe-struck crowd. Slowly she ascended the pile of firewood; and, after distributing little gifts to those around, sat down, with the head of the deceased in her lap. At each of the four corners of the pyre was a Brahmin, chanting some holy songs. Presently the priest who stood fronting the south-east retired to fetch the sacred fire.

Suddenly a horseman, clad in yellow clothes, dashed out of a neighboring thicket. Before any had time to oppose him, his fierce little Maharatta pony clove the throng, and, almost falling upon his haunches with the effort, stood motionless by the side of the still unlit pyre. At that instant the widow, assisted by a friendly hand, rose from her seat, and was clasped in the horseman's arms. One touch of the long Maharatta spur, and the pony again bounds, plunging through the crowd, toward the place whence he came. Another moment and they will be saved. Just as the fugitives are disappearing behind the thicket, an arrow shot from the bow of a Rankari, missing its mark, pierces deep into the widow's side. The soldier buried his paramour under the tree where we were sitting. Life had no longer charms for him. He never returned to his corps, and resolved to devote himself to futurity. It was wonderful, considering the pain he must have been enduring, to hear him relate his tale so calmly and circumstantially. The next morning, when we passed by the spot, three or four half naked figures, in the holy garb were sitting like mourners round the body of the old Jogee. [Goa and the Blue Mountains.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF A GIFT.

Thanks for the Gift! Thou knowest not
  Its priceless worth to me;
Though thou couldst never be forgot,
  Yet on the dark blue sea,
Or in a strange and cruel clime,
  A living voice shall swell
Up from that precious gift of thine,
  And whisper, "All is well."

And thou wilt still remember me;
  When China's name is heard,
The murmur that it brings to thee
  Shall with my name be stirred;
And thou wilt raise the fervent plea,
  "Be merciful, O God,
And comfort those who toil for Thee,
  With both thy staff and rod."

A SERMON ON SCOLDING.

Text—"Fret not thyself in any way to do evil."

I. IT IS A SIN AGAINST GOD.

It is an evil and only evil, and that continually. David understood both human nature and the law of God. He says, "Fret not thyself in any way to do evil." That is, never fret or scold; it is always a sin. If you cannot speak without fretting or scolding, keep silence.

II. IT DESTROYS AFFECTION.

No one ever did, ever can, or ever will love an habitual fretter, fault-finder or scolder. Husbands, wives, children, relatives, or domestics, have no affection for peevish, fretful fault-finders. Few tears are shed over the graves of such. Persons of high moral principle may tolerate them; may bear with them. But they cannot love them more than the sting of nettles, or the noise of musquitoes. Many a man has been driven to the tavern, and to dissipation, by a peevish, fretful wife. Many a wife has been made miserable by a peevish, fretful husband.

III. IT IS THE BANE OF DOMESTIC HAPPINESS.

A fretful, peevish, complaining fault-finder in a family, is like the continual chafing of an inflamed sore. Wo to the man, woman or child, who is exposed to the influence of such a temper in another. Nine-tenths of all domestic trials and unhappiness spring from this source. Mrs. D. is of this temperament. She wonders her husband is not more fond of her company. That her children give her so much trouble. That domestics do not like to work for her. That she cannot secure the good will of young people. The truth is, she is peevish and fretful. Children fear her, but do not love her. She never yet gained the affection of young people, nor never will till she leaves off fretting.

IV. IT DEFEATS THE END OF FAMILY GOVERNMENT.

Good family government is the blending of authority with affection, so as to secure respect and love. Indeed, this is the great secret of managing young people. Now, your fretters may inspire fear, but they always make two faults where they correct one. Scolding at a child, fretting at a child, sneering at a child, taunting a child, treating the child as though it had no feelings, inspires dread and dislike, and fosters those very dispositions from which many of the faults of childhood proceed. Mr. F. and Mrs. F. are of this class. Their children are made to mind; but how? Mrs. F. frets and scolds her children. She is severe enough upon their faults. She seems to watch them in order to find fault. She sneers at them. Treats them as though they had no feelings. She seldom gives a command without a threat, and a long, running, fault-finding commentary. When she chides, it is not done in a dignified manner. She raises her voice, puts on a cross look, threatens, strikes them, and pinches their ears, snaps their heads, &c. The children cry, pout, sulk, and poor Mrs. F. has to do her work over pretty often. Then she will find fault with her husband, because he will not fall in with her ways, or chime with her as chorus.

V. FRETTING AND SCOLDING MAKE HYPOCRITES.

As a fretter never receives confidence and affection, so no one likes to tell them any thing disagreeable, and thus procure for themselves a fretting. Now children conceal as much as they can from such persons. They cannot make up their minds to be frank and openhearted. So husbands conceal from their wives and wives from their husbands. For a man may brave a lion, but he likes not to come in contact with nettles and musquitoes.

VI. IT DESTROYS ONE'S PEACE OF MIND.

The more one frets, the more he may. A fretter will always have enough to fret at. Especially if he or she has the organ of order and neatness largely developed. Some will always be out of place. There will always be some dirt somewhere. Others will not eat right, look right, sit right, talk right; he will not do these things so as to please them. And fretters are generally so selfish as to have no regard for any one's comfort but their own.

VII. IT IS A MARK OF A VULGAR DISPOSITION.

Some persons have so much gall in their disposition, are so selfish, that they have no regard for the feelings of others. All things must be done to please them. They make their husbands, wives, children, domestics, the conductors by which their spleen and ill-nature are discharged. Wo to the children who are exposed to such influences. It makes them callous and unfeeling, and when they grow up they pursue the same course with their own children, or those entrusted to their management, and thus the race of fretters is perpetuated. Any person who is in the habit of fretting, sneering, taunting their husbands, wives, children, or domestics, shows either a bad disposition or else ill-breeding. For it is generally your ignorant, low-bred people that are guilty of such things.

A YOUNG GIDEON.

A boy belonging to one of the schools established by the missionaries in the South Seas, had heard so much of the sin and folly of idolatry, that his confidence in idols was shaken, and he longed to know for a certainty whether the images he had been accustomed to worship were really possessed of power or not. One day his father and mother went out, and left him at home alone. He had spent some time in reading his task, and thinking over what he had been taught at the school the day before. At last the idea came into his mind that it would be a good thing to burn the idols. He was, however, afraid, partly on account of his parents, and partly from the dread he had of offending the gods, and bringing down upon him swift destruction. In this difficulty he knelt down, and entreated the God of the Christians to take care of him and help him. He then rose and taking up one of the smallest idols; he put it on the fire; the flames kindled about it, and in a short time not a vestige of it remained. The terrified child looked on with astonishment; but no sooner was the first consumed than he threw on another, and another, and another, till, like Gideon of old, he had thoroughly cleansed his father's house. When, however, the flames had subsided, and all was over, the boy became alarmed at his own temerity. He had no more fear of the gods of wood and stone, but he trembled at the thought of what his father might say, and he was half inclined to repent his rashness. In this extremity he shut up the dwelling and went into the woods; and the best way he could, devoted himself to God, promising that if God would befriend him and be his God, he would serve him all the days of his life. While he was there, his father and mother returned, and missing at once the idols and the boy, they feared that some spirit had come and taken them away together. As soon as they could recover themselves a little, they went to the missionary and asked him if he knew anything about their son. He said he did not; but, suspecting what had been done, he offered to accompany them to find him out. After going in various directions, they bent their steps to the wood, and there at some distance, under the shadow of a large tree, they saw the lad kneeling before God. The parents were so thankful to see him again, and to find that not a hair of his head had been hurt, they forgot their rebukes, were persuaded to renounce their heathenish customs, and henceforth gave themselves up to the study of the Holy Scriptures. The boy, encouraged by the Divine goodness, was confirmed in his resolution to be the Lord's, and afterwards became a zealous teacher in the schools, and a preacher of the gospel among his brethren.

JOHNSON'S BENEVOLENCE.

"Johnson's charity to the poor," writes Boswell, "was uniform and extensive, both from inclination and principle." Like Goldsmith, when he had exhausted his own purse in acts of liberality, he would beg for others, if in real distress; this "he did judiciously as well as humanely." The Rev. Dr. Maxwell says, "He frequently gave all the silver in his pocket to the poor, who watched him between his house and the tavern where he dined." "Those," records Miss Reynolds, "who knew his uniform benevolence, and its actuating principles—steady virtue and true holiness—will readily agree with me, that peace and good will towards man were the natural emanations of his heart. I shall never forget the impression," she continues, "I felt in Dr. Johnson's favor, the first time I was in his company, on his saying, that, as he returned to his lodgings at one or two o'clock in the morning, he often saw poor children asleep on the thresholds and stalls, and that he used to put pennies into their hands to buy them a breakfast." "And this at a time," observes Croker, "when he himself was living on pennies."

Boswell observes, "Johnson's love of little children, which he discovered upon all occasions, calling them 'pretty dears,' and giving them sweetmeats, was an undoubted proof of the real humanity and gentleness of his disposition."

Retrenchment in charity he thought should be the last consideration when obliged to economize. He writes to Mrs. Thrale, at the same time not allowing her to diminish a two-guinea annual subscription, "Whatever reasons you have for frugality, it is not worth while to save a guinea a year by withdrawing it from a public charity." But, beneficent as he was himself in alms-giving, he thought it better, in general, to spend money than to give it away. "A man," he said, "who spends his money, is sure he is doing good with it; he is not so sure when he is giving it away. A man who spends ten thousand a year will do more good than a man who spends two thousand and gives away eight."

* * *

In the first ten years of missionary effort in Bengal, there were 26 hopeful conversions; in the second 161; in the third 403; in the fourth 675; in the fifth 1,045; and in the present ten years the conversions are going on at the rate of between 2,000 and 3,000. These are strictly among the natives, not including the European and East Indian residents.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 4, 1851.

ABANDONING THE SABBATH.

Many cases of forsaking the Sabbath have occurred in the history of our denomination, but we should like to see the man who had abandoned it from principle. We should like to interrogate him as to the process by which he was led to see Sabbath-keeping to be unscriptural. We have read in some old author, pretty generally reputed orthodox, that "by the law is the knowledge of sin." And we should like to know what law he was reading, when he discovered the keeping of the seventh day to be a sin against God.

We shall not undertake to say that no one ever acted conscientiously in leaving our denomination, and attaching himself to the communion of those who observe the first day of the week; but we are very confident that, if none others had left us except such as were moved by conviction, our numbers would be vastly greater than they now are. In nine cases out of ten, those who leave us do so because a rigid obedience to our principles involves such constant sacrifice of convenience, and, in many cases, of pecuniary advantage, that their meagre piety will not longer sustain them in making it. They are absolutely "weary in well doing." At the same time, they wish in their hearts that all men would observe the seventh day, so that they might continue to keep it without inconvenience to themselves. They see the necessity of a reformation in the community in regard to the Sabbath; they wish it were already brought about; but they are tired of doing any thing more towards it themselves.

Such persons evidently misconceive the nature of the Christian calling. They appear to think that they are called only to enjoyment, and to well doing only so far as it is promotive of their enjoyment. Hence, when, after a longer or shorter trial, Sabbath-keeping is found to be still attended with discomfort, they are ready, first to abandon it, and then to look up reasons which will justify them in doing so. Is it any wonder that, in such a state of mind, the Bible itself appears to afford what they are looking after? Nevertheless, even in this state of mind, they never succeed in persuading themselves that the Bible any where says, "The first day of the week is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Such glaring perversion of the sacred oracles has been effectually forestalled by the training they have had already. The only conclusion they possibly can come to, and the only one they ever do arrive at, is that there is no Sabbath at all under the gospel.

But does this conclusion satisfy them? If it does, it is strange that they are never willing to act it out. It is strange that they are not found at work seven days in the week. Why is it that they still suspend their labor one day in seven? Does not this very suspension show, that they still feel that there is a necessity for a day of rest, notwithstanding all that they have argued concerning the abrogation of the fourth commandment? They may attempt to cheat themselves with the idea, that all they care about is a day of worship; but their own sober common sense tells them that a day of rest is essential to the existence of a day of worship. Destroy the former, and the latter will surely die, though it may drag out a feeble existence for a time. This they understand well enough. Hence, though they have not a particle of divine law to sanction the day which they have commenced observing, they feel impelled to throw all the force of example in its favor. Therefore they keep it—not quite as strictly as they used to keep the day of the fourth commandment, it is true, nevertheless—with far more strictness, and more like a Sabbath, than is justified by the new theory which they have adopted. Now, from the fact that they do not act out their theory, we infer that there is something in their very nature—something in their conscience—which pleads earnestly for the law of the Sabbath, and so earnestly, that they do not, and can not, feel entirely satisfied with themselves. They have fallen into the popular practice, it is true, but, from their inmost soul, they wish that the popular practice were more in accordance with the Bible.

We say that such persons mistake their calling. A Christian is a reformer. His calling makes him such. All are not Luthers, it is true; and there is but here and there one, whose name is destined to be sounded through the world as an overturner of abuses. Nevertheless, the disciple who does not regard himself as sent into the world to bear some part towards rectifying the errors of mankind, would better pause, and consider why he was called into the service of Christ at all.

Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord; and, as witnesses, they are sworn to testify the truth. As a person having a suit pending in court expects to gain his cause by the help of witnesses good and true, so has the Lord Jesus Christ a suit pending. It is the antagonism of truth and error; and the cause of truth will prevail, if the witnesses of Christ do not prove false in their testimony. Shall a sworn witness testify one thing to-day, and another thing to-morrow? Think of this, ye who contend for the Sabbath to-day, and to-morrow are found giving your testimony in behalf of a human tradition. Remember that you were put upon your oath, to testify that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." A lusty bribe, in the shape of better prospects for a living, or greater honor among men, may be a strong inducement for you to contradict the testimony you have heretofore given. But if there is a secret conviction in your heart that your former testimony was according to truth, beware how you yield to temptation.

It is not many months since we received a letter from a brother at the West, alluding to some cases of defection which had come under his notice, and which, as they afford a good illustration of the principle by which too many professors are governed, we take the liberty of holding up to our readers. He says:—

> "I recently paid a visit to some former Sabbath-keeping friends in the lower counties of this State, not one of whom now observes the holy Sabbath of Jehovah. Those who held out the longest, relinquished it some two months ago for the advantages of fellowship with a First-day Baptist Church recently formed in their own neighborhood. Still they stated, with much feeling, that their convictions and feelings were entirely with the observance of the seventh day, and that it was not even agreeable to them to hear the first day of the week called 'the Sabbath,' for 'for they knew that there was not a word of Bible authority for its observance as such.'"

Take another extract:—

> "Two families of Sabbath-keepers left their church privileges at the East, to provide lands for their children at the West. The old people held to their faith until death. The two families have now become seven; but one by one, unto the last of them, they have fallen into the popular usage, not from conviction of divine requirement, but from a pressing necessity of present convenience. How long shall these things waste us?"

These cases require no comment. We might present hundreds of similar ones, all going to show that, in most cases, the Sabbath is abandoned for want of that rigid, uncompromising piety, which holds on its way without weariness. Truly, we may ask with our brother, "How long shall these things waste us?"

EARLY INSTITUTION OF THE SABBATH.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The No-Sabbath heresy prevails to a great extent in this part of the country. Its defenders tell us that no Sabbath was commanded or kept between the time of the creation and the giving of the law at Sinai; therefore, they conclude, the Sabbath was for the Jews only. Prove to us, say they, that the Sabbath law existed before it was commanded at Sinai, and we will admit it is binding now, and will keep it.

To these my friends I would say, I am glad you have made this promise, and shall be gladder still if you perform it, for I propose to prove from the Scriptures, (and you admit their truth,) that the Sabbath law existed and was obeyed by Abraham in his day.

But, before I proceed to the proof, I will premise, what you will readily admit, that the covenant made with Abraham (Gal. 3:17) was the gospel, or everlasting covenant. (Gal. 3:8.)

Now to the proof. Gen. 26:5—"Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws." This text proves that God had commandments and laws, and that Abraham kept them in his time. Psalm 105:6—"O ye seed of Abraham my servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen; He is the Lord our God; His judgments are in all the earth; He hath remembered his COVENANT forever, the word which he COMMANDED TO A THOUSAND GENERATIONS; which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac, and confirmed the SAME unto Jacob for a LAW, and to Israel for an EVERLASTING COVENANT." This affirms, positively, that the covenant made with Abraham was the same that was confirmed to Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant.

Now, if we can find the covenant that was confirmed to Jacob for a law, we shall find, at the same time, the covenant made with Abraham, the laws and commandments of which he obeyed; and also the EVERLASTING COVENANT — the word which he commanded to a thousand generations. Exodus 24:12—"And the Lord said unto Moses, come up to me into the mount, and be there; and I will give thee tables of stone, and a law and commandments which I have written, that thou mayest teach them." Deut. 4:13—"And he declared unto you HIS COVENANT which he commanded you to perform, EVEN TEN COMMANDMENTS, and he wrote them upon two tables of stone." Now, if the Sabbath commandment is one of the ten, I have fully sustained my proposition.

And now the question arises, Will you submit to the authority of divine truth, or will you be found among "them who forsake the HOLY COVENANT?" Can you strike hands with him who has "indignation against the holy covenant," and thinks to "change times and laws?" (Dan. 11:30, and 7:25.) You talk much of the "new covenant." What is it? "I will put MY LAW in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts." And this is not all. "They shall teach no more every man his neighbor, saying, Know the Lord; for they shall ALL know me." The gospel is now preparing the way to that happy state of things; and if we "keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus," we shall be prepared to share in the fulfillment of the glorious promises of the everlasting covenant. For the covenant always contained, not only that which we are "commanded to perform," but "exceeding great and precious promises" of what God will do for those who obey him.

AN INFANT'S TESTIMONY TO A MOTHER'S PIETY.

Beautiful, indeed, is woman's piety—still more beautiful a mother's piety, who has a peculiar sphere to exercise that grace, and enjoys a more favorable opportunity to display it effectively in impressing its fruits on the plastic minds of tender youth—yet thrice more beautiful is a mother's piety, when reflected in the cherished emotions of her artless offspring; which hallowed emotions, and their conservative influence, I shall not attempt to trace on this occasion, as I have not taken up my pen to indite an essay, but merely to relate an anecdote—an anecdote that may exhibit, much better than an elaborate article, the abiding impressions of a mother's bearing and a mother's training in the nursery.

A conscientious and exemplary mother, (a much cherished relative of the writer, and a woman of exalted piety and sterling worth,) was removed from her family, of seven small children, about six months since, at which time her youngest child, Louis, was but two and a half years of age. A few weeks since this little child, Louis, in company with his brother Charles, about seven years of age, was spending the day with an aunt, and while partaking of a repast spread for the two children on a small table against the wall, over which hung a picture of the "Last Supper," Louis looked up, and after gazing at it intently for a few moments, asked his brother: "What are those people doing round that bench?" Charles replied: "It is the Saviour with his disciples at the last supper." Brightening up, little Louis sprang to his feet, clasped his hands, and staring with anxious longing depicted on his countenance, exclaimed: "Look, Charley, and see whether dear mother aint there!"

What better testimony could a mother leave of her piety among her children, than to have one so young identify her destiny with the Redeemer's disciples? Volumes could not pourtray, more emphatically, her constant theme among her little ones, and the holy aspirations she diligently endeavored to implant in the bosoms of her tender flock. Here is a simple but a touching evidence of a mother's faithfulness and a mother's success. Simple as the exclamation was, it tells most conclusively of her faith, of her hopes, of her confidence in a crucified Redeemer—that where He is, there also shall she be. Such was the consistency of her Christian deportment, and such the heavenly-mindedness of her converse, while here below, that her little Louis, not three years of age, could identify her companionship with the Saviour, and confidently look to find her among the Disciples, even when named in connection with a picture. How beautiful, how truly beautiful, must be the impressions of that sainted mother on the minds of her stricken lambs; and how touching, how tenderly touching, is the exclamation of such an artless child, seeking his lost mother among the redeemed of the Lord. Such memorials are worth the labor of a whole life, yet such sanctified memories mothers may leave behind them, by a faithful discharge of their mission while they tabernacle in the flesh. Honored is the mother of such a child, and thrice blessed are the children of such a mother.

"TOO CONSCIENTIOUS."

Recently, an intelligent Christian young lady, who had been educated in the observance of the first day of the week, being taught that it was the "Christian Sabbath," came to investigate for herself that question. The investigation resulted in a thorough conviction that she had been erroneously taught—that the first-day observance was a fallacy—and that the true Bible doctrine was according to the fourth commandment. But now came the struggle. Her convictions were clear, that her Maker required the observance of the "seventh" day. Her family and church connections, her associations and sympathies, were all upon the other side. After passing sleepless nights and anxious days, offering many prayers and shedding many and bitter tears, she finally yielded to her convictions of duty, and commenced the observance of the Lord's holy day. Determined efforts were now made on the part of her friends to dissuade her from her purpose. Finding that her faith was too intelligent for their sophistry, and that an appeal to the plain teachings of the Bible was but a palpable exhibition of the weakness of their cause, resort was had to another species of argument. Her mother, especially, attempted to overcome her firmness and purpose by telling her that her course of conduct was exceedingly humbling and mortifying to her friends, and degrading to herself! Finally, failing by her arguments and appeals to convince her daughter, she closed by saying that she was always "too conscientious!"

AN ILLUSTRATION OF ROMANISM.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

On the 3d of August, I preached for the Baptist Church at Andover, Allegany County, N. Y. On arriving at the place, I was informed that the Roman Catholics had held a meeting in the morning, but that it had already closed. During the intermission between the two services which I attended, a man passed along the street in front of the house where I stopped for refreshment, and as he was very drunk, attention was called to him, and the gentleman of the house remarked, "That man served as deacon for the Roman Catholic congregation this morning!" Query—Was that a "true son" of "holy mother?" If so, what might an apostate son be?

METHODISM IN ENGLAND.

The British Correspondent of The Independent gives a sad account of the condition of the English Wesleyan Methodists as developed at their 108th Conference, which was recently held at Newcastle-on-Tyne—the great coal-exporting port. The reception of the members was exceedingly significant of the state of public feeling, the preachers having been put to shifts for accommodation. Dr. Beaumont, undoubtedly the most popular man in the connection, was degraded from the superintendency, and declared incapable of filling any office; his offense being, that as superintendent of one of the London districts he had not proceeded rigorously toward the Wesleyan Reformers. The Doctor made a noble defense, but in vain. An aged and much respected minister, Rev. Mr. Walton, was also degraded; he had been guilty of writing and publishing "Counsels of Peace." He was told that he was not at liberty to follow the dictates of his own individual judgment! The overtures of the delegates of the Reformers for peace, reconciliation and reform, were rejected—five hands were held up in opposition to the resolution declining all negotiation, and upon this Dr. Bunting said he should like to know who the five were! and the president actually called upon the five preachers to stand up in order that Dr. Bunting might identify them! There are large deficiencies in the funds. A "special fund," to meet the apprehended deficiency, had been constituted, to which £2,500 had been contributed. Drs. Bunting and Alder, the missionary secretaries, gave in their resignation. Ecclesiastical history presents nothing more afflictive than the tone and temper of the Conference, and of the Wesleyan preachers generally.

TRACT ON COLONIZATION.

A colored man residing in the city of New York has offered a premium of $150 for the best tract on Colonization, written with reference to counteracting the opposition of his brethren to the scheme of colonization in Liberia. With a view to interest community in the subject, the gentleman who holds the money has published a statement of the circumstances from which the offer of a premium arose. It seems that this colored man was once the cook of a vessel which was shipwrecked on the coast of Africa, in the neighborhood of a slave-trading station. The traffickers in human flesh offered him a free passage to Cuba, but on his arrival there they sold him as a slave with the rest of their cargo. An American in Cuba became acquainted with his case, and appealed to our Government to procure his release. Through the agency of Mr. Buchanan, as Secretary of State, and General Campbell, our late Consul at Havana, this was accomplished, and his captors were obliged to pay him wages for the whole time of his detention, amounting to $2,400. On his arrival in New York, he placed this money in the hands of three trustees, until he should learn how to sustain himself in a land of freedom, and employ his capital with advantage. But a residence in New York did not operate favorably on his habits; he yielded to the temptations which beset his race, became dissipated, improvident, and sunk to the low condition of his associates. At last "he came to himself," renewed his early resolutions, became owner of a colored boarding-house in the vicinity of the city, part owner of a coasting schooner, and the husband of a wife. A short time ago, on the settlement of his trust, there remained to him $502, of which he appropriated $100 to the Colored Asylum, and $150 for the production of a tract on emigration to Liberia.

The gentleman, to whom this money was committed, to be applied at his discretion, has offered $100 of it as a prize for the best tract on the subject, and reserved $50 to be applied to the stereotyping and distribution of the tract when prepared. He says, "The tract must be plain and practical; free from fine writing and from all superfluity of words. Facts must be its only eloquence. It is desirable that it should not exceed eight duodecimo pages in length." "If the best should proceed from the pen of a colored writer, so much the more satisfactory. If no one should be deemed singly all that is desired, and it should be thought proper to make a compilation from the contents of two or more, the amount shall be fairly apportioned accordingly." "It is hoped that persons interested in the subject, and qualified by special information in regard to it, will respond to this invitation within the next three months. The amount of compensation offered is, indeed, no great inducement, but that compensation is not proposed as the chief incentive to the exertion required; and it was for the purpose of suggesting reasons for a more particular and higher interest in the task, that mention has been made of the singular circumstances out of which this invitation has grown."

A NOBLE EXAMPLE.

A pious mechanic, relating his Christian experience, thus described a circumstance which under God was the means of his conversion:—

"On New Year's day, 1827, I reflected that I had never attended a monthly concert of prayer in the city of New York, and determined that for once I would go. I went early, found only the sexton in the room, and sat down. Soon there came in a plain man, who spoke very pleasantly to the sexton, and then coming and sitting by my side, after a kind salutation, said, 'I trust you love the Saviour?' I had been preached to at arms length all my days; but this was the first time in my life that ever a Christian kindly and directly put such a question to my heart.

"We conversed considerably together, in the course of which, at his request, I gave him my name and residence. The next day he came into my shop, and brought the tract, 'Way to be Saved,' which he thought I might like to read. He called again and again. I became interested in him, and the next Sunday joined his Sunday-school; and was brought, as I hope, to Christ, and soon united with the church. But for him, I would probably have sunk into a miserable eternity!"

That good man who was enabled by grace to rescue this poor sinner, was Harlan Page, whose incessant labors fully entitle him to the inscription on his tomb, "He ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears."

JEWISH WORSHIP.—One of the editors of the Puritan Recorder recently attended Jewish worship for the first time at a synagogue in Boston. His description answers so well for the service of every synagogue, that we copy the essential part of it:—

"The whole service was in the Hebrew language. The men and women sit apart, and the men remain covered during the whole service. Before the service commences, the men cover themselves with a long fringed shawl or scarf. In one of the long pieces of fringe ten knots are tied. These knots represent the ten commandments. When the person puts on his shawl, he is to look upon the ten knots, and inquire of himself which of the commandments he has broken. The Rabbi reads the service in a tone half way between reading and singing. In some portions of the service the reader and congregation read alternately. The Old Testament is written on a roll, and kept in a closet called an ark. With much ceremony the roll is taken from the ark, unrolled and read in the congregation. The Rabbi stands with his back towards the assembly, and seven individuals by turns go and stand by him, and he reads a portion of the law or prophets to each. When this is accomplished, the holy writings are returned again to the ark. The service closes with a prayer, one petition of which is, that the Anointed One may speedily come."

TEMPERANCE IN WISCONSIN.—The North-Western Temperance Convention at Berlin, Wisconsin, adopted the following resolution on the License Law:—

Resolved, That while we oppose the present License Law of our State, and would call for its repeal at the earliest minute possible, and while we deem it unconstitutional in the highest degree for any temperance man, in his official capacity as Alderman, Village Trustee, or Town Supervisor, to grant licenses for the sale of intoxicating drinks, we believe it to be the duty of every friend of the cause, to use the said law to the utmost extent for the furtherance of the cause, by seeing that its provisions are strictly enforced in the case of those who procure license under it; and by availing themselves of the power conferred in the 10th section to curtail, as far as possible, the sale of intoxicating drinks.

They also adopted the following resolution in relation to petitions:—

Resolved, That we adopt the following form of petition to our next State Legislature; "We, the undersigned, citizens of the State of Wisconsin, respectfully ask your honorable body to enact a law prohibiting the manufacture, importation, sale or gift, of intoxicating drinks in the State; and to connect therewith such penalties and forfeitures as may be required to enforce said law."

TEMPERANCE IN MAINE.—The law passed by the last Legislature of Maine, making alcoholic beverages contraband, and requiring that they be seized and destroyed by the municipal authorities, appears to be working admirably. We copy the following paragraphs from a late Maine journal:—

There were five convictions week before last in the city of Portland, under the new liquor law. Two of the persons convicted were fined $10 and $3 costs, each. The fifth was a case where liquors were seized, and the person from whom they were taken was fined $20 and the liquors ordered to be destroyed.

About $1,400 worth of liquor was seized in Belfast on the 11th. The liquor was sent back to Boston. The owners, five in number, agreeing to pay all the costs, and coming under a promise to abandon the traffic. $100 worth was seized in Searsport and destroyed.

THE DEAF AND DUMB.—The Second Annual Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf and Dumb was held at Hartford, Ct., last week. A large number of delegates were present, including the principal teachers of the country. The subject of a High School or College for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb was extensively discussed—and it was finally disposed of by appointing a committee, with instructions to report at the next Convention on the points of expediency and feasibility; and, if the report be affirmative, with such practical suggestions for carrying the same into effect as they may deem advisable.

MISSIONARIES EXPELLED FROM VIRGINIA.—The people of Wythe County, Virginia, have commenced a crusade against the missionaries within their borders who are guilty of having been born at the North. It seems that one white man was recently murdered and another wounded by a negro; whereupon the citizens called a meeting and resolved to expel from South-western Virginia all pretended missionaries hailing from Free States, who have preached abolition doctrines.

METHODIST BISHOPS.—Two of the senior Bishops of the Methodist Church at the North are lying very sick, with but feeble prospects of recovery. Bishop Hedding is represented by a correspondent of the Christian Advocate as very weak, but cheerful, humble, and simple in manners, according to the primitive pattern of Methodist Bishops. Bishop Hamline is also very feeble, and expects to survive but a little time. His state of mind is what would be expected of him—perfect peace.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGES.—The Cumberland Presbyterians have now six Colleges in operation; one in Kentucky, two in Tennessee, one in Missouri, one in Ohio, and one in Pennsylvania. All except one have been established within the last eight years. Two others are proposed—one in Missouri and one in Texas, and two of their academies are soon to be enlarged into Colleges.

DR. JUDSON'S FAMILY.—Mrs. Judson, the wife of the Missionary, is expected soon to reach this country. She brings with her two of Mr. Judson's children by his second wife, and her own little daughter Emily. Three other children of Mr. Judson by his second wife have for several years been under the care of a sister of his first wife, residing in Massachusetts.

The Fugitive Slave Case at Buffalo.

Judge Conklin, before whom the case of Daniel, the fugitive slave recently arrested at Buffalo, was argued, at Auburn, has granted a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground of insufficient testimony. It seems that Daniel was employed on a steamboat, on board which vessel the arrest took place. The claimant proceeded on board with an officer, and stationed himself above a small hatchway, beneath which the negro was at his work. He then sent a message to summon the man, and with a stick of wood in his hand awaited the appearence of his victim. The moment that the man's head appeared so far above the hatchway as to give the desired opportunity, he struck him one full blow, which felled him instantly upon a stove in the cabin below, and then ran away. Before the victim could recover his footing, he was a prisoner in the Marshal's hands; and while he was bleeding and bewildered in consequence of this violence, the hearing took place which ended by consigning him to the tender mercies of this tyrant. When he reached the Commissioner's presence, and was called by name to stand up, "he was roused by his counsel—being throughout in a state of half stupor and wholly unable to communicate with his counsel from the effect of the wound upon his skull—and rose from his seat"! The counsel of this helpless creature moved, when the claimant's case was concluded, that the court should adjourn the defense, as the man was partially insensible. This request the Commissioner refused! Without farther parley, he decided that the case had been made out—that it was fully proven that the man owed service—that he had been identified by the son of his master, and "that nothing remained but to find, as he did find, that the man was a fugitive from slavery, and must be returned as such to his master in Kentucky."

P. S.—On Sabbath afternoon last, as we learn from the Buffalo Commercial, Daniel was brought before Judge Conklin on the writ of habeas corpus, and discharged. His friends had a carriage standing ready, in which he immediately took passage for Canada.

A Fugitive Slave Case in New York.

A fugitive slave case was before the courts in New York last week. It appears from the Evening Post, that about four years ago, a man, somewhat darker than the average of white men, but much less dark than many white men, came into this State and took up his residence at Poughkeepsie, in Dutchess county. He was then about twenty years of age, intelligent, industrious, and distinguished for his fine, manly appearance. He soon became established as a tailor, and prosecuted his trade with success in that city. About three months ago he married the sister of his partner in business, and everything in the future wore abundant promise of happiness and usefulness. The name of this man was John Bolding.

On Monday morning of last week a warrant was issued by U. S. Commissioner Brigham, for the arrest of Bolding, on the claim of Mr. Barnet Anderson, as a fugitive slave from Columbia, South Carolina. The warrant was promptly executed by the U. S. Marshal; the alledged fugitive was found at his work in a shop next door to the Eastern Hotel. Without having any opportunity of arranging his business, or of taking leave of his family, he was hurried off to a place of confinement, where he was detained until the whistle of the cars announced that the time of their departure had arrived. He was then run on board and locked, and was soon in the Tombs of New York.

The examination of the case continued each day through last week, and was ended on Second-day of the present week, by a verdict consigning the fugitive Bolding to bondage.

Massachusetts Railroads, &c.

The city authorities of Boston propose to celebrate, by a festival at Faneuil Hall, and other appropriate ceremonies, "the final completion of the great lines of railway uniting the tide-waters at Boston with the Canadas and the Great West; also the establishment of the American line of steamers between Boston and Liverpool." In making this announcement, the Mayor says:

"There are now completed and in operation, in Massachusetts alone, about 1,200 miles of railway, and in New-England 2,400 miles. Massachusetts alone has expended in the completion of these roads, the enormous amount of $54,000,000; and it appears from the reports of the several Railroad Corporations in this State, made to the last Legislature, that there were transported over the Massachusetts roads alone, during the year 1850, 9,500,000 passengers, and 2,500,000 tuns of freight. But this is not all. The several lines connecting us with the Canadas, Northern New-York, the Great Lakes and the Far-West, are now completed, uniting us by railroad and steam navigation with thirteen States of the Union, comprising an area of 428,795 square miles, the two Canadas, the Lakes with their 5,000 miles of coast, and bringing within our commercial sphere a population of ten millions of inhabitants. And if we look for a moment at the business of the Lakes and the Canadas, and observe its rapid yearly increase, we shall be still more astonished. It is estimated that the imports and exports of the Lake Harbors, exclusive of the Canadas, during the present year, will be 200 millions of dollars. The annual increase of this business is found to be 17½ per cent., thus doubling itself in less than six years. In addition to this, the imports and exports of the Canadas will amount, during the present year, to fifty millions of dollars."

EPISCOPAL MISSIONS IN CHINA.—Missionary Bishop Boone, of China, has recently made his Sixth Annual Report, which gives an encouraging account of the Missionary enterprise of that Church. Twelve Chinese have united with the Church during the year, one aged 40. The whole number baptized by these Missions is 32. Nine more are receiving special instruction as candidates for baptism. The communion is administered every month. A translation of the New Testament has been completed. Amicable relations have been established with the English Missionary Bishop, the Bishop of Victoria.

General Intelligence.

European News.

The steamer Asia, with Liverpool dates to Aug. 16—seven days later—arrived at New York on the evening of Aug. 28. The news is unimportant.

The Great Exhibition still attracts crowds of visitors, and the English papers are constrained to acknowledge the superiority of several American inventions, particularly of our Agricultural implements.

The Potato rot has made its appearance in Ireland, but not to such an extent as to excite much alarm.

The English Government finds the subjugation of the Kaffirs and Hottentots a hard job, and has made very little progress toward its accomplishment.

The Porte, it is said, has definitively determined to release Kossuth and his companions on the 1st of Sept.

In France, since the adjournment of the Assembly, the friends of Constitutional Revision have renewed the agitation of that subject. The question of the Presidency excites the deepest interest among all parties.

The Piedmontese Gazette quotes a letter from Padua, stating that a violent storm has destroyed about 10 houses and 30 huts at Mestrino; and Lissaro, in the Province of Vicenza, has had a similar visitation. Many lives have been lost, and a great number of houses, farms, &c., destroyed by the consequent inundation of the Brenta.

Several journals speak of a great conspiracy in Italy, the discovery of which led to the rigorous reinforcement of the state of siege in Lombardy and Venice. It appears that at the beginning of July a nobleman, who had long been suspected by Government, died suddenly of apoplexy. The Government commissioners, on affixing the seal to his papers, found a sealed packet, which contained a plan, signed by above one hundred conspirators, of a great and fearful revolt, the object of which was to assassinate the Emperor, as soon as he came to Italy, and to murder all the Austrian officers in one night in Venice. The conspirators found only one accomplice in Verona, twenty-five in Bresica, and the remainder in Bologna. It is said that they have all been arrested.

The Risorgimento of the 9th inst., says, the Great Criminal Court of Naples sentenced Gaetan Reale, guilty of having printed a book, entitled "The Martyrs of Cozeuza," to banishment during seven years; to be deprived of his license as printer during a year, and to pay costs.

The Great Criminal Court of Aquita sentenced Joseph Ferriot and Francis Corchiazzi, guilty of having sold a book entitled "Satan and the Jesuits," to imprisonment during seven months, to a fine of six ducats, and to costs.

The Athens journals contain further and sad accounts of the brigandage in different parts of the territory. It appears by The Courier d'Athenes that near Marathon a band of 12 brigands had pillaged two houses, and horribly tortured two women by pouring boiling oil into their bosoms. After this act the brigands approached nearer to the Capital, and on their way had a conflict with some gens d'armes, five of whom they wounded seriously. Near the forest of Achia, a party of travelers, twenty in number, were attacked by another band, and robbed of their money and effects, and three valuable horses; one of the travelers was wounded by a pistol ball. Near Lamia a band of brigands, under the orders of a notorious chief, named Chiriacon, were attacked by a party of mounted gens d'armes. Two of the brigands were killed, the rest made their escape. The gens d'armes had two horses killed.

The U. S. Mail Steamer Atlantic, Capt. West, arrived at New York on the 1st inst, bringing Liverpool dates to Aug. 20, four days later. The King of Denmark had a narrow escape on the 14th Aug., his horses having run away and broke up the carriage in which he was riding, but without injury to His Majesty. Besides this item we see nothing worth mentioning.

The Cuban Business.

The piratical attempt to revolutionize Cuba finds a good many supporters in the Southern part of the United States. Meetings have been held in several places, and the Spanish authorities denounced in unmeasured terms. At New Orleans a mob demolished the printing office of the Spanish paper, destroyed the desks and furniture of the Spanish Consul's office, burnt the Consul in effigy, and would probably have taken his life if he had not found refuge in the jail while their fury lasted. Companies are being formed, it is said, to proceed to Cuba and aid in the revolution, and some are reported to have gone already. Meanwhile the U. S. authorities are doing what they can to check the movement.

In regard to the operations and condition of Lopez on the Island there is no definite information, but rumors without number, with which we do not think it worth while to encumber our columns. The following paragraph, sent by telegraph from Baltimore to the N. Y. papers, and published on Second-day last, gives the most rational account we have seen of the circumstances leading to the arrest of the company whose execution we mentioned last week:—

"It appears from letters published in the New Orleans Picayune of the 23d August, that Col. Crittenden and one hundred and fourteen men were left at Bahia Honda by Lopez, in charge of the baggage, while Lopez himself advanced to Los Pozas. On the next day, 700 Spaniards landed from the Pizarro, and cut off Crittenden from his companions. Col. Crittenden made one attempt to rejoin his comrades, but was repulsed. The Spaniards afterwards made a charge, and completely routed Crittenden's little party, who spent two days and nights in the chapparels, without any sustenance. Fifty of them afterwards made their way to the sea-shore, where they found some boats, in which they embarked. They spent the night on the ocean, and next day were taken prisoners by the Habanero, as detailed in previous reports. There are still sixty-four of this party missing. Forty of them are known to have been shot in a small farm house; and a Spanish lieutenant reports that, on the 14th, he came upon twenty of them guarding an equal number of their wounded comrades, all of whom were massacred. It was reported, also, on Spanish authority, that the remaining twenty-four were afterward slaughtered."

Letters written by several of the victims on the morning of their execution, have been received at New Orleans, and made public. One of them says:—

"About 50 of us, Col. Crittenden's command, were taken prisoners yesterday—have not received our sentence yet, but no doubt we shall be shot before sunset. Lopez, the scoundrel, has deceived us; there is no doubt but all those reports about the Cubans rising were trumped up in New Orleans. Lopez took nearly his command and deserted us; we were attacked by some 500 or 700 of the Queen's troops the second day after we landed. Our own gallant Col. Crittenden done all that any man could do—but we saw we had been deceived, and retreated to the seashore with the intention of getting off to our own country if possible. Got three boats and got off with the intention of coasting until we fell in with an American vessel, and were taken prisoners by the steamboat Habanero."

Needle Manufactory.

The Newark Advertiser says that the only needle manufactory in this country is in that city—established by a gentleman from Manchester, England. The manner of making needles is described as very interesting—some sixteen different processes being necessary for their completion. The wire from which they are made is imported from England. It is cut into lengths sufficient for two needles each, and after being rubbed straight, they are pointed upon a stone, at the rate of one hundred per minute. They are then stamped with impressions preparatory for the eyes, which are punched by a press, at the rate of fifty a minute, and then strung upon wires and placed in another machine to be filed and fashioned into the forms of needles. The hardening is now done by a hot furnace and they are afterwards tempered, straightened and gathered into bunches of about 50,000 each, which are saturated with oil and emery, tied in a cloth and placed in a trough with a heavy plank moving backward and forward over them; so that after some nine days chafing in this manner, they are relieved of imperfections and rendered smooth enough for the final polishing. The temper is then taken out of the eyes, and they are drilled to prevent their cutting the thread.

New Feature in Trade.—The Buffalo Express mentions, as a new feature in trade, that "the first shipment of Corn from the Upper Mississippi, by the way of Chicago and Buffalo, to New-York, was made on the 13th of last June, from Fort Madison, Iowa, situated about 200 miles above the mouth of the Illinois river. At Fort Madison, about 7,000 bushels were shipped in bulk, on board the canal boats Indiana and Heonepin, and the balance in sacks on board steamer Kentucky, which took the canal boats in tow, and proceeded to La Salle, the terminus of the Illinois and Michigan Canal. At that point the cargo of the Kentucky was transferred to canal boats, and all brought to Chicago by canal. At Chicago it was shipped on board brig Fashion for Buffalo. The whole cost of transportation from Fort Madison to New-York, a distance of some 2,000 miles, was about 28c. per bushel."

Indian Treaty.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that by far the greatest event in the history of the North-west, in the last decade, has taken place this Summer, in the successful conclusion of a treaty between the Sioux or Dacota Indians, and the Commissioners appointed by the President of the United States. The amount of territory ceded to the United States is computed to be about 90,000 square miles—a tract of land nearly as large as the States of New-York and Pennsylvania together. The Government agrees to pay the Indians for these lands about $2,700,000. $400,000 of this money is to be paid down, and the remainder is to be placed at 5 per cent. interest, yielding them annually about $125,000, which sum will be paid for 50 years. All annuities are then to cease, and the principal revert to the Government.

N. Y. Asylum for Idiots.—Those intrusted with that duty are corresponding with gentlemen in various parts of the State, for the purpose of ascertaining the residences of persons proper to be placed in the Asylum for Idiots. The Allegany Advocate publishes a letter from Lieut. Gov. Church to Hon. E. E. Norton, soliciting his coöperation, and giving the following as the peculiarities of those to be admitted: 1. Male, under 12 years of age. 2. Not insane or deranged, but so imbecile in intellect as to be generally considered an idiot. 3. Of respectable parents, without the pecuniary ability already mentioned. 4. Free from any infectious disease, or great personal deformity. It is hoped that there will be a building furnished for the reception of the unfortunates as early as the 1st of October.

We were shown the other day, says the editor of the Literary Echo and Pawcatuck Advertiser, part of a cambric needle, which had just been taken from the wrist of Mrs. H. S. Berry. Some five weeks ago she stuck the needle (which was the part that had the eye on it, and consequently was quite blunt) into the palm of her hand, from which position it had worked through the metacarpal bones, coming out at the top of the wrist. The needle was about five-eighths of an inch in length. The most singular part of the circumstance is, that during the whole time the needle remained in her wrist, it did not disable her from doing her ordinary business, or even pain her in the least.

Died, at Worcester, Mass., July 15, Rev. Kazlitt Arvine, aged 31 years, a graduate of Yale College. Although contributing to various periodicals and papers, and for some time editor of the Free Missionary, he was most generally known as an author by his Cyclopedia of Moral and Religious Anecdotes.

Miss Bremer has made full preparation to publish a work containing her observations on America, to appear soon after her return to her own country. It will be translated into English by Mary Howitt, and will undoubtedly attract great attention.

SUMMARY.

The jewelers of Providence and vicinity, with their families, numbering about 1,000 in all, had a mammoth clam bake at Wyatt Point, Aug. 23. The bill of fare comprised the following: 54 bushels of clams; 150 dozen green corn; 500 lbs. fish, in chowders; 50 loaves of brown bread; 200 loaves of white bread; 200 lbs. butter; 1 bbl. crackers; 275 mince pies; 50 apple pies; 30 loaves cake; 1 bbl. of sugar was used in coffee; 6 bbls. of lemonade, &c.

It was announced a few days since, that the entire line of the Michigan Southern Railroad, from Munroe and Toledo on Lake Erie, to the Indiana State line, was completed and opened for travel. It is now opened, in connection with the Northern Indiana Road, to Bristol in Indiana, making a line of 137 miles from Lake Erie now in operation. It will be extended to South Bend, 23 miles further, within a few weeks, by the 10th of September proximo. These Roads will have 160 miles in operation from Lake Erie.

An intelligent merchant, not dealing in either corn or potatoes, writes as follows, from Western New-York: "If the appearance of the vines are any indication of the situation of the root, the Potatoes must be nearly a total loss in Western New-York. I trust it will not be the case; but one thing is certain, the vines are decaying fast. The weather, too, is quite too cool for the Corn crop, and I think that crop must be a light one in Western New-York, if not at the West."

The steamship Honda, recently built by Mr. Webb, at Greenpoint, Long Island, is now moored at a wharf in Brooklyn. She is the smallest steamer that has been fitted out at this port, being only one hundred and five feet in length, and one hundred and six tuns burden. She has one engine, and two masts, schooner rigged. She draws six feet of water, and is intended to run on the river Magdalena, New-Grenada.

Mrs. Davis, a colored woman, was recently arrested in Wilmington, Delaware, for a violation of the law passed at the last session of the Legislature of that State, forbidding the immigration of free colored persons. She was born in Delaware, and lived there 20 years, but living out of the State when the law was enacted, by her return she became liable to the penalty. She was fined $50, and is required to find security that she will leave the State.

A Cincinnati paper states that three years ago a poor orphan girl applied and was admitted to set type for that paper. She worked two years, during which time she earned, besides her board, about $200, and availing herself of the facilities which the printing office offered, acquired a good education. She is now an associate editress of a popular paper, and is engaged to be married to one of the smartest lawyers in Ohio.

During the year ending on the 30th of June, 1851, of the many dead letters transmitted by Deputy Postmasters to the General Post Office, upwards of ninety-eight thousand of them, we learn, had passed through the British Post Office, written from various countries in Europe, and directed to persons living in all parts of the United States. As the postage on them had been prepaid to England, they will be returned to the authorities of that nation.

Rev. H. J. Durbin (brother of Rev. Dr. John P. Durbin, of Philadelphia) died recently at Greensburg, Ia., from the effects of injuries received during the prevalence of a storm. He has been long and favorably known in Southern Indiana as a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, many years ago represented Switzerland County in the State Legislature, and was, at the time of his death, agent of the American Bible Society.

On the 22d ult. as Barnum's traveling Menagerie were performing at Glen's Falls, there came up a violent storm, accompanied by very high wind. The large Pavilion was prostrated and damaged to a considerable extent, frightening and severely, though not dangerously, injuring several persons. Through the energy of the managers, the ground was promptly cleared of the torn canvas, broken poles, &c., and after the shower the performances were continued.

The Editor of The Ploughman writes from Keene, N. H., that he has seen no symptoms of the potato rot on his journey hence. In the neighborhood of Portsmouth, N. H., on the contrary—a large potato-growing region—the vines are affected in many places. The Sleetville (Upper Canada) paper says of the crop in that vicinity—"It is as black as the ink with which we write."

At the Albany Post-Office, before the passage of the new Postage law, the average, number of letters mailed per day was 1,660, of which, on an average, there were prepaid 400, or about one quarter. Monday of last week there were mailed from that office 2,513, of which 964 were prepaid by stamps, and 665 by money, or about two-thirds. This is about the same ratio of paid and unpaid as prevails in the New-York office.

The Meiggs County (Ohio) Telegraph says, that Pomeroy has the greatest salt well yet discovered in the United States. The well discharges in an unbroken stream, fifty gallons of water per minute. The water will yield a bushel to each 50 gallons—a bushel a minute, or 240 bushels a day. There is water enough, making allowance for waste, for 200 bushels a day.

A drunken row took place among the Irish employed on the Buffalo and State Line Railroad in Brant, on Sunday last, during which several Irishmen, armed with clubs, cowardly attacked one singly, who, in self-defence, discharged a pistol at his assailants, killing one and fatally wounding another, who died on the following day—whereupon the assailed, then defenseless, was beaten until he was quite lifeless and almost a jelly.

Two young gentlemen in New York were a few evenings since trying the strength of their arms by clasping the right hand of each and resting the elbow on the counter, and then trying each to force the hand of the other down. In the struggle the arm of one was broken short off above the elbow, causing a report loud enough to be heard from one extreme of the saloon to the other.

A company has been organized for the construction of a Railroad across Staten Island. The Directors, thirteen in number, and mostly residents of the island, are gentlemen of means, energy and character. The amount necessary to secure the incorporation under the general law has been subscribed and paid in, and the proper certificate filed at Albany.

Bayard Taylor left Philadelphia last week for England, whence he will proceed by Vienna and Trieste to the Levant, and thence to the site of ancient Nineveh. Thence he hopes to make his way by the Desert and the Red Sea to Egypt, the Pyramids, the Cataracts, and, if life and health are spared him, to the sources of the Nile, or at least as far into the heart of Africa as any European traveler has penetrated from the North.

The Essex County (Mass.) Freeman says: "Mr. B. D. Hill, Jr., of South-Danvers, informs us that the tomatoes in that vicinity are being destroyed by a disease resembling the potato rot. As soon as the fruit becomes ripe, a speck appears upon the end of it, which spreads and immediately destroys the whole." The same disease has appeared in some of the tomatoes in Roxbury.

The Committee to make arrangements for the holding of the Pennsylvania State Agricultural Fair, on the 22d, 23d and 24th of October next, have selected the field of David Hummel, Esq., one mile above Harrisburg, for this purpose, and advertised for proposals to fence in 14 acres. They have engaged the tents used at the New-York Agricultual Fair.

DIED.

In Mount Bethel, N. J., on the 10th of August, of consumption, Miss Christian F. Randolph, aged about 30 years. She was a beloved member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Plainfield, N. J., and had been a teacher in the Sabbath School from its commencement. Her sickness was borne with exemplary patience, and her death was peaceful.

In Alfred, N. Y., August 27th, of billious pneumonia, Dr. John B. Collins, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. Dr. Collins was one of the early settlers of this town, having resided here more than thirty-two years. He was intimately acquainted with the history and condition of our country, and once represented our county in the lower branch of our State Legislature. He has also been justly esteemed one of the best physicans of the country, and will be greatly missed by his many employers as well as by the community at large. Every attention that could be bestowed was rendered by Drs. Hartshorn and Nye of our town, and Robinson of Almond. But all human skill was unavailing. His appointed time had evidently come, and he now sleeps with the numberless dead that have gone before him to that bourne "whence no traveler returns." N. V. Hull.

THE steamers ISAAC NEWTON, Capt. Wm. H. Peck, and HENDRIK HUDSON, Capt. A. P. St. John, forming the People's Line between New York and Albany, leaving foot of Cortland-st., New York, every evening at 6 o'clock, and Albany evening on the arrival of the Express Train from Buffalo.

The steamer NEW WORLD, Capt. Acker, leaves foot of Chambers-st., New York, every Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday morning, at 7 o'clock, and Albany on alternate days.

For passage or freight apply on board, or to A. P. Schultz at the office foot of Cortland-st.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH,
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Union Academy.

THE Academic Year of this Institution (located at Shiloh, N. J.) for 1851 and '52 will commence the first Wednesday in September, and continue forty-four weeks, including two vacations, of one week each, between terms.

The year is divided into three terms:

The First commencing Wednesday, September 3d, and ending Tuesday, December 9th.

The Second commencing Wednesday, December 17th, and ending Tuesday, March 23d.

The Third commencing Wednesday, March 31st, and ending Tuesday, July 6th.

Board of Instruction.

WM. C. WHITFORD, Principal,
And Teacher of the Classics, Natural Sciences, and higher Mathematics.

Miss RUTH R. HEMPHILL, Preceptress,
And Teacher of French, Painting, Drawing, and assistant in Mathematics.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks. Those intending to teach District Schools are solicited to become members of this department. Especial attention will be given to the common English branches, and to familiar lectures and discussions on School-Teaching.

During the Winter Term the Agricultural Department will be under the instruction of Prof. Gurdon Evans, A. M., and will embrace the study of the best authors, and daily recitations. Two hours each day will be spent in the Laboratory well furnished with apparatus and chemicals, where students will be instructed in the Elementary Analysis of Soils, Minerals, Ashes of Plants, &c., and the various modes of testing for their constituent elements. Also, a course of Public Lectures will be delivered on the application of Science to Agriculture, and illustrated by a great variety of philosophical and chemical experiments. The object of this course of instruction is to afford ample facilities for farmers to become scientific, as well as practical; and enable them to render waste and worn-out lands productive, and retain them constantly improving under a high state of cultivation.

In connection with classes, Courses of Lectures will be delivered, during the Fall Term, on Natural Philosophy and Elementary Chemistry; during the Winter Term on Astronomy and Physiology; during the Spring Term on Geology and Intellectual Science.

Tuition—from $3 50 to $5 00 per term, to be settled in advance, or by satisfactory arrangement. Extras—Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $6 00; Monochromatic, $3 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, (breakage extra,) $10 00.

Board in private families from $1 25 to $1 50 per week. Rooms can be obtained at a moderate expense.

Every care will be taken to render the school of the highest advantage to the student. The regulations will be few, but strictly and steadily enforced. Our object is at the same time we cultivate the intellectual and moral powers to develop also the practical.

Nothing sectarian will be taught or countenanced in the school. The exercises of the Institution will be suspended on the first and seventh days of each week.

LEWIS HOWELL, Pres. of the Board of Trus.

Also, there is to be elected a Justice for each of the six Judicial Districts, into which the City of New York is districted, pursuant to Chapter 514, Laws of 1851. Yours respectfully,

CHRISTOPHER MORGAN, Secretary of State.

Sheriff's Office, August 28, 1851.—I hereby certify that the above is a correct copy of the notice of the General Election, to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, received this day, from the Hon. Christopher Morgan, Secretary of State.

THOMAS CARNLEY,
Sheriff of the City and County of New York.

N. B.—All the public newspapers within this County will please publish this notice once in each week, until the Election, and send in their bills for advertising the same as soon as the Election is over; so that they may be laid before the Board of Supervisors and passed for payment. Sept. 4.

Miscellaneous.

"What shall be the End of these Things."

When another life is added
To the heaving, turbid mass;
When another breath of being
Stains Creation's tarnished glass;
When the first cry, weak and piteous,
Heralds long-enduring pain,
And a soul from non-existence
Springs, that ne'er can die again;
When the Mother's passionate welcome,
Sorrow-like, bursts forth in tears,
And the Sire's self-gratulation
Prophesies of future years—
It is well we cannot see
What the end shall be.

When across the infant features,
Trembles the faint dawn of mind;
When the heart looks from the windows
Of the eyes that were so blind;
When the incoherent murmurs
Syllable each swaddled thought,
To the fond ear all affection
With a boundless promise fraught,
Kindling great hopes for to-morrow
From that dull, uncertain ray,
As by glimmering of the Twilight,
Is foreshown the perfect Day—
It is well we cannot see
What the end shall be.

When the boy upon the threshold
Of his all-comprising home,
Puts aside the arm maternal
That enlocks him ere he roam;
When the canvas of his vessel
Flutters to the favoring gales,
Years of solitary exile
Hid behind its sunny sails;
When his pulses beat with ardor,
And his sinews stretch or toil,
And a hundred bold emprises
Lure him to that eastern soil—
It is well we cannot see
What the end shall be.

When the youth beside the maiden
Looks into her credulous eyes;
When the heart upon the surface
Shines too happy to be wise;
He by speeches less than gestures
Hinteth what her hopes expound,
Laying out the waste hereafter
Like enchanted garden ground;
He may falter—so do many;
She may suffer—so must all:
Both may yet, world-disappointed,
This lost hour of love recall—
It is well we cannot see
What the end shall be.

When the altar of religion
Greets the expectant bridal pair,
When the vow that lasts till dying
Vibrates on the sacred air;
When man's lavish protestations
Doubts of after-change defy,
Comforting the frailer spirit
Bound his servitor for aye;
When beneath Love's silver moonbeams
Many rocks in shadow sleep
Undiscovered, till possession
Shows the danger of the deep—
It is well we cannot see
What the end shall be.

Whatsoever is beginning
That is wrought by human skill,
Every daring emanation
Of the mind's ambitious will;
Every first impulse of passion,
Gush of love or twinge of hate;
Every launch upon the waters,
Wide-horizoned by our fate;
Every venture in the chances
Of Life's sad, oft desperate game,
Whatsoever be our motive,
Whatsoever be our aim—
It is well we cannot see
What the end shall be.

A New Motor.

The Cincinnati Atlas announces the discovery, by a Mr. Solomon, of a new motive power, which looks exceedingly promising on on paper, at least. The Atlas says:

"On Monday last, an engine was kept in operation during the day, and hundreds of spectators witnessed and were astonished at its success. The motive power is obtained by the generation and expansion, by heat, of carbonic acid gas. Common whiting, sulphuric acid and water, are used in generating this gas, and the "boiler" in which these component parts are held is similar in shape and size to a common bomb-shell. A small furnace, with a handfull of ignited charcoal, furnishes the requisite heat for propelling an engine of 25-horse power. The relative power of steam and carbonic acid is thus stated: Water at the boiling point gives a pressure of 15 lbs. to the square inch; with the addition of 30 degrees of heat the power is double, giving 30 lbs.; and so on, doubling with every addition of 30 degrees of heat, until we have 4,840 lbs., under a heat of 452 degrees—a heat which no engine can endure. But with the carbon, 20 degrees of heat above boiling point give 1,080 lbs.; 40 degrees give 2,160 lbs.; 80 degrees 4,320 lbs.—that is, 480 lbs. greater power with this gas than 451 degrees of heat give by converting water into steam. Not only does this invention multiply power indefinitely, but it reduces the expense to a merely nominal amount. The item of fuel for a first-class steamer between Cincinnati and New-Orleans, going and returning, is between $1,000 and $1,200; whereas $5 will furnish the material for propelling the same distance by carbon. Attached to the new engine is also an apparatus for condensing the gas after it has passed through the cylinders and returning it again to the starting place, thus using it over and over, and allowing none to escape. While the engine was in operation on Monday, it lifted a weight of 1,200 lbs. up the distance of five feet pependicular, five times every minute. The weight was put on by way of experiment, and does by no means indicate the full power of the engine. Mr. Solomon will immediately commence the construction of another engine on the same principle, of 350-horse power."

African Cotton.

Some fifty-odd years ago the first few bales of American Cotton were stopped at the Liverpool Custom-house, on the ground that they could not be the product of the United States. Now, our export of that staple exceeds in value the commerce in any other single article sent forth by any nation. A vaster structure has hardly ever risen from a smaller beginning.

A few weeks since, the weekly list of imports at the same port contained eight bales of Cotton from Monrovia, the capital town of Liberia, beside twenty bales from Natal. Who can say that this is not the beginning of a trade which, in time, may rival ours in its extent? The African soil and climate are more favorable to the production of Cotton, and it is said produce a better article more abundantly, than any that we have in America. We hear from Liberia that a great deal of land has been planted with this crop, and the same thing has been done at Sierra Leone. A missionary writes from there that native chiefs and others in the vicinity are procuring seed in considerable quantities, and that for the first time a native had just applied to him to buy a cotton gin. He is confident that, in a few years, Cotton will be extensively exported from the West Coast generally.

We trust the efforts making to accomplish this end may be crowned with success. Nothing could do so much to put a stop to the Slave trade, and lay the foundation of civilization in Africa, as the establishment of regular commerce to any considerable extent in some article of agricultural production. Cotton is decidedly the easiest and best thing to make a trial on. [N. Y. Tribune.

Indians of the North-West.

Correspondence of The N. Y. Tribune.

St. Paul, Wednesday, Aug. 6, 1851.

The anxiety of our people is now over. We consider Minnesota without doubt destined to be admitted into the Union within a very few years. Some millions of acres of the best country in the world was bargained for yesterday, or, rather, the treaty which has begun with the upper bands of the Dahcotas (or Sioux) was concluded with the lower bands, after the digestion of very many pounds of beef, the smoking of much tobacco, and the holding of sundry controversial "talks." The Indians on the Mississippi have made one treaty with the United States previous to this, some balances of which were unpaid thereon. This afforded them an opportunity for caviling and protracting the treaty, of which, notwithstanding the anxiety of the Commissioners for dispatch, they continued to avail themselves. You will gather some idea of the matter, as well as of the true character of Indian eloquence, by a speech of Little Crow, (which I will transcribe, as reported verbatim) and the replies of the Commissioners. Crow's village is six miles below St. Paul. He is reported to be one of the wisest and most eloquent of the nation; certainly, he is the most fluent and graceful speaker I have seen among them all, if there can be anything like grace in the actions of a man whose motions are restrained by his clothing, who has but one hand at liberty, the other being employed in clutching his blanket around his waist. After the council on Thursday was opened, as usual, smoking, Wabeshaw, who claims to be the Head Chief of the whole Dahcota nation, rose with dignity and said:—

Father! I have listened with attention to the words of the Great Father which you have spoken to us. I expect, my Father, that whatever these persons (looking around upon the Chiefs) have to say, they will say it. I will listen for the present to what may be said by them.

Afer a moment of silence, Little Crow rose, and letting his blanket drop from his shoulders around his hips, gathered it before in his left hand, leaving his right free for action.

My Father! these persons sitting around me have somewhat to say to you, and I am deputed to speak it. These Chiefs who are older than me, are either of them to be thought of as speakers rather than myself, but they say their mouths are closed. These Chiefs went to Washington some time since, (at the time of the last Treaty,) and brought back a good report, which was gladly heard by the men, women and children of our nation. But it has not taken place as promised. Therefore these men sit still and say nothing; perhaps they are ashamed to speak. But you, Fathers, are the cause of it. They spoke of some money that was promised and is due them, and made mention of it the other day. Gov. Ramsay spoke also of this money at the first Council but they have not yet seen the money; they wish to see it laid down. We thought that this money due upon the old Treaty would have been paid, and that a new Treaty would not be spoken of until it was paid over.

Col. Lea—We have listened attentively to the words which "Little Crow" has spoken. I have read the Treaty to which he alludes, and I find that the money which he speaks of, was to be expended at the discretion of the President. He thought it should be employed in educating the children of the Dhacotas. They thought differently, and thus a misunderstanding has arisen in regard to this money between the Dahcotas and their Great Father. He did not wish to keep back any of the moneys due them. But as the Dhacotas would not have it expended as he desired, there has as yet been nothing done with this money, which has been accumulating for some years. They all rose from a difference of opinion in regard to the Treaty. We wish now to make a Treaty with you, in which there can be no misunderstanding, and as I stated on Monday, if we can come to a conclusion upon the more important subjects now before us, this money matter shall be arranged in a manner no doubt satisfactory to you.

Gov. Ramsey—If this Treaty can be satisfactorily arranged, as much money shall be paid you as you have heretofore received in three years, and it shall be paid out equally among men, women and children, or otherwise if you desire it. Before we can get this money ready, however, we may as well discuss the other matters pertinent to this present Treaty.

Little Crow, (with some excitement.)—We will talk about this money and nothing else, until next Spring, if we do not get it.

Mr. Ramsey—You may talk about money, but you must remember that $30,000 is a large sum, and it takes time to get so many boxes of money ready and arranged for payment. You cannot be very much in want of the money, or you would go on with this treaty, being assured that at the conclusion of it, it will be paid you. If you do really want it so badly, you know the most ready way of obtaining it.

Col. Lea—Do you suppose that your Great Father at Washington is so destitute of men of truth around him that he would send you a liar? Do you think Gov. Ramsey would speak falsley to you? I tell you that his tongue and mine are strait and truthful; that what we have said and may say to you is spoken in truth and friendship, and may be relied upon. We tell you that this money shall be paid you as soon as this treaty is made. If you make and sign a treaty today, to-morrow the money shall be paid you. But if you have not confidence in our words, there is no further necessity of holding council. We have made known our proposition to you and will have the interpreter repeat them to you, if you will; if not, the Council will now adjourn.

The Council did adjourn, but after three or four more days passed in talk and eating, they finally concluded a treaty, which provides as follows:

That there be perpetual peace between these Indians and the United States; that they cede all of their lands, but have a reservation for a home; that the United States pay them the sum of $1,410,000; that the Chiefs receive $220,000 on the ratification of this treaty; that they receive $30,000 for the establishment of school-houses and other buildings; that the remaining sum remain in trust with the United States, at five per cent. for 42 years, and that the principal then revert to the United States. That they receive the following annuities:—$12,000 Agricultural Fund; $6,000 Educational Fund, $10,000 in Goods and Provisions; $30,000 in cash. The money left to be expended by the provisions of the old treaty at the discretion of the President, is by this made payable in cash.

Rules to be Observed in an Editor's Sanctum.

1. Come in at all times—what business has he to be private?

2. Take his papers with perfect freedom—what use can he have for them?

3. If you bring in a long communication, just "to fill up his paper," insist on reading and discussing it. Why shouldn't he be glad to spend an hour in listening?

4. If you see his exchanges piled up in an orderly manner on his table seize and scatter them. What business has he to be particular?

5. If you find his chair vacant at any time, sit in it. Why should he wish to keep his stationery and scissoring from his visitors?

6. If you can't get that chair, though there are a dozen others in the sanctum, be sure to sit on a table and put your feet on another. If you can't practice such freedoms in an editor's room, where can you do it?

7. If you see the editor particularly engaged in writing a "leader," talk to him as industriously as you can. Will he not be gratified to hear you? Of course he will.

[Benjamin Franklin.

Science in Agriculture.

A specimen of soil of good appearance was given to Sir Humphrey Davy, from Lincolnshire, in England, as remarkable for sterility. On analyzing it he found sulphate of iron. He recommended a top-dressing of lime; and the sulphate of iron was forthwith converted into the sulphate of lime; a noxious substance was at once changed into an element of fertility. It was the boast of Franklin, that he had stripped lightning of its perils and had chained the thunderbolt. Chemistry does more. Poisons are changed by its alchemy into the means of subsistence.

The Hon. Reverdy Johnson purchased, in 1849, a small farm, near Baltimore, in the last stage of impoverishment. Such was its reduced condition that the last crop of corn was not more than one peck to the acre. He states that all the vegetable matter growing on the two hundred acres of cleared land, including briars, sassafras, and other bushes, if carefully collected, would have been insufficient for the manufacture of one four-horse wagon load of manure. He applied to Dr. David Stewart of Baltimore, an able chemist, who rode out to the farm and procured specimens of the soil, which he carefully analyzed. He found that it contained an abundance of lime, potash, magnesia, iron and organic matter, duly mixed with alumina and sand. On element of a fertle soil was wanting, phosephoric acid; and of this, there was no trace. He recommended an application to the soil of the biphosphate of lime, a preparation of bones, as the best mode of supplying the deficient element. The remedy was given at the expense of ten dollars per acre. It was the one thing needful. Health was restored to the exhausted patient, and the grateful soil yielded last year twenty-nine bushels of wheat per acre to the proprietor. Nothing else was applied, indeed nothing else was wanting. Here was a beautiful triumph of science. There is no doubt about the facts; the experiment came under our observation and attracted the attention of hundreds. It was detailed to the writer by Mr. Johnson himself, and various others worthy of perfect reliance. It has been made known to the country in the American Farmer.

In each of these cases, a mere practical farmer would have groped his way in the dark, ready to be led away by any ignis fatuus, in his efforts to find some means of improvement. He might have applied lime or stable manure. The first would have been worthless, if not injurious, and the second would have given no result commensurate with the expense. The same is probably true of guano, for though the best specimens contain as much as twenty-two per cent. of phosphates, yet the expenditure would have been out of porportion to the result, if enough had been applied to give a sufficiency of phosphoric acid.

Indian Skill and Ingenuity.

By the courtsey of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, says the editor of the National Intelligencer, we were shown some specimens of needlework and embroidery, brought by him to Washington from his just concluded mission to Minnesota and the Northwest, of surpassing beauty and workman, or workwomanship, we don't know which. Three table covers were exhibited to us so admirably embroidered by the Tonowanda Indians, that, in point of chasteness of design, close imitation of natural leaf and fruitage, and minuteness of finish, we should think have never been excelled by any people, however skillful in these arts. They were intended, we are told, for exhibition at the World's Fair in London, but were commenced too late to be ready in time. No doubt the destination they have reached is quite as good, if not a better one, than that originally meditated. What makes this work the more difficult, and yet the more beautiful and valuable, because never liable to fade, is the fact that the material of these embroideries is moose-hair, a substance not easly managed, though almost indestructible in itself.

We also saw ladies' moccasins of various styles and patterns, and of a taste in cut and embellishment equal to anything of Parisian orgin. It surprised us to be told that they were the work of North American Indians.

Besides these articles of vertu, we found the Commissioner's table set out with sundry Sioux calumets, constructed from the beautiful morone-colored pipe-stone of western Iowa, a mineral, by the way, justly prized by the Indians, and which will one day be a matter of some national interest. Fan-like insignia of savage prowess, various costumes, tipped eagles' feathers, each of such and such scalp-value—according as it records the destruction of man, woman, or child—are among the pledges thus brought of the Indian's disposition to be at lasting peace with his white brethren. The accession thus made to the cabinet of curiosities of the Indian Bureau will attract much interest.

Administration of Justice in Rome.

From the London Times.

Rome is at present governed by a bishop and priest who derive their material power from French bayonets and Austrian guaranteers. Into the several departments of this administration we forbear from entering at present, as our narrative applies solely to one of them—the distribution of justice. Arrests are made at Rome, as in other countries, upon information, and the accused person is allowed to defend himself by counsel, but the advocate must be approved by the Judge, who may substitute at pleasure a nominee of his own. The prisoner is served with what we term a copy of the indictment, but he is not confronted either with his accuser or with the impreaching witnesses, and the case is dispatched in secret. Under these conditions of trial it may be reasonable expected that convictions frequently ensue, and the convict undergoes or awaits his sentence in abodes of the description following:

The Roman jails are divided into cells of between 7 and 8 feet square, or, as it may be disirable to state the exact proportions, of 8 feet 11 inches in length, 7 feet 7 in. in breadth, and 7 feet 10 in. in hight. In each of these are shut two prisoners, who are thus placed on an allowance of air little greater than that required for the consumption of one. But this seperate incarceration is a privilege to be earned only by formidable guilt or purchased by considerable bribes. For the common class of prisoners their is a common room, where they lie day and night, like negroes in a slave ship, on straw too foul for a stable. On provocation given or assumed the jailor has the power of inflicting severe flogging, or of attaching to the legs of his victims a weight of iron so great as almost to incapacitate them from moving. Besides these apartments there are others designed to hold ten prisoners each, but for which twenty is now considered a fitter complement, and in these the single window is so high from the ground that the inmates can only obtain a breath of air by mounting upon each other's shoulders in turn. Once a month only is any visit allowed from friends or relatives, and then in the presence of the jailors and with a double iron grating intervening. We have confined ourselves to a simple statement of facts without any comment, but the reader will probably not be surprised when we add, that within the space of a few days, as credibly reported, six prisoners had died of starvation, two had been put in irons for attempting suicide, and two had been carried raving to a mad-house. Even this, however, is but an imperfect sketch of the horrors prevailing. So frightful are the practices of these rooms, where the very vilest of desperadoes are herded together without any effectual supervision, that the political prisoners are glad to provoke solitary confinement by any breach of discipline.

Redeeming an Author.

Dr. Johnson used to relate with infinite humor the circumstances of his rescuing Goldsmith from a ridiculous dilemma by the purchase-money of his "Vicar of Wakefield," which he sold on his behalf to Dodsley, a London publisher, and, it is thought, for the sum of ten pounds only. He had run up a debt of some few pounds with his landlady for board and lodging, and was at his wife's end how to wipe off the score and keep a roof over his head except by closing with a very staggering proposal on her part, and taking his creditor to wife, whose charms were very far from alluring, whilst her demands were extremely urgent. In this crisis of his fate he was found by Johnson in the act of meditating on the melancholy alternative before him. He showded Johnson his manuscript of "The Vicar of Wakefield," but seemed to be without any plan or even hope of raising money upon the disposal of it. When Johnson cast his eye upon it, he discovered something that gave him hope, and immediately took it to Dodsley, who paid down the price above-mentioned, in ready money, and added an eventual condition upon its future sale. Johnson described the precautions he took in concealing the amount of the sum he had in hand, which he prudently administered to him by a guinea at a time. In the event he paid off the landlady's score, and redeemed the person of his friend from her clutches.

Incombustible Gas.—On Thursday, says The Newark Daily, Mr. C. Dowden of this city made an experiment with an incombustible gas for putting out fire. He filled a barrel, open at both ends, to about one half its capacity, with tar, dry shavings, and other combustible materials, and when ignited, and in full blaze, a few sheets of common wrapping paper, saturated with the gaseous preparation, was put under the barrel, and the flame was extinguished in a few seconds, leaving nothing but a smoke produced by the gas, mixed with a small portion of smoke of the fire. To those standing in close proximity it was found innoxious. This experiment was several times repeated with like results. The barrel was then removed, leaving the combustibles in a heap upon the ground, which were fired, and when fully ignited and in a blaze, Mr. D. applied the gaseous paper, and it was instantly extinguished, leaving nothing but the smoke referred to above. The philosophy of the thing, according to Mr. Dowden, is this: The gas used is incombustible, and flames cannot exist in it, or even where there is any considerable portion of it. Hence he supposes that the correct mode of using any incombustible gas is to put out the flame of a burning building, and when the flame is stopped a very small quantity of water will reduce the temperature of the cinders below the burning point. Mr. D. considers this process of extinguishing flame a discovery by himself accidentally made. He intends to make other experiments on the subject.

Indiana and the People of Color.—The Albany Register, speaking of the provisions of the new Constitution of Indiana in relation to the colored people, says:

"We are inclined to think these provisions are in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and that Indiana cannot exclude the free colored 'citizens' of New-York from her borders. Some such idea seems to have haunted the minds of the Indiana Convention, and, therefore, instead of imposing penalties on the negroes, they make all contracts which the whites may enter into, with them void, and fine those who employ or encourage them to remain in that State. But that is hardly allowing to 'the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States,' as required by the Constitution of the Union. If we are correct in this, then the Constitution of Indiana is obnoxious to the same objections as the laws of South-Carolina, which exclude free blacks, or the laws of Vermont, which attempt to annul the jurisdiction of the United States Courts and authorities, and transfer the same to State tribunals. We have been surprised to find this Indiana 'outrage' so tamely and quietly submitted to. Scarce a murmur has been breathed against it."

Extraordinary Gardening.—A letter from Paris, in The Boston Atlas, says: "A gardener near the Jardin des Plantes, has the good fortune to collect the aristocracy in his green-houses, this week—you see the gardeners are in full tide to fortune now—for he appears to possess one of Moses's gifts. In the middle of one of the borders of his garden are several dahlia stalks and rose-bushes, covered with leaves, but without a single blossom, or even buds; after you have closely examined these plants, the gardener takes a watering-pot, filled with liquid composition, waters the plants, and then covers them with a glass and asks you to look at them. In a minute you see the plant in travail, a bud is formed, it expands, it becomes a flower—all in ten minutes. Cut the flower, and it appears as perfect as if it had been nurtured by the sun. Nor is this all. In an adjoining bed he has cherry-trees covered with leaves; he performs the same operation I have just recounted, and in eight minutes you have a plateful of ripe cherries."

Harlem as it Was.—Harlem (the upper part of New York) was founded for the amusement and recreation of the citizens, in 1658. We find in the ancient Dutch Records that "the Governor and Council, desirous to form a new village at the end of Manhattan Island, proposed to settlers grants of land of 45 acres each, at 13 shillings the acre, free from tithes for ten years, and to assign fifteen soldiers for their defence—to erect a sub-court of Justice, when there should be 25 families established—to provide a clergyman, half of whose salary should be paid by the Government, and to make a road to the City by the Company's negroes."

Effects of Alcohol.—The Medina (Ohio) Citizen is responsible for the following:

"We understand that about one hundred and fifty of the two thousand hogs belonging to the Oak Orchard distillery, when it was burnt a few days since, partook of the fire-water as it came flowing into their styes; and as a consequence got drunk. Three of the number died in the ditch. The fish in Oak Orchard creek were still more unfortunate. The fatal liquid mingled with their own pure element, and they drank and died by thousands. Oak Orchard creek was converted literally into a stream of death."

Getting a Wedding Coat.—Among the anecdotes detailed by Dr. Bushnell, in his sermon at Litchfield, illustrative of the Age of Homespun, was one which deserves to be told by itself, and better than we can repeat it. One of the aged divines of that county, still living' was married during the Revolution, but under singular difficulties. There was an obstacle to the wedding that seemed insurmountable. He had no wedding coat, nor was wool to be had to make one, and it was in the dead of Winter. Yet all parties were ready, and he was anxious to be married without delay. At last the mother of the intended bride discovered the difficulty, and promptly had some of her sheep shorn and sewed up in blankets, to keep them warm, while of the wool she spun and wove a coat for her reverand son-in-law. [Boston Commonwealth.

Guilt and Shame—An Allegory.—"Guilt and Shame," says the allegory, "were at first companions, and in the beginning of their journey inseparably kept together. But their union was soon found to be disagreeable and inconvenient to both; Guilt gave Shame frequent uneasiness, and Shame often betrayed the secret conspiracies of Guilt. After long disagreement, therefore, they at length consented to part for ever. Guilt boldly walked forward alone to overtake Fate, that went before in the shape of an executioner; but Shame being naturally timorous, returned back to keep company with Virtue, which, in the beginning of their journey, they had left behind. Thus, my children, after men have traveled through a few stages in vice, Shame forsakes them, and returns back to wait upon the few virtues they have still remaining."

Variety.

The leading Daguerrians of New York city are organizing an Association, to be composed exclusively of photographists, which shall have for its object the advancement of the Daguerreotype art. Its members are to contribute certain fees and dues for the purpose of raising a fund, which is to be appropriated to the encouragement and purchase of all discoveries and improvements connected with photography; and these are to be held and shared in common by the members of the Society, and no others.

The Saco Union, published at Saco, Me., says that in the trial of Nathaniel Seavey, of that place, for a violation of the license law, Judge Green, referring to the evidence brough, foward, and the manner in which it was obt tained, decided that on the principles of "morality, philanthropy and philosophy," the Government had failed to make out their case, and ordered the prisoner discharged, the witness having admitted in his testimony that he bought the liquor for the purpose of making proof against him.

We learn from The New-Bedford Mercury, that Mr. James Robinson, of that city, recently discovered in Fairhaven, near the fort, a large stone of very remarkable formation, specimens of which he has sent to several distinguished geologists. Professor Hitchcock, of Amherst, says the rock is coarse porphyritic granite. It contains large and perfect crystals of feldspar, a portion of which is graphic granite, which is remarkable.

The construction of two powerful engines has been commenced at the Morgan Iron works for a line of steamers in connection with the Erie Railroad at Dunkirk and the Northern Indiana and Southern Michigan Railroad. These engines will have 72-inch cylinders and 12-feet stroke of piston, or a propelling power surpassing that of some of our large steamships. They are to be completed by the 1st of May next.

Central Railroad of New Jersey.

Summer Arrangements, commencing Monday, March 31, 1851.

THIS Road extends from ELIZABETHPORT, 35 miles, to WHITE HOUSE, N J, reducing the staging between the terminus of the Road and EASTON to 25 miles.

This line leaves New York by steamboat Red Jacket from pier No 1 North River, and connects with trains on the New Jersey Railroad, which leaves New York from foot of Cortland-st.

TRINS UP—Leave New York by steamboat Red Jacket, pier No 1 North River, at 9 A M, passenger; 1 P M, freight; and 5 P M, passenger; and by N J Railroad, foot of Cortland-st, at 9 A M, and 2 and 5¼ P M.

Trains leave White House and following places for New York as follows:

White House at 3½ A M, freight; 5 40 A M, passenger, at 1 40 P M.

Somerville at 4 30 A M, freight; at 6 05 A M, passenger, at 2 05 P M.

Bound Brook at 4 50 A M, freight; at 6 15 A M, passenger, at 2 15 P M.

Plainfield at 5 20 A M, freight; at 6 35 A M, passenger, at 2 35 P M.

Westfield at 5 50 A M, freight; at 6 50 A M, passenger, at 2 50 P M.

Elizabethtown at 7 15 A M; freight at 10 30 A M; passenger at 3 15 P M.

Elizabethport at 7 30 A M; freight at 10 45 A M; passenger at 3 30 P M.

On Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, trains leave Somerville for Pespack, Lesser Cross-Roads, and Pluckamin.

STAGES will be in readiness on the arrival of the 9 A M train from New York at the White House to convey passengers to Easton, Wilkesbarre, Bethlehem, Allentown, and Mauch Chunk, Penn, and to Clinton, Flemington, Lebanon, Milford, and Belvidere, N J.

The Christian Review.

THE removal of this Quarterly to New York more than a year since, and its elevation in character, the Publishers are happy to say, have greatly increased its circulation. Seeing this readiness to appreciate and patronize their efforts, they are determined to spare no pains or expense in raising the work to the highest point of excellence, every way worthy of its position in the metropolis of the nation, and as the organ of one of the most numerous and respectable denominations in the land.

TERMS.

For a single copy, three dollars per annum. No subscriptions received for less than a volume commencing with the Jan. No. of each year.

Every person forwarding the subscription price of four copies, shall receive a fifth copy gratis.

POSTAGE PRE-PAID.

When paid in advance, the postage will be pre-paid by the Publishers; or, the postage will be pre-paid on all numbers issued after the payment of the subscription.

☞ NEW POSTAGE LAW. ☜

This offer of pre-payment of postage is of more importance in consequence of the new law. The postage under 500 miles is the same as before; over 500 and under 1,500 miles the postage will be double; over 1,500 and under 2,500 miles, treble; and over 2,500 and 3,500, quadruple.

☞ If, however, the postage is pre-paid it is only one-half the above rates.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

This periodical has at last taken its true position. It will now challenge comparison with the best religious Reviews—proving that the Baptists have intellectual power and diversity enough to maintain a denominational Quarterly of the highest standard.
[Watchman and Reflector.

In tasteful and correct mechanical execution the "Review" is not surpassed by any of the Quarterlies. . . . Every minister should have it; and we wonder that more of our lay brethren, of educated mind, literary taste, and pecuniary ability, do not subscribe.
[Michigan Christian Herald.

This is one of the best Quarterlies in the United States, and may, in fact, be regarded as a model of its kind. [Western Literary Messenger.

THE ENGLISH.

The last of Horace Greeley's "Glances at Europe."

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Aug. 6, 1851.

I do not wholly like these cold and stately English, yet I think I am not blind to their many sterling qualities. The greatness of England, it is quite confidently asserted, is based upon her conquests and plunderings—on her immense Commerce and unlimited Foreign Possessions. I think otherwise. The English have qualities which would have rendered them wealthy and powerful though they had been located in the center of Asia instead of on the western coast of Europe. I do not say that these qualities could have been developed in Central Asia, but if they had been, they would have insured to their possessors a commanding position. Personally, the English do not attract or shine, but collectively they are a race to make their mark on the destinies of mankind.

In the first place, they are emphatically industrious. I have seen no country in which the proportion of idlers is smaller. I think American labor is more efficient, day to day, hour to hour, than British; but we have the larger proportion of non-producers—petty clerks in the small towns, men who live by their wits, loungers about bar-rooms, &c. There is here a small class of wealthy idlers (not embracing nearly all the wealthy, nor of the aristocracy, by any means,) and a more numerous class of idle paupers or criminals; but work is the general rule, and the idlers are but a small proportion of the whole population. Great Britain is full of wealth, not entirely but mainly because her people are constantly producing. All that she has plundered in a century does not equal the new wealth produced by her people every year.

The English are eminently devotees of Method and Economy. I never saw the rule, 'A place for everything, and everything in its place.' so well observed as here. The reckless and the prodigal are found here as everywhere else, but they are marked exceptions. Nine-tenths of those who have a competence know what income they have, and are careful not to spend more. A dutchess will say to a mere acquaintance, 'I cannot afford' a proposed outlay—an avowal rarely and reluctantly made by an American, even in moderate circumstances. She means simply that other demands upon her income are such as to forbid the contemplated expenditure, though she could of course afford this if she did not deem those of prior consequence. No Englishman is ashamed to be economical, or to have it known that he is so. Whether his annual expenditure be fifty pounds or fifty thousand, he tries to get his money's worth. I have been admonished and instructed by the systematic economy which is practiced even in great houses. You never see a lighted candle set down carelessly and left to burn an hour or two to no purpose, as is so common with us; if you leave one burning, some one speedily comes and quietly extinguishes the flame. Said a friend: "You never see any paper in the streets here as you do in New York, (swept out of the stores, &c.,) the English throw away nothing." We speak of the vast parks and lawns of the aristocracy as so much land taken out of use and devoted to mere ostentation; but all the land is growing timber or furnishing pasturage—often both. The owner gratifies his taste or his pride by reserving it from cultivation, but he does not forget the main chance. So of his fisheries and even game preserves. Of course, there are noblemen who would scorn to sell their venison or partridges; but game is abundant in the hotels and refectories—too much so for half of it to have been obtained by poaching. Few whose estates might yield them ten thousand a year are content with nine thousand.

The English are eminently a practical people. They have a living faith in the potency of the Horse-Guards, and in the maxim that 'Safe bind is sure find.' They have a sincere affection for roast beef. They are quite sure 'the mob' will do no harm if it is vigilantly watched and thoroughly overawed. Their obstreperous loyalty might seem inconsistent with this unideal character, but it is only seeming. When the portly and well-to-do Briton vociferates 'God save the Queen!' with intense enthusiasm, he means 'God save my estates, my rents, my shares, my consols, my expectations.' The fervor of an Englishman's loyalty is usually in a direct ratio with the extent of his material possessions. The poor like the Queen personally, and like to gaze at royal pageantry; but they are not fanatically loyal. One who has seen Gen. Jackson or Henry Clay publicly enter New York or any other city, finds it hard to realize that the acclamations accorded on like occasions to Queen Victoria can really be deemed enthusiastic.

Gravity is a prominent feature in the English character. A hundred Englishmen of any class, forgethered for any purpose of conference or recreation, will have less merriment in the course of their sitting than a score of Frenchmen or Americans would have in a similar time. Hence it is generally remarked that the English of almost any class show to least advantage when attempting to enjoy themselves. They are as awkward at a frolic as a bear at a dance. Their manner of expressing themselves is literal and prosaic; the American tendency to hyperbole and exaggeration grates harshly on their ears. They can only account for it by a presumption of ill breeding on the part of the utterer. Forward lads and 'fast' people are scarce and uncurrent here. A Western 'screamer,' eager to fight or drink, to run horses or shoot for a wager, and boasting that he had 'the prettiest sister, the likeliest wife, and the ugliest dog in all Kentuck,' would be no where else so out of place and incomprehensible as in this country, no matter in what circle of society.

—The Women of England, of whatever rank, studiously avoid peculiarities of dress or manner and repress idiosyncrasies of character. No where else that I have ever been could so keen an observer as Pope have written:

> 'Nothing so true as what you once let fall;
> Most women have no characters at all.'

Each essays to think, appear and speak as nearly according to the orthodox standard of womanhood as possible. Hardly one who has any reputation to save could tolerate the idea of attending a Woman's Rights Convention or appearing in a Bloomer any more than that of standing on her head in the Haymarket or walking a tight rope across the pit of Drury Lane. So far as I can judge, the ideas which underlie the Woman's Rights movement are not merely repugnant but utterly inconceivable to the great mass of English women, the last Westminster Review to the contrary notwithstanding.

I do not judge whether they are better or worse for this. Their conversation is certainly tamer and less piquant than that of the American or the French ladies. I think it evinces a less profound and varied culture than that of their German sisters; but none will deny them the possession of sterling and amiable qualities. Their physical development is unsurpassed, and for good reasons—their climate is mild, and they take more exercise than our women do. Their fullness of bust is a topic of general admiration among the foreigners now so plentiful in England, and their complexions are marvelously fair and delicate. Except by a very few in Ireland, I have not seen them equaled. And, on the whole, I do not know that there are better mothers than the English, especially of the middle classes.

—I did not find the Aristocracy so remarkable for physical perfection and beauty as I had been taught to expect. Some of them are large, well formed, and vigorous; but I think the caste is not noticeably so. Among the ladies of 'gentle blood,' however, there is more of the asserted aristocratic symmetry and beauty than among the men.

—The general stiffness of English manners has often been noted. Not that a gentleman is aught but a gentleman any where, but courtesy is certainly not the Englishman's best point. No where else will a perplexed stranger inquiring his way receive more surly answers or oftener be refused any answer at all than in London. Even the policeman, who is paid to direct you, replies to your inquiry with the shortest and gruffest monosyllable that will do. Awkwardness of manner pervades all classes; the least elaborate and most thoroughly natural, modest, and easy-mannered man I met with was a Duke, whose ancestors had been Dukes for many generations; but some of the most elaborately ill bred men I met also inherited titles of nobility. And, while I have been thrown into the company of Englishmen of all ranks who were cordial, kind, and every way models of good breeding, I have also met here more constitutionally arrogant and unbearable persons than had crossed my path in all my previous experience. These, too, are found in all ranks, I think the military service exhibits some of the worst specimens. But Bull in authority any where is apt to exhibit his horns to those whom he suspects of being nobodies. Elevation is unpropitious to the display of his more amiable qualities.

—I have elsewhere spoken of the indifferent figure made by most Englishmen at public speaking. Many of them say good things; hardly one delivers them aptly or gracefully. Any Frenchman having Lord Granville's brains would make a great deal more out of them in a speech. I attribute this national defect to two causes; first, the habitually prosaic level of British thought and conversation; next, the intense pride which is also a national characteristic. John is called out at a festive gathering, and springs to his feet really intending to be clever. But the next moment the thought strikes him—"This is beneath my dignity, after all. Why should I subject myself to miscellaneous criticism? Why put myself on the verdict of this crowd? Does it become a gentleman of my standing to fish for their plaudits? What will success amount to, if attained?" Or else he criticises his own thoughts and meditated forms of expression, pronounces them tame, trite, or feeble, and recoils from their enunciation as unworthy of his abilities, position, and reputation. The result is the same in either case —he hesitates, blunders, chokes, and finally stammers out a few sentences and subsides into his seat, sweating at every pore, red-faced with chagrin, vexed with himself and every body else on account of his failure, which might not have occurred, and certainly would not have been so palpable, had his self-consciousness been less diseased and extravagant.

I have said that the British are not in manner a winning people. Their self-conceit is the principal reason. They have solid and excellent qualities, but their self-complacency is exorbitant and unparalleled. The majority are not content with esteeming Marlborough and Wellington the greatest Generals and Nelson the first Admiral the world ever saw, but claim a like supremacy for their countrymen in every field of human effort. They deem machinery and manufactures, railroads and steamboats, essentially British products. They regard morality and philanthropy as in effect peculiar to "the fast anchored isle," and liberty as an idea uncomprehended, certainly unrealized, any where else. They are horror-stricken at the toleration of slavery in the United States, in seeming ignorance that our Congress has no power to abolish it, and that their Parliament, which had ample power, refused to exercise it through generations down to the last quarter of a century. They cannot even consent to go to heaven on a road common to other nations, but must seek admission through a private gate of their own, stoutly maintaining that their local church is the very one founded by the Apostles, and that all others are more or less apostate and schismatic. Other nations have their weak points—the French, glory; the Spaniards, orthodoxy; the Yankees, rapacity; but Bull plunders India and murders Ireland, yet deems himself the mirror of beneficence and feeds his self-righteousness by resolving not to fellowship slaveholders of a different fashion from himself; he is perpetually fighting and extending his possessions all over the globe, yet wondering that French and Russian ambition will keep the world always in hot water. Our Yankee self-conceit and self-laudation are immoderate; but nobody else is so perfect on all points—himself being the judge—as Bull.

* * * * *

—Yet the better qualities in the English character decidedly preponderate. Naturally, this people love justice, manly dealing, fair play; and though I think the shop-keeping attitude is unfavorable to this tendency, it has not effaced it. The English have too much pride to be tricky or shabby, even in the essentially corrupting relation of buyer and seller. And the Englishman who may be repulsive in his out-of-door intercourse or spirally inclined in his dealings, is generally tender and truthful in his home. There only is he seen to the best advantage. When the day's work is over and the welcome shelter of his domestic roof is attained, he husks off his formality with his great-coat, and appears to his family and his friends in a character unknown to the outer world. The quiet comfort and heartfelt warmth of an English fireside must be felt to be appreciated. These Britons, like our own people, are by nature not demonstrative; they do not greet their wives before strangers with a kiss, on returning from the day's business, as a Frenchman may do; and if very glad to see you on meeting, they are not likely to say so in words; but they cherish warm emotions under a hard crust of reserve and shyness, and lavish all their wealth of affection on the little band collected within the magic circle of home. Said an American who had spent two years as a public lecturer throughout Great Britain: "Circumstances have introduced me favorably to the intimacy and regard of many English families, and I can scarcely recollect one which was not, in its own sphere, a model household." My own opportunities have been very limited, yet so far as they go they tend to maintain the justice of this remark. There are of course exceptions, but they would be more abundant elsewhere. And I regard the almost insuperable obstacles here interposed to the granting of divorces, no matter on what grounds, as one cause of the general harmony and happiness of English homes. [New York Tribune.

THE CHILD ANGEL.

"She did but float a little way
Adown the stream of time,
With dreamy eyes watching the ripples play,
Liensting to their fairy chime;
Her slender sail
Ne'er felt the gale;
She did but float a little way,
And putting to the shore,
While yet 'twas early day,
Went calmly on her way,
To dwell with us no more.
No jarring did she feel,
No grating on her vessel's keel;
A strip of silver sand
Mingled the water with the land,
Where she was seen no more—
Oh, stern word, nevermore."

How few whose names are written wife, mother, have any idea or understanding of the solemn responsibilities resting upon them in these relations! A few years of butterfly existence—the finish given at a fashionable boarding-school, a short wooing, a gay bridal, a gayer honeymoon, and the young creature seats herself at last by her own hearthstone, and wonders if life is all a holiday.

Such a one comes up to my recollection; the life of the social circle in which she moved, always carrying sunshine wherever she went, merry-hearted as a bird, thoughtless of the morrow; light, air, motion, all sources of the keenest enjoyment, roving like the bee from flower to flower, extracting only honey; sensitive, ardent, impulsive, warm-hearted—but "remembering not her Creator"—lacking the "one thing needful." I loved her, as did all who knew her, for the world had not yet spoiled her frank and generous nature; but with all that wealth of feeling, and without the guiding-star of religion, I could only say, "May God keep her!"

Her husband was like herself, fond of the gay world, but fully able to appreciate the strong, deep love she bore him.

A babe was given her. With a flood of joyful tears she welcomed it. At once she became the self-sacrificing, patient, enduring mother. You could not have charmed her away from that babe's cradle, "charmed you never so wisely." Concerts, parties, balls, were alike forgotten; her chief joy was to watch those tiny features—to caress that fragileform. The gay, ringing laugh was heard less frequently—a sweet, calm seriousness marked her whole demeanor. She would sit for hours gazing on its cherub face with moistened eyes. Years passed on. The child grew up a delicate, fragile thing, with large, thougtful, earnest eyes, through which the soul seemed ever speaking; moved to tears by a strain of sweet melody, or the gorgeous beauty of the sunset cloud—caring naught for the sports of childhood, but, like the child Saviour, "hearing and answering questions."

The love and devotion of Alice for her mother almost amounted to idolatry. At night her fairy hand was outstretched from the little bed, to rest in that of her mother. By day she was ever at her mother's side, with her book, or with those large brown eyes fixed on her mother's face, intensely interested in her conversation. When there were visitors, she would take a seat in some quiet corner, never losing a word, pondering all she heard. If any one advanced an opinion different from the views expressed by her mother, Alice would timidly venture forth and say, "I don't think it can be so; my mother doesn't think so;" or, "I'm sure you are right, for I've heard my mother say so." On these occasions an expression of seriousness, almost amounting to distress, would settle upon the mother's face, and her eyes would often fill with tears.

I watched that mother and child with the most intense interest. I looked for the time when all this weight of responsibility should lead her to the foot of the cross. I saw (with spiritual eyes) this child angel invisibly drawing her thither. Nor did I look long, nor in vain. One morning she came to me with a burst of tears, and said, "Oh, teach me how to go with that child to heaven!" I told her simply, earnestly, her duty; she listened with eager interest; nay, more—for, God be thanked, my prayer was heard—she tried hard to perform it.

And now, little Alice's mission on earth being accomplished, the mother's new-born faith and trust in God were to be put to the trial. The Good Shepherd called her lamb gently to his fold. The little feet faltered—the large eyes grew dim. With a flood of bitter tears the mother cried, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me?" But grace prevailed, and as she closed the child's eyes in death, I heard her pallid lips say, "Not my will, but Thine be done."

Since then the grave has closed over the husband of her youth; poverty, suffering, and trial have marked her pathway, and now she can look back and see the kindness of her heavenly Father in thus early sheltering the little shrinking lamb from the storm and the tempest.

"Full short her journey was; no dust
Of earth unto her sandals clave;
The weary weight the aged must,
She bore not to the grave.
She seemed a cherub who had lost her way
And wandered hither; so her stay
With us was short, and 'twas most meet
That she should be no delver in earth's clod,
Nor need to pause and cleanse her feet,
To stand before her God."

A VISIT TO JOPPA.

From a Letter of Dr. Bacon to "The Independent."

The city of Joppa is enclosed with walls, except on the side toward the sea, and there is only one gate for entrance or egress by land. At the present day the walls and gates of Turkish cities are chiefly for the convenience of the government in the collection of duties on commodities passing from the country into the city, or from the city into the country. For all the passing in and out of Joppa, especially since half the population has begun to reside without the walls, a single gate is altogether insufficient. From morning to night it is constantly crowded. * * *

Joppa has doubtless been a seaport ever since Jerusalem began to be a city. Under the Hebrew form of Japho the name occurs in the book of Joshua, but not in such a connection as to imply that it was then a place of any considerable importance. In the age of Solomon, Joppa was the port of Jerusalem, as it is now, and as it always has been, except while it was superseded by the artificial port of Cesarea. It was from Joppa that Jonah embarked on his voyage to Tarshish. It was to Joppa that the timber from Lebanon was brought in floats by Tyrian navigators, for the building of the first temple and the second. But the most memorable historical distinction of Joppa is its connection with the events of the New Testament. It was here that Simon Peter, while he was lodged in the house of one Simon, a tanner, "by the sea-side," looked forth, in his daily devotions and meditations, on a wider "sea" than that placid lake upon which, with hardly a thought beyond the hills that embosomed those bright waters, he spent the years of his youth. Here, perhaps, for the first time in his life, he was looking upon Roman galleys and "ships of Tarshish" —how unlike the little fishing-boat from which he was called by the summons, "Follow me, and I will make thee a fisher of men." Here he was beginning to see the concourse of men from distant lands—men of strange aspect and garb, and of language and races unknown to Galilean fishermen. Here, in his hours of prayer, on the house-top, the remembrance of that great commission, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," might well awaken in him new thoughts concerning the breadth and depth of its significance, and earnest searching of heart as to whether he had fully grasped its meaning.

* * * * *

To me the question as to the particular spot occupied by the house of Simon the tanner—whether a few rods farther north or a few rods farther south—was a question of very little interest. Nor should I care to trace exactly the footsteps of the messengers sent by Cornelius from Cesarea to Joppa. Through what villages they passed, where they passed, where they turned from the sea-shore, at what point they crossed the rivers, and where they lodged the night they spent upon the way—were points in regard to which I felt no painful curiosity. It was enough for me that "two of the household servants" of Cornelius, "and a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually," were sent from Cesarea some three hours or more before the sunset of one day, and arrived at Joppa not long after the noon of the next day; and that in like manner Peter, returning with them, left Joppa on one day, and "on the morrow after" entered into Cesarea. I had just gone over the same ground, and my measurement of the distance between the two places agreed with theirs. But in other respects how different! Their Cesarea was a splendid provincial capital, adorned with all that wealth and art, and royal power, could lavish upon it, the seat of a Roman procurator and garrisoned with Roman legionaries. Of all that splendor there now remains only a monumental ruin; and the Cesarea which I had seen is without a human inhabitant; not even one black tent of a wandering Arab was pitched within sight of it. They passed over, in their two days' journey, one of the most beautiful and populous districts in the world. I had passed over the same district, beautiful still in its natural features, but utterly desolate. Wave after wave of barbarous invasion has swept away all but the last traces of ancient civilization. The quickening and renovating light from heaven, which was then beginning to shine upon these lands, has long since been overshadowed with the grossest errors and superstitions. Priestcraft, ignorance, wickedness, each the ally of the others, have wrought their effects on the people and have been visited with Divine penalties, till now the traveler from those ends of the earth to which the gospel has been propagated, wonders at so terrible a desolation, and adores the severity of God. When shall the healing and renovating light return? How long, O Lord! how long?

DEATH OF A CALIFORNIA ADVENTURER.

The following lines, from the New England Diadem, were "suggested by hearing read an extract of a letter from Captain Chase, giving an account of the sickness and death of his brother-in-law, MR. BROWN OWEN, who died on his passage to California. The whole poem is painfully interesting in every line, and it will be read with 'teary eyes,' by many who have lost brothers, fathers, husbands, or sons, on their way to, or after having reached, the land of Gold and Graves."

Lay up nearer, brother, nearer,
For my limbs are growing cold,
And thy presence seemeth dearer,
When thy arms around me fold;
I am dying, brother, dying;
Soon you'll miss me in your berth,
For my form will soon be lying
'Neath the Ocean's briny surf.

Hearken to me, brother, hearken,
I have something I would say,
Ere the veil my vision darken,
And I go from hence away;
I am going, surely going,
But my hope in God is strong,
I am willing, brother, knowing
That He doeth nothing wrong.

Tell my father, when you greet him,
That in death I prayed for him;
Prayed that I might one day meet him,
In a world that's free from sin;
Tell my mother, (God assist her,
Now that she is growing old,)
That her son would glad have kissed her,
When his lips grew pale and cold.

Listen, brother, catch each whisper,
'Tis my wife I'd speak of now;
Tell—oh, tell her how I missed her,
When the fever burned my brow;
Tell her, brother—closely listen,
Don't forget a single word—
That in death my eyes did glisten,
With the tears her memory stirred.

Tell her she must kiss my children,
Like the kiss I last impressed,
Hold them as when last I held them,
Folded closely to my breast;
Give them early to their Maker,
Putting all her trust in God,
And He never will forsake her,
For He's said so in His Word.

Oh, my children!—Heaven bless them!
They were all of life to me;
Would I could once more caress them,
Ere I sink beneath the sea;
'Twas for them I crossed the ocean;
What my hopes were I'll not tell,
But they've gained an orphan's portion,
Yet He doeth all things well.

Tell my sister I remember
Every kindly parting word,
And my heart has been kept tender,
By the thoughts her memory stirred.
Tell them I ne'er reached the haven
Where I sought the "precious dust,"
But have gained a port called Heaven,
Where the gold will never rust.

Urge them to secure an entrance,
For they'll find their brother there;
Faith in Jesus, and repentance
Will secure for each a share—
Hark! I hear my Saviour speaking,
'Tis, I know his voice so well,
When I am gone—oh, don't be weeping;
Brother, here's my last farewell!

INFIDELITY ALLIED TO MENTAL IDIOCY.

The following earnest and indignant language of Dr. Chalmers, when speaking of the high-sounding but empty claims of infidelity to literary and scientific greatness, and mental independence, have lost none of their significance at the present day.

"Let the enemies of our faith show the world that their infidelity rests on higher grounds than a stale invective against the jugglery of priests, or the pertness of a flippant witticism; let them bring along with them the spirit of cool and candid reflection, an anxiety after truth, and a ready submission to evidence. How little do they think, as they strut along in the pride of the infidel philosophy that is in them—of that humble, cautious spirit which Bacon taught, and on which Newton rests the immortality of his genius. There is a puppeyism in infidelity for which I have no patience. I thought that now-a-days both gentlemen and philosophers would have been ashamed of it. At the commencement of last century one had some credit in sporting the language of unbelief and infidelity—for they were supported by the countenance of Shaftesbury and Bolingbroke, who, in addition to their being peers of the realm, had a sufficient acquaintance with their mother tongue. But infidelity, like every other fashion, has had its day; and since the masterly and triumphant defenses of our English divines, it has been generally abandoned by the superior and more enlightened classes of society, and, to use the words of an Oxford professor, is now rarely to be heard but in the language of bakers, and brewers, and bricklayers, and bell-menders, and bottle-blowers, and blackguards. I revere Christianity, not because it is the religion of my fathers—I revere it, not because it is the established religion of my country—I revere it, not because it brings to me the emoluments of office; but I revere it because it is built upon the solid foundation of impregnable argument; because it has improved the world by the lessons of an ennobling morality, and because, by the animating prospects it holds out, it alleviates the sorrows of our final departure hence, and cheers the gloomy desolation of the grave."

'SOW BESIDE ALL WATERS.'

While at Soratoga, a short time since, we visited 'Congress Spring,' and were thus reminded of a pleasing incident that once occurred there, and which shows that some professing Christians, instead of leaving their religion behind them, while at places of fashionable resort, improve their opportunities for promoting the spiritual welfare of those with whom they come in contact. A few years ago, while a good deacon of a Baptist church was at this Spring, a lady, to whom he was a stranger, was about to drink of the renovating mineral water, when he put to her the question—'Did you ever drink at that Great Fountain?' The lady's countenance manifested much displeasure as she walked away. The next fall, the deacon providentially attended a prayer meeting in Rochester, N. Y., and after the close of the services, in which he engaged, he was invited home by one of the brethren. Finding the gentleman's wife very sick, he went into her chamber to converse with her. On seeing him, she remarked—'Do you remember asking a lady at Congress Spring if she had ever drank at that Great Fountain?' 'I do,' said the deacon. 'Well,' she continued, 'I am that individual. At the time, I was much displeased with your remark, but I couldn't throw off its effects upon my mind. By day and by night, that question rung in my ears, and I found no peace till I drank at that Fountain of living waters, of which, if a man drink, he will never thirst. Oh,' she added, 'be faithful to others, as you were to me, and God will bless you.'

'A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver.' 'Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters.' [Watch. & Refl.

JOHN CALVIN.

From Teodore Beza's Eulogium, published in Henry's "Life and Times of Calvin."

Calvin was not of large stature: his complexion was pale, and rather brown: even to his last moments his eyes were peculiarly bright, and indicative of his penetrating genius. He knew nothing of luxury in his outward life, but was fond of the greatest neatness, as became his thorough simplicity: his manner of living was so arranged, that he showed himself equally averse to extravagance and parsimony: he took little nourishment, such being the weakness of his stomach, that for many years he contented himself with one meal a day. Of sleep he had almost none: his memory was incredible; he immediately recognized, after many years, those whom he had once seen; and when he had been interrupted for several hours, in some work about which he was employed, he could immediately resume and continue it, without reading again what he had before written. Of the numerous details connected with the business of his office, he never forgot even the most trifling, and this notwithstanding the incredible multitude of his affairs. His judgment was so acute and correct in regard to the most opposite concerns about which his advice was asked, that he often seemed to possess the gift of looking into the future. I never remember to have heard that any one who followed his counsel went wrong. He despised fine speaking, and was rather abrupt in his language; but he wrote admirably, and no theologian of his time expressed himself so clearly, so impressively and accurately as he, and yet he labored as much as any one of his cotemporaries, or of the fathers. For his fluency he was indebted to the severel studies of his youth, and to the natural acuteness of his genius, which had been still further increased by the practice of dictation, so that proper and dignified expressions never failed him, whether he was writing or speaking. He never, in any wise, altered the doctrine which he first adopted, but remained true to the last—a thing which can be said of few theologians of this period.

Although nature had endowed Calvin with a dignified seriousness, both in manner and character, no one was more agreeable than he in ordinary conversation. He could bear, in a wonderful manner, with the failings of others, when they sprung from mere weakness: thus he never shamed any one by ill-timed reproofs, or discouraged a weak brother; while, on the other hand, he never spared or overlooked willful sin. An enemy to all flattery, he hated dissimulation, especially every dishonest sentiment in reference to religon: he was therefore as powerful and stormy an enemy to vices of this kind, as he was a devoted friend to truth, simplicity, and uprightness. His temperament was naturally choleric, and his active public life had tended greatly to increase this failing; but the Spirit of God had taught him so to moderate his anger, that no word ever escaped him unworthy of a righteous man. Still less did he ever commit aught unjust toward others. It was then only, indeed, when the question concerned religion, and when he had contend against hardened sinners, that he allowed himself to be moved and excited beyond the bounds of moderation.

OLD GABRIEL'S EXPERIENCE.

He had been a slave, and was now infirm, near eighty, and respected by all as a devout and consistent Christian. "One hot day," he said, "I was hoeing in the field, the sun shine berry hot, my feet so burn on the hot sand I feel hot all over; I take my hoe, I makes a hole right deep in the ground, I puts my feet down and cover them over wit de ground; and, massa, you don't believe how cool it feel to my feet. While my feet so in de ground; I begin to think about heaven and hell, how hot hell was. I got so troubled about it that I could not rest—yes, massa, so long all trouble, day and night—I know not what matter, till I tell one day Baptist minister. He tell me what it was; he tell me how I must pray to Christ; how Christ hab died for us. I pray to Christ; Christ here me; he forgive my sins, and make me happy. Now, massa, I am a pilgrim traveling on to Canaan, singing hallelujah." [American Messenger.

GLORY OF HEAVEN.

The celebrated John Howe once had such a view of heaven, and such a desire to depart, that he said to his wife: "Though I think I love you as well as it is fit for one creature to love another, yet if it were put to my choice, whether to die this moment, or live through this night, and living this night would secure the continuance of life for seven years longer, I would choose to die this moment." Still the glory of a christain is to be neither afraid of death nor impatient after it; to be willing to go to heaven the next hour from the greatest comforts, or to wait for it through many lingering years, amid the greatest hardships, the most self-denying and laborious duties, and the severest and most complicated suffering. [James.

Every virtue which gains a man respect in society, every quality which ministers to individual happiness, together with the several practices which advance the general good, are all enjoined upon us by the Christian Scriptures, and make up a part of the true Christian character.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 11, 1851.

"THE CHURCH" AND THE SABBATH.

The previous five numbers of the Recorder have been occupied with a discussion of the Sabbath question, taken from a London magazine published by our Baptist brethren. In his review of the subject, the editor of that print avows himself better pleased with the sentiments put forth by "Brother Owen of Cranfield" than with those of his other correspondents. Upon looking over what "Brother Owen" has written, we find that he rests the obligation to observe the "Lord's day" upon "the example of the apostles and the churches they planted, in conducting church affairs on this day; together with the resurrection of Christ, and his repeated visits to the disciples in their assembly on it, and especially in the second week, there being no recorded appearance of Christ to them from the day he rose till that day week; and the giving of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost on that day." These facts, he thinks, "sufficiently point out the duty of all godly people to observe religiously this very day, without applying to it the severities of the Sabbath law."

We have so often shown the fallacy of the argument for Sunday observance as grounded upon these facts, that we shall not trouble our readers with any thing in reference to it in this connection. We will admit, for the sake of argument, that these facts do "point out the duty of all godly people to observe the day." But what is the duty of the *un*godly? Does "the example of the apostles and the churches they planted, in conducting church affairs on this day," lay under obligation those that are out of the church? Be it so, that "men of God will ever hail it with joy as the best day of the seven," without being constrained to do so by the severities of law, will men of the world have any such feelings? What is to bring these to the observance of the day, if not constrained by law, or even to convict them of sin in not doing it, since where no law is there is no transgression? Mr. O. himself appears somewhat sensible of the weakness of his argument in this respect, for he says, "In relation to the community at large, let us be satisfied to support its necessity and importance just as we do that of food, clothing, health, and mental improvement, by expediency," &c. He makes no account of the example of the apostles and early churches here. Nothing but expediency, when the practice of worldly people is concerned.

But to urge a day of rest upon one class of people by one set of motives, and upon another class by a different set of motives, is, in our humble opinion, a poor way to promote its universal observance. And as for expediency, of course every man will judge for himself. It may appear expedient at one time to keep a day of rest, and at another time it may appear very *in*expedient. There is no difficulty in making men see the expediency of taking food, wearing clothing, taking care of health, &c.; for they are urged to these things by the cravings of their nature. Let a man be hungry, and he needs no argument to show him the expediency of eating. Let him be sick, and he needs no argument to show him the expediency of looking after his health. But when do we find men thus ready to look after the wants of their moral nature? Necessary as a day of rest may be in order to give opportunity for religious worship and instruction, and though it may be "a wise and kind regulation" to appoint one, what man of the world is sensible of it? It is "wise and kind," on the part of the Almighty, to give men the gospel; and sound reasoning shows that it is adapted to fill and bless all the faculties of their nature. It is as important, in this respect, as food and clothing are to the body. But do men ever embrace it on the ground of expediency? Men of the world are slow to see the expediency of becoming Christians; and till the conviction is forced upon them, that "he who believeth not shall be damned," they give themselves no trouble to secure the advantages of religion. So with a day of rest. It may be very necessary to the welfare of the community; it may be indispensable to a person's best interests; but if men are not driven to the observance of it by the stern mandate of law, they will never come to it at all. To place it upon the ground of mere expediency is to abandon its interests altogether.

It may appear much more logical to ground the observance of the "Lord's day" upon New Testament authority alone, than to attempt to find authority for it in the Fourth Commandment. We certainly think, with the editor of "The Church," that "the transference theory is a pure figment;" and if the facts, upon which he and his favorite correspondent rely to establish the claims of the first day of the week to religious regard, did really prove any thing, we should be inclined to yield the argument. That is, we should go so far as to admit that Christians have an institution, which devolves on them with an obligation like that of the Supper—a memorial of the Lord's resurrection, as the latter is of his death. But we could not, even then, admit that mankind at large had any thing to do with it. We should be compelled to say, that sinners were under no more obligation to commemorate the Resurrection by keeping the "Lord's Day," than they were to commemorate his Death by partaking of the "Lord's Supper." And, convinced as we are, that the world needs a day of rest, we should have to go back to the Law, and maintain the everlasting perpetuity of the institution enjoined in the Fourth Commandment. Thus we should have two weekly observances; the one a Sabbath for the world at large, the other a Festival for the Christian Church.

Such actually was the state of things in the early ages of Christianity. We mean, not the apostolic age, but the age succeeding it for three or four centuries. The churches observed the Sabbath according to the commandment, and then observed the first day of the week purely as a religious festival. But no one in that age pretended to keep the Sunday festival out of respect to Scripture authority. The example of Christ and the Apostles was not pleaded at all. It was a voluntary practice altogether. And if Christians of the present day would be content to do the same, and not make their Sunday-keeping a pretext for setting aside the claims of the law, we should have but little to dispute with them.

We may possibly recur to this subject again, though we do not think there is any great need of it, as the several writers have exposed one another's fallacies pretty effectually.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Crystal Palace and Sunday—Sunday in London—Sunday in France—Papists in Ireland—Guvazzi—Close of the Exhibition.

GLASGOW, August 22d, 1851.

Some of our religious journals have spoken in terms of satisfaction that the Exhibition in London has been kept shut on Sundays. Rapid as the strides are by which "desecration," in the Church's sense of that word, proceeds, we certainly had no expectation that the doors of the Crystal Palace were to be thrown open on that day. Nor did we doubt that foreigners from Papal lands, where ecclesiastics claim for their church the honor of having made Sunday what it is, would perceive a material difference between the manner of its observance in our country and their own. However, inconsistently the Church of England seeks to have it believed that she obeys the Fourth Commandment, and finds the sanctification of the Sunday therein enjoined. Rome, on the other hand, avers that the Commandment being abrogated, she, by right of the authority with which she has been invested, appointed the day partly for worship and partly for play. But the value of the Protest, even such as it was, which the Palace was to present against Papal desecration, has been greatly diminished by events which have transpired. While the doors were shut, work was going on within. Before Parliament was prorogued, Col. Sibthorp, in the House of Commons, put a question to the Government as to whether it was true that persons were admitted to the Building on Sunday, and allowed to copy articles there. The answer which he received from Mr. Lewis conveying no information on the point, the Colonel repeated his question subsequently to Mr. Laboucherie, the President of the Board of Trade. He admitted that the Executive Committee had employed a person to procure illustrations of useful articles, a record of which they wished to preserve, and that on Sundays he had been allowed to make photographic experiments, and that in consequence a work of art had been destroyed; but, he added—as if losing sight of the fact that the point of the question related to Sunday desecration—compensation would be made for the loss sustained.

Among the visitants to the Crystal Palace, the representatives of the provincial press have been included. Those from Scotland seem by some articles which have since been published, to be more surprised at the extent of Sunday desecration in the great metropolis than it was expected would have been felt by Continental visitors by its sanctification. The increased number of cabs, the ordinary routine of omnibuses, the open shops for the sale of spirits, victuals, &c., seem to have taken them by surprise, although their own columns have often reported progress in these things, and Chambers' Journal for June 1st, 1850, contained a full and graphic account of the London Sunday Market.

A farther illustration of the French mode of sanctifying the day was furnished last Sunday, when "the inauguration of the railroad from Tours to Nantes took place, with the usual manifestations. They were followed by a banquet, at which the Minister of the Public Works made an impressive speech in honor of the occasion, and in general commendation of the labors of industry." Such is the form in which it appears without comment even in the London "Watchman and Wesleyan Advertiser" of 20th inst. Surely, the "watchmen" are becoming very familiar with these sanctifying scenes on the day of the Church's observance—and are helping to make their people also familiar with them.

The Roman authorities in Ireland held a demonstration in Dublin this week, to intimate their dissatisfaction with the recent enactment, and to enact all safe rebellion against it. There was much swaggering talk, but a seeming wish on the part of most to keep within the limits of the law. The notorious "John of Tuam," and another of the Bishops, appear to me fully committed by the signatures they have appended to documents published since the passing of the obnoxious statute. It is now a matter of interest to see how the Government will deal with the criminals. It was boldly declared at the Dublin meeting, that they will disregard the enactment, and that yet the Government they vilify will not dare to touch them. If they are permitted to trample on this law, it will serve no purpose to pass another—and we believe no honest legislators will be a match for the cunning of unprincipled priests, who can get and grant dispensations for every iniquity which is perpetrated for the good of the Church. At the meeting of which we speak, the aid of "the Queen of Heaven" was invoked, and is relied on. Would the blessed Virgin, whose faith challenges our admiration and imitation, lend help to such idolaters, if she had the power? It were to suppose her unworthy of the gratulations which she anticipated all generations would accord.

Guvazzi, whose addresses to the Italian refugees in London produced such impression, has delivered two orations this week to immense audiences in the City Hall of Glasgow. Like many more, we were present, not to hear addresses delivered in a language we do not understand, but to see the man and be witness of his manner. His oratory has been highly eulogized. It is, we believe, in perfect accordance with the standard of his country; but we have little wish to see it introduced into our own. It may be easy to him now, but it can hardly be considered natural; nor do we think that almost any of his excessive gesture would be regarded as graceful if adopted by an English speaker in any kind of assembly. It has too much of the characteristic of pantomime, in which action is used, not as an aid to impressive speech, but rather to supply the place of words. These remarks, however, apply wholly to his manner; for his matter, even in translation, furnishes evidence all-sufficient of a most powerful mind, well furnished for the warfare he has undertaken against his apostate mother Church. The fiery denunciations which he has poured forth against every individual part of the Papal system, leave us room to wonder that he should still regard himself as belonging in any way to it, instead of utterly separating himself from the mass of corruption he so fearfully portrays.

The Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations in London is to close on the 11th of October. A great medal has been awarded, it is stated, by the Council of Chairmen of Juries, to Mr. Cyrus Hall McCormick, for his American Reaping Machine. This machine was lately subjected to full trial on the harvest field by the eminent scientific Agriculturist, Mr. Mechi of the Tiptree Farm, Essex. After a whole day's work, Mr. M. intimates in the Times his conviction that on ordinary level ground it will be quite successful, and that it can be farther improved. An after experiment was made by another farmer on less favorable ground, where also it met entire approval. Our English ship-builders have shown a reluctance to expose their craft in competition with the "America," of new rig, lately arrived to challenge them. She is, however, entered as competitor for the prize at one of the annual displays of nautical skill, to be exhibited immediately. J. A. BEGG.

FALLS—GENESEE—NIAGARA.

Water-falls are universally regarded as adding much of the grand and picturesque to the scenery of nature. The rapid rush—the rising spray, wreathed in rainbows—the low, musical thunder of the falling water—affect the mind least susceptible to the beautiful, the grand, the sublime, and raise it from these up to the Author of all that is beautiful and great. Western New York is highly favored with such sights and sounds. Not to mention the numerous cascades, delightful in outline, soul-inspiring in the dash of waters—not to mention the falls of Taghannac, Hector, and Lodi—there is sufficient in the wild rush of those of the Genesee, and the deep thunderings of the cataract of Niagara, to give renown to any region. Indeed, Niagara has spoken to the people of not only this but the other continent, and they, responsive to the call, have sent their poets, painters, lovers of nature, with a due intermixture of representatives from the various professions and callings in life, on a pilgrimage to its shrine. The Niagara and the Genesee are two streams alike in destination, adown the St. Lawrence to unite with the broad Atlantic, but unlike in origin, and contrasting well in many particulars. One comes from the wild uplands of the Alleganies, wending its way amid scenery romantic and varied, through farms rich and far-famed for their wheat-growing; the other is the concentration of waters having their rise far up in the north-west, thence alternately expanding into vast inland seas and contracting into rivers or straits. One is youthful and buoyant, leaping from precipice to precipice in sportive glee; the other seems to have known no youth, but is majestic and calm, save when it takes its one great leap, and that is the leap of a giant. If you approach Niagara by the Genesee, the tremulous rushings of the latter fall upon your ear like the quick crack of musketry before the shock of the main engagement of battle, or like the distant rumblings of thunder before the bursting of the full storm. If you stand by Niagara first, and take the Genesee in a receding view, it is like that same musketry after the fierceness of the battle has passed, or like the fainter and still fainter mutterings of the retiring thunder-cloud, after the crash of the vertical thunder-bolt has died away, and the bow is seen spanning the east. We have in a measure enjoyed both. The approach—the ascending series—is the more exciting; the receding—the descending series—is the more quieting, reflective, and dreamy.

The sun was just tipping the hill-tops with gold, the gray mists of morning still lay along the vallies, as we stood by the falls of the Genesee at Portage, and gave ourselves up to the strange witchery of their wild waters. The Portage falls are three in number, of the hight of sixty-six, ninety-six, and one hundred and ten feet, respectively. The scenery is picturesque. Perpendicular cliffs raise their rocky fronts, from one hundred to three hundred and fifty feet in hight, looking down, solemn and majestic, upon you. The Genesee Valley Canal saucily worms its eely length along upon the very verge of the perpendicular precipices by the middle and upper falls, tearing away the rocks, and hurling them down the declivities to make for itself a way. Although man has spanned the river with a massive canal aqueduct above the upper falls, with a bridge directly above the middle, and is soon to throw across a railroad bridge of huge dimensions and vast hight by the lower falls, thus driving the shaft of improvement wherever he can obtain a foothold, the lower falls remain, as yet, embowered in primeval forests. Here, after clambering down the precipitous banks by grasping every root, bough, and twig within your reach, you will behold the freaks of nature in her most sportive moods. From here the river meanders through a deep gorge, until, at Mount Morris, it flows out into the broad and beautiful Genesee Valley.

The falls at Rochester are very similar to those of Portage, being three in number, and of about the same hight and general appearance, except the middle fall, which is but twenty-five feet in hight, scarcely deserving the name of a fall. The upper falls are nearly encircled by the city. The steady hum of the latter, and the watery rumble of the former, fall upon your ear like the music of kindred spirits. There is an island jutting out over the brow of the precipice, dividing the falling stream into two parts. This island is as well suited as noted for Sam Patch leaps. The far-famed Rochester mills have drained off a large share of the water from the falls, thus sacrificing grandeur to utility. The lower falls, about a mile below the upper, are enjoying more of the repose and beauty of nature, yet the city is rapidly stretching down to it, and it will soon be surrounded with the clatter of business.

The Portage falls are formed by the passage of the Genesee over the hard, enduring sandstones of the Portage group, to the softer shales below. The upper falls at Rochester are formed by the limestone of the Niagara group; the middle by the Clinton group; and the lower, by the Medina sandstone.

So much for the Genesee. Now let us step (by steam) to the Niagara. We have ever been led to look upon Niagara as one of the classic rivers of America. It does not need, like the muddy Tiber, or the sluggish, insignificant Ilissus, the aid of poesy and song to give it an undying voice. Its majesty—its strength, that knows no weakness—the everlasting thunder of its voice—are more powerful immortalizers than even the touch of genius. It runs its short course between the territories of two powerful, ambitious, and rival nations. The blood of some of their bravest sons has crimsoned its waters. The province of the Canadas seems a mystical, indefinite region. With a sufficiently definite southern border, it stretches away into the cold, lifeless regions of the north, with a jagged outline which the most daring of Her Majesty's subjects have not been able accurately to define. The politicians of the States universally think that it needs the spirit of liberty infused into its institutions and society, in order to give them life and energy. On the other hand, there are three millions of human beings within the States—the broad banner of stars and stripes waving proudly over their heads, its flag-staff resting for its support upon the sentiment 'all men are created equal and free'—who are robbed of their citizenship, ground into the dust, degraded to a level with brutes, and compelled to "thank their stars for their stripes." These are looking to the despised Canadas as the only oasis in the desert wilds of life—the paradise around which all their earthly hopes cluster—the only spot, this side of heaven, where the oppressor ceases from pursuing and troubling, and the oppressed are at rest. As we stepped into these British dominions, we felt conscious of breathing an air that no slave can breathe and be a slave.

> "If their lungs
> Receive this air, that moment they are free;
> They touch this country, and their shackles fall."

We could but look back upon the States as a land over which slavery, like some evil spirit, hovers, with claws of iron, and broad, bat-like wings, which, as they ominously flap, shut out the light of heaven, and render the atmosphere murky and sulphurous. Its long, shriveled neck, and blood-hound head, are greedily thrust into every quiet vale and hamlet, in search of humanity clothed with ebon skin.

As we arrived in the neighborhood of the falls, the first news that fell upon our ear was that a man had gone over the falls. He resided, according to report, on Grand Island, and had been over to Chippewa with a boat-load of provisions, which he sold, taking in part payment a jug of rum. On his return, being stupified by the effects of the rum, he fell asleep. The swift current began to carry him rapidly down towards the falls. A man from the shore discovered his situation, and commenced calling to him. He partially aroused, and carelessly looked about, then dropped his head and slept on. His friend ran along the shore, and continued to call, but he continued to sleep until his boat struck the rapids, when, with a frenzied look, he sprang to his feet, caught his oars, struck two or three clips, when his boat upset, and he was dashed headlong over the falls. The next day, his body was seen in the whirlpool below the falls; and as we passed down the river to Lake Ontario, a body supposed to be his, had just drifted ashore—mangled and torn in a most shocking manner.

How emblematic this of every drinker's course and end! He sips from the poisoned cup—sleeps, and is carried swiftly down the rapids of intemperance. Friends may call to him from shore, yet he heeds not, but sleeps on, until aroused by the surgings of the waters of destruction. He gives a frenzied shriek, and plunges down the cataract of death. His soul, stranded on the shores of eternity, bereft of virtue, torn and mangled by sin, is tossed in the whirlpool of eternal misery. ALLEGAN.

OBERLIN COLLEGE.

The Annual Commencement of the College at Oberlin, Ohio, took place on the 26th and 27th days of August. On the 26th, nine young ladies, who had completed the four-years' course termed the "Young Ladies' Course," read their graduating essays, which are spoken of as very creditable. On the 27th, nine young gentlemen and three young ladies, graduates of the regular College Class, took part in the public exercises. Prof. Charles G. Finney has been elected President of the College, and Rev. Henry E. Peck of Rochester, N. Y., Professor of Sacred Rhetoric. A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune speaks of the condition and prospects of the College as follows:—

"Oberlin College was never more prosperous than during the year past. In no previous year has the number of students in attendance been so great; in none has more harmony prevailed among both pupils and teachers; in none has there been manifested a more earnest devotion and fervent love on the part of both teachers and taught for their work. Internally, the College has been eminently prosperous. Externally, the effort commenced last November for its endowment has been prosecuted thus far with encouraging success. The mark having been set at $100,000, nearly $78,000 have been already pledged. The balance must be filled during the ensuing Autumn.

"The Oberlin College works on the principle of uniting manual labor in term times,, and school-teaching in vacation, with its course of study. It knows no caste of either color or condition. It aims to give to the laboring masses the best education for the least money, and thus in fact to bring the choicest facilities for education within the reach of every young man or woman who is free-hearted enough to buy it at the price of being both frugal, industrious, and studious."

MISSIONS AMONG THE INDIANS.

At a Monthly Concert held in Boston on the first Monday evening in September, Rev. Dr. Anderson communicated some interesting facts in relation to the Missions of the American Board among the Indians.

The Choctaw Mission, which is a third of a century old, is still presided over by Mr. Byington, who has been there from the beginning. Its stations number seven, and are all flourishing. A Choctaw reading book, a hymn-book, and an edition of the Old Testament, are in press. In one district the Chief, all the Judges, the School Commissioners, and twelve Captains out of fifteen, are members of the church. In another district the missionary asserts that intemperance is entirely unknown. The Churches are making decided progress in knowledge and civilization, notwithstanding the increase of white population among them. The annual meeting of the missionaries, held on the 4th of August, was mainly occupied in discussing the great want of more missionaries.

Missionary operations among the Ojibewas have been greatly interrupted by the excitement incident to their change of residence, the Government requiring them to emigrate northward. Meetings and schools, however, have been well attended, and the Indians are more than ever well disposed.

The missions to the New York Indians consist of four stations among the Senecas, and one among the Tuscaroras. The Tuscaroras are near Niagara Falls. Both they and the Senecas are making cheering advances in civilization. They are bringing more land under cultivation, erecting more convenient and substantial houses, planting orchards, and making roads. The railroad across the Cattaraugus and Alleghany Reservations is giving them a new impulse. They are learning also to imitate the vices of the whites as well as their virtues; and yet the Tuscaroras are generally temperate, and have banished the traffic in intoxicating drinks from their community.

THE SUNDAY IN CANADA.

One of the editors of the New-York Tribune, who has been enjoying a week's vacation, writes from Montreal, Canada, in the following strain:—

"I observe with curiosity the conflict of French and English social habits as here exhibited. The English seem to carry off the victory, as is proper to their position of conquerors political, and yet the more mercurial element has insinuated itself, and has its way to a degree that in England would be shocking. On Sundays no steamboats are allowed to run, no mails are dispatched, no theaters or concerts suffered, and the Saxon part of the people turn out in obedience to the church bells. No Hebrew or Seventh-day Baptist, anxious to depart on that day, is dismissed from the city, nor even suffered to send a letter for the consolation of his waiting wife and family at home. So far even Puritan Boston could not be more exemplary, or more utterly contradict every Gallic fashion and impulse. But underneath this English rigidity of observance, luxuriate those native sons and daughters of frolic who welcome the Sunday as a time of recreation. Then the laugh of gayety is heard ringing from the sidewalks and the open doors of the workmen's tidy cottages, the cabs flit about busier than ever, blackeyed, quick-voiced young fellows, with sisters and sweethearts, or fathers with wives and children, pile themselves into these locomotive snuggeries, and away they bowl around the mountain, into the country, wherever they hope for pleasure and a day remote from ordinary cares. Boston would positively be outraged by such depravity, carried off as it is with an air of supreme innocence and enjoyment. Only yesterday, while all the propriety of Montreal was convened in the Churches and Chaples, Episcopal, Methodist, Presbyterian, or Unitarian, a thousand of these Canadians, who had either gone or failed to go to early mass beforehand, went off in a railway train to St. Hyacinthe, some thirty miles distant, to some races there to take place despite the day."

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.—The Anniversaries of the Andover and Bangor Theological Seminaries took place last week. At Andover, Rev. Mr. Hoisington, a returned missionary from India, addressed the Society of Inquiry, in a very able sketch of the moral, political and religious condition of India. The number of alumni gathered on the occasion was very large, and their greetings constituted a pleasant feature of the occasion. Twenty-three orations were delivered by members of the graduating class. At Bangor, eight orations were delivered by the members of the graduating class. . . . The effort which has been on foot for some time past to endow two professorships in this Institution has been so far successful that no doubt remains of obtaining the complete sum. . . . The Baptist Theological Seminary at Newton, Mass., also had its Commencement last week. The examination of the several classes was thorough and satisfactory. Addresses were delivered by nine young gentlemen of the graduating class. A closing address was made to the class by Prof. Hackett, who presided on the occasion.

THE CASE OF BOLDING.—$2,000 has been raised in New York, Poughkeepsie, and Albany, to purchase the freedom of the fugitive Bolding, who was recently sent back from this city to Columbia, S. C. It was believed, before his examination, that he would be redeemed in case of conviction; and probably the money would have been paid over and the man set free at once on the conclusion of the examination, if the Fugitive Law had not provided officers and spending money to carry him back to slavery. As it was, the son of the U. S. Marshall, accompanied by the necessary officers, took the man to South Carolina, and then a dispatch was sent them to bring him again to New York, where a sum nearly double what he cost his claimants had been deposited for his redemption. He is expected in New York about the 13th inst.

NO SABBATH IN AFRICA.—The editor of the Savannah Journal says that he has "been permitted by a friend to peruse a letter received by him from a citizen of Liberia, who went from Savannah to that country, in which he gives a very interesting account of a travel on foot in the interior, and states that he crossed three or four mountains which have never been explored by civilized man. Two of these mountains he declares to be of rock or stone, and two of iron. The object of his visit was to teach the natives, whom he found entirely regardless of any thing like a Sabbath, or any thing pertaining to religion, but willing to be taught, and very desirous to read the good Book. Many of them he so far reformed as to induce them to abandon the practice of working on their farms on the Sabbath day."

AN OLD ECCLESIASTICAL BODY.—An exchange informs us that Rev. A. D. Gillett, of Philadelphia, has edited the Minutes of the venerable Baptist Association of that city for the first hundred years of its existence, and is about to publish them in an octavo volume. The Association was formed in 1707, and is one of the oldest, as it has been the most prosperous of the Baptist ecclesiastical bodies in this country. Rhode Island College, now Brown University, was originated by this Association, and it was also a pioneer in Education, Temperance, Missions, Religious Publications, and all other benevolent enterprises now approved of by the denomination. The volume will also contain the sermon of Dr. Jones, preached in 1807, at the centennial anniversary of the Association.

CHEAP PAPERS.—The Methodist church, it is well known, has, within the last few years, been experimenting somewhat on cheap papers. Their Advocate and Journal is now published for $1 25 per annum, strictly in advance. The publishers, however, have recently announced to the church, that it can not be sustained at that price with their present list of thirty thousand subscribers.

FINANCES OF THE AMERICAN BOARD.—The income of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, for the year ending July 31st, was $274,902—an increase of $23,276. The expenditure was $284,830, being nearly $10,000 more than the income, and making the Board's debt $43,990.

BAPTIST MISSION IN CANADA.—The Baptist Mission at Grand Ligne, C. E., reports recently an encouraging progress. Several baptisms of converted Roman Catholics have taken place—on one occasion, amid great confusion and interruption on the part of hostile neighbors.

HARVEST SERMONS.—The German Reformed Churches of Pennsylvania have a pleasant custom, derived from Fatherland, of holding special religious services at the completion of the harvests, when annual collections for benevolent purposes are taken up.

Testimony against Slavery.

At the General Assembly of General Baptist Churches, by their Messengers, Elders, and Representatives, holden at Worship street, London, on the 10th day of June, 1851—

Proposed by Dr. Thomas Sadler, seconded by the Rev. J. C. Means, and resolved unanimously—

That this Assembly desires to express its utter and unqualified abhorrence of Slavery, its deep conviction that it is irreconcilable with the spirit and principles of the Gospel, and its most heartfelt sympathy with those of our brethren who, in this important crisis, prove themselves to be faithful brothers to the slave; and that the conduct of the American Legislature, in bringing into operation the Fugitive Slave Law, deserves the loud and unanimous reprobation of the friends of Christianity and of human freedom.

JOSEPH CALROW MEANS, } Joint Secretaries.
WM. HENRY BLACK,

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder.

MANUMITTED SLAVES.—The last will and testament of Elihu Creswell, late of New Orleans, sets free fifty-one slaves—ten men, twenty-six women, and fifteen children from five to twelve years of age. The will also makes it the duty of his executors to remove the slaves to one of the Free States. Accordingly J. E. Caldwell, an agent of the executors, has written to Governor Hunt, of New York, inquiring if there is any law to prevent their settlement in the Empire State, and asking for advice as to the best location. Gov. Hunt publishes the letter, and requests that the philanthrophic citizens of any towns or villages in this State who are ready to lend practical assistance to the cause of emancipation, by receiving the slaves when liberated, and making suitable provisions for their employment and maintenance, will communicate the fact to Mr. Caldwell, with such information as may seem to aid him in the performance of his trust.

ANDOVER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—Dr. Woods. the venerable Emeritus professor at Andover, recently preached two discourses in the Seminary Chapel, giving a succinct history of the origin and progress of that prosperous institution. The first idea of the Seminary he attributed to Rev. Samuel Spring, of Newburyport, who opened his mind to one of his deacons, then a poor sick man. The good deacon caught the importance of the plan, and remarked, "I am unable to do anything myself, but I hope Billy will." Billy was his son—the late William Bartlett, to whose munificence, and that of another Newburyport man, deacon Brown, the Seminary owes its existence. Dr. Wood was its first tutor, and continued his connection with it until quite recently, when his place was supplied by Prof. Park.

METHODIST PRESIDENTS.—Three Presidents of prominent Methodist Colleges at the West and South have recently resigned their offices, for the purpose of resuming the active duties of the ministry in that Church—Rev. Dr. J. T. Peck, of Dickinson College; Rev. G. F. Pierce, of Emory College, Ga.; and Rev. Wm. H. Ellison, of the Wesleyan Female College, Macon, Ga. "These resignations are probably the fruit of a movement which has lately been made by the prominent journals of the denomination, against leaving the itinerant work of the ministry for teaching and other literary pursuits."

FRUITS OF ONE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The whole number of clergymen educated at the Congregational Seminary at Andover, is said to be 1,111. Of this number 204 have deceased, leaving 907 living, of whom 102 are Foreign Missionaries, 148 Home Missionaries at the West, and 69 connected with Colleges as Professors, &c. About 1,500 students have been connected with the Seminary for a longer or shorter period. It was from this Seminary that the founders of the Tract Society, Education Society, and Temperance Society, proceeded.

EPISCOPACY IN WESTERN NEW YORK.—At the Convention of the Episcopal Diocese of Western New York, held last month, the Bishop reported, that during the year six priests had been ordained, eight deacons, four new canditates for holy orders admitted, and two rectors instituted; 231 persons had been confirmed in seventy-eight congregations. The diocese now contains one Bishop, 120 clergymen, ten candidates, 140 organized churches, forty-five missionaries, employed at an expense of $5,000, and the total amount contributed to benevolent objects, $10,552 37.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—We learn that the receipts of the American and Foreign Bible Society, for the month of August, exceeded by $1,400 those of August, 1850, and that the receipts of the five months now closed exceed those of the corresponding months of last year by about $500. The forthcoming periodical paper, we understand, will give a favorable view of the operations of the Society, with interesting items of foreign intelligence.

LAWYERS TURNING PREACHERS.—Martin P. Sweet, a lawyer, and late Whig candidate for Congress in the Galena District, Ill., has received an appointment as preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has commenced his labors at Princeton, in that State. Delazon Smith, Esq., also a lawyer, and extensively known in Michigan, has received an appointment as Minister in the same Church, and has been stationed at Keosauqua by the presiding elder of that district.

DELICATE ATTENTION.—While Rev. Dr. Ide, the pastor of the First Baptist Church in Philadelphia, was recently absent on denominational business, the ladies of his congregation, aware of his intention to remove his family to a new house, quietly raised a sum wherewith to furnish in a neat appropriate manner his destined abode, to greet him on his return.

CAMPBELLITE MISSIONS.—The Disciples, or Campbellites, of the Western States, have determined to engage in the Foreign Missionary enterprise, and have selected Jerusalem as the field of their operation. Rev. Dr. Barclay has been selected to explore the ground, who has safely arrived at his destination.

MORMONISM.—A correspondent of The Philadelphia Ledger, writing from Nauvoo, states that "Mormonism at this day is as different and distinct from anything which the Prophet Smith ever taught or ordained as Mahometanism is different from Christianity. The sect is already split into seven different bodies, each repudiating the other. These are as follows: "Rigdonites, who are the simon-pure of the sect, are scattered through the land; Brighamites, usurpers, occupying the valleys of Utah; Strangites, a Force, Beaver Island, Lake Michigan; Hydites, squatters on the unsurveyed public lands in Western Iowa—Kanesville their head quarters; Cutlerites, settled on Silver Creek, Mills county, Iowa; Brewsterites, at Socorrot New-Mexico; Bishopites, at Kirkland, Lake, county, Ohio. The Strangites, Brewsterites, and Bishopites, are new lights; the Cutlerites are reformers; and the Hydites are the Whig branch of the usurpers of the government of the church after the assassination of Prophet Smith."

General Intelligence.

European News.

The steamer America, with three days later news from Europe, arrived at Boston on the 5th inst.

Cotton had improved considerably, and Breadstuffs, except Indian corn, fallen.

The Queen had signified her intention to pass through London on the 27th August, on her way to Scotland, and in connection with the arrangements for the journey of the Royal party, considerable merriment, on one hand, and vexation on the other, has been occasioned by the refusal of the Vestry of St. Pancras Parish to put a certain road into a fit state for use in time for Her Majesty to pass over it to the railway station. The Parish coolly informed the Queen that the road would be closed on the day named, and that, consequently, Her Majesty could not pass over it.

Mr. Stevens's challenge to the yacht clubs to sail the America for ten thousasnd guineas against any of their vessels, had not been accepted up to the 23d. The America tested her sailing powers on the 22d, in the Ryde Regatta, and beat all her English competitors by a long distance. It is said, however, she will not be declared the winner of the cup, in consequence of her neglect to observe one of the sailing regulations.

The Great Exhibition was becoming less attractive to the public, the receipts having fallen to about £2,000 per day. The five shilling fee has been wholly discontinued. The Exhibition will positively close on the 11th of October, and on the 15th of that month the reports of the juries will be received, the awards made, the prizes declared, and a formal leave taken of the Foreign Commissioners.

A meeting of the Catholics of the United Kingdom was held at Dublin on the Tuesday preceding the departure of the America, and had led, as was anticipated, to scenes of disorder and violence.

The question of a packet-station in Ireland has been revived, and is being warmly discussed in the Irish journals, and at public meetings in Dublin and elsewhere.

In Paris the opinion gains ground that the Prince de Joinville will be started as a Candidate for the Presidency at the approaching election.

At Paris, two gentlemen connected with The Semaine, Messrs. Sarrans & Cox, have been condemned—the first to six months', the second to three months' imprisonment, and each fined 2,000f, for an article on the treatment endured by political prisoners at Belle Isle.

In Java the Cholera, after making most fearful ravages, has greatly subsided. Throughout the Dutch possessions it is estimated that from 12,000 to 13,000 were attacked during the late visitation, of which number fully one-half perished.

Much damage is said to have been done to the coffee plantations in Ceylon, by large swarms of rats which have recently made their appearance.

A French paper mentions that the town council of Orleans has granted a salary of £20 a year to a lecturer on the art of grafting and pruning fruit trees.

Excursion tickets for Madeira and the West Indies are now issued by the Royal West India Mail steam-packet Company.

A terrific explosion lately took place in a colliery at Washington, England; 34 persons were killed.

California News.

Two weeks later news from California (to August 1st) has come to hand since our last. It was brought by way of San Juan.

During the stay of the passengers at San Juan del Norte, a carpet-bag, containing $1,000 was stolen from a man named Selden Goff, of New York. A waiter at the hotel, who was seen near the missing money, was susbjected, and without delay a short investigation was held, and the prisoner was then taken to the woods, guarded by two Californians, and followed by a third bearing a long coil of rope. Arriving at the place appointed for the execution, a noose was made and adjusted to the prisoner's neck, the other end being thrown over a branch of a tree. His eyes were blinded, his hands tied, and he was told that he had only six minutes to make his peace with God. He knelt for a moment, and then rose to his feet. He was asked where his relatives resided, when he replied that he hoped they would never know what had transpired to-day. After choking him for some time, without getting any confession as to where he had hid the gold, they released him. The police attempted to interfere and arrest the ringleaders, and aid was sought from an English brig-of-war, which was refused. The Prometheus was searched, but the affair ended without their making any prisoners.

The San Francisco Morning Post of July 31st, sums up the events of the previous two weeks as follows:—

The events of the past two weeks are of a less exciting character than those embraced in the summary of the last steamer. No great outrage has occurred to highten the excitement in the public mind; the subsisting excitement has abated. Under the amended Criminal Code, which took effect on the 1st instant, and which allows the Jury a discretion to punish either with imprisonment or by death, those guilty of arson, robbery, burglary, &c., (among many other rigorous provisions,) a few trials have been had, among the most conspicuous of which, is the case of Robinson, Gibson and Thompson, convicted at Sacramento of the robbery of James Wilson, and condemned to death.

The reports from all the mining districts are more favorable than at any period during the present year, and the shipments of gold for August and September, will doubtless far exceed those of any previous month.

The most remarkable feature of mining operations are the numerous undertakings, by companies, all along the veins and tributaries, to divert the waters from their channels; the extensive canals on the tributaries of Calaveras, Tuolumne, American and Yuba, to carry water upon placers known to be rich, but without water: and lastly the fair prospect of a practical and successful beginning of quratz mining, with heavy, improved machinery.

There is increased confidence in the ultimate success of quartz mining, and the belief is every day becoming more general, that this will become the great and permanent source of gold. The age of prospecting is past; combined capital and labor, directed by systematic and scientific principles, will succeed where a blind trust in fortune and in individual efforts has failed.

The subject of agriculture is beginning to attract considerable interest. Although the past Winter and Spring were unusually dry, experiments have proved eminently successful, and there is a desire among many who came here as mere sojourners, to settle permanently in California, and gather around them the comforts of a home. It is estimated that there are already twenty thousand persons settled and devoted to agricultural pursuits.

The Indian hostilities have ceased on the southern and eastern borders, and broken out on the northern frontier.

Late intelligence from Sacramento gives account of an extensive slaughter of Indians at Pitt River On the morning of the 6th July, a party of fifteen men, under the command of Capt. B. F. Harvey, made an attack upon some 800 Pitt River Indians, some 20 miles from Shasta. A warm fire immediately commenced, and was kept up for some considerable time, during which some 60 or 70 were killed, and a large number mortally wounded. The party captured and brought in four squaws, and one young child about six years old. On the following morning 150 men, well armed, left for Pitt River, and all other parts of the country where the Indians were to be found. On the night of the 14th, a party of five men, (miners,) were attacked in the night, four miles from Shasta. A man by the name of Mathews, from Iowa, was shot dead on the spot, and three others badly wounded, one of whom has since died. His name was Osborn, from Salem, Mass. They were all brought in. The Indians are daily committing depredations, killing one, two, or three at a time every few days.

End of the Cuban Invasion.

The steamship Empire City arrived at New York on Sabbath afternoon last, bringing Havana dates to Sept. 1st.

Havana had been the scene of jubilee and rejoicing for the three days previous, owing to the capture of Gen. Lopez and his forces. The news reached Havana on the 30th ult. Flags were hoisted, and guns fired. At night buildings were illuminated, and torch-light processions formed. In fact, it was a day of general rejoicing.

Lopez was taken in the interior, wandering alone—nearly exhausted from fatigue and hunger. He asked for something to eat at a farm-house, and permission to lie down; while asleep he was bound and made prisoner. Of his followers, one hundred and fifty-five are now imprisoned, and are to be sent to Spain for ten years confinement in a dungeon. They say their sufferings before taken were intense. For several days they lived on the leaves of trees, &c. The last meat they ate was the horse of Gen. Lopez. They had no arms when taken. The remainder of the party have either been shot or they perished from hunger. Capt. Platt, of the U. S. Sloop-of-War Albany, visited them in prison, and thereby gained some important information, which he will dispatch to the Government.

The steamers Habanero, Almegdares, Pizarro, and Isabella Catholica, were on Sunday, Aug. 31, dispatched to Bahia Honda and Mariel, to bring up the troops, preparatory to the execution of Lopez.

Lopez was garroted on Monday morning, Sept. 1, at 7 o'clock. [The punishment of the garróte is described as placing the victim in an easy chair, clamping his limbs, placing a band around the neck, and gradually pressing a screw until the neck is broken.] The scene of execution was at the "Punta," opposite the "Moro." There were assembled from eight to ten thousand troops, and as many citizens. A few minutes before 7, Lopez was brought forward, and ascended the platform with a firm and steady step. Facing the multitude, he made a short speech, and his last words were, "I die for my beloved Cuba." He then took his seat—the machine was adjusted; at the first twist of the screw his head dropped forward—and he was dead. Thus ended the career of Gen. Lopez, so long the dread and terror of Cuban authorities.

In no instance, (the prisoners say,) have the Creoles of the Island manifested the least disposition to join them.

The excitement in Havana is fast subsiding, since the annihilation of Lopez and his forces. No more fears of an invasion are entertained.

—The Editor of the N. Y. Tribune refers to the lengthy official accounts of the progress and termination of the Lopez invasion, as establishing the following facts:—

1. That the bodies of the prisoners shot at Havana with Crittenden and Kerr were not mutilated nor anywise maltreated, and the story that they had been was fabricated to excite indignation and procure reinforcements in this country.

2. That the invaders achieved no important success at any time, beyond the killing of Gen. Enna and the consequent repulse of the detachment led by him;

3. That they killed no 2,000, 1,000, nor even 200 of the Spaniards;

4. That they at no time were able to act on the offensive, but fought for their lives from the first, and were at length surprised and utterly routed;

5. That, though they were landed in the very quarter of Cuba where Lopez was most likely to obtain aid, yet they received none of any kind, and were not joined by a single corporal's guard from the hour of their setting foot on the soil of Cuba;

6. That the Creoles, or natives of Cuba, so far from affording them such aid as even cowards friendly to them might safely have done, evinced the most active and deadly hostility throughout to the invaders and their cause. We cannot doubt that they furnished the information which led to the surprise and route of Lopez; we know that they finally deceived, betrayed, bound and delivered him to Concha.

It is stated that a company has been formed for the transportation of coal from Wilkes-barre to New-York, which has entered into engagements to convey from the mines to this city, through the Lehigh and Morris Canals, 200,000 tuns the first year, 300,000 the second, and 400,000 tuns each year thereafter. It is expected that the coal will be delivered at Jersey City at an expense of $2 50 for transportation. The value of the coal in the mine is 50 cents per tun, and the cost of mining it is estimated at 50 cents. This will make the price, opposite New-York, $3 50 per tun.

From Oregon.

By way of San Francisco, Oregon dates to July 22d have been received.

A rumor prevailed at Astoria, at the latest date, which awakened fears for the safety of Gov. Gaines and party, who, when last heard from, were at a crossing of Rogue's River. They had been in pursuit of Indians, and, it was reported, had been surprised and captured by an overwhelming force.

The troops in the hostile Indian country, under Gen. Lane, had had several skirmishes with the Indians at last accounts, and succeeded in driving them into the mountains, killing 40 or 50, and wounding a large number. None of his men were killed, and but two of them wounded. About 30 prisoners had been taken. It was thought that the Indians were not disposed to give further battle, and so Gen. Lane had gone into the mines, breaking up his camp.

The principal feature of the Oregon intelligence is an account of the safety of Capt. Kirkpatrick and the party under his command, who were reported to have been missed from Point Orford, under circumstances justifying a suspicion that they had been murdered by the Indians.

SUMMARY.

The receipts of the Erie Railroad for August are unexpectedly large, and show a considerable gain on the estimates of the Company. Compared with July they show a gain of over $35,000, or more than $1,200 per day. The figures are:

Passengers and Mail	$153,793 05
Freight	$110,171 08
	$263,964 12
Same month, 1850,	$129,206 12
Increase	$134,758 00

The number of sea letters received by the mail steamers, at the New-York Post-Office, for the month of August, was 166,496. The number of letters dispatched by steamers for the same period was 198,812. The number of newspapers received was 77,910—the number dispatched to foreign countries, 108,807. The number of ship letters, by merchant vessels, sent from the Post-Office, for the last month, was 2,397.

We have heard, says the N. Y. Tribune, of a new style of carriage to be used on common roads and in the streets of the city, to be propelled by the weight of a single man. The structure is firm, with driving wheels four feet two inches in diameter, with an elegant wire frame work body, with seats for two persons over the front wheels, which are four feet in diameter. A speed, equal to fifteen miles per hour, can be easily attained, although it is designed to run but about ten miles per hour.

We regret to have to state, says the Charleston News of August 27th, that Rev. C. P. Elliott was killed on Sunday last, while proceeding from Stateburg to Manchester, to perform his clerical duties. His horse having taken fright from the falling of a tree, Mr. Elliott jumped out of the vehicle in which he was riding, and while standing on the road was struck on the head by the limb of a falling tree, which killed him instantly.

A fatal railroad accident occurred at Andover, on the Erie Railroad, on Monday, September 1. As the train was approaching that place, a gentleman and lady attempted to cross the track in front of the locomotive with a horse and buggy; but the horse being vicious, stopped on the track, and the gentleman and lady were instantly killed, also the horse. Henry Fitzsimmons is said to be the name of the unfortunate gentleman.

The Mayor of New York has received a letter from John P. Brown, of our Legation at Constantinople, confirming the reports in regard to the liberation of Kossuth. The illustrious exile has declared his intention to come to this country, on board the U. S. steamer Mississippi, and will probably arrive here by the 1st of November. He will be accompanied by all the refugees who were with him at Kutahia, except Count Batthyani and wife.

As a gentleman belonging to Dover, N. H., was fishing from the rocks at the Pool, a well-known place of resort near the mouth of the Saco river, a few days since, a heavy wave washed up to the rock where he was standing, and swept him into deep water. His wife, with admirable presence of mind, threw her fishing-rod to him, which he caught, and she towed him by means of a line she held in her hand, to a place of safety.

The Hillotype, or Daguerreotype in colors, invented by Mr. L. L. Hill, is announced by the Dauguerrian Journal to have been so far perfected that the pictures will be exhibited in September. It is the inventor's purpose to select a committee of gentlemen to examine them, who shall make a report to the world. One hundred frames are now being made for the pictures. The mode by which he proposes to dispose of his discovery has not yet been made public.

A private letter from Chattahoochee, Fla., gives an account of the ravages of the storm of Aug. 22, in that vicinity. A large amount of property was destroyed, including the whole of the tobacco crop, and a number of barns, cotton sheds, and other buildings. The late corn crop was almost entirely destroyed, and the cotton crop sustained essential damage.

The Burlington (N. J.) Gazette states, that a short time since, William Rogers, Esq., found on his farm near the village of Crosswicks, two land tortoises with the following inscription cut on their shell: O. B. 1809, and E. R. 1810, thus making it 41 and 42 years since so cut. How much older they are, deponent saith not.

Miss Hunt, a young lady of St. Louis, being about to visit Europe, has made several munificent donations to the Catholic Church, of which she is a member. Among them is a gift of a lot worth $20,000 to the Archbishop, for the erection of a Cathedral, and another lot for the establishment of a community of Sisters of the Good Shepherd.

The town of Middleboro', Mass., has within its limits five Baptist Churches. The First Church, to which the venerable Isaac Backus ministered about half a century, was constituted in 1756; the Second in 1757, the Third in 1761. The remaining two have been more recently formed.

Hon. John. G. Miller, of Boonville, Mo., a member of Congress, a native of Danville, Ky., and a graduate of Center College, has determined to devote himself to the ministry of the Presbyterian Church.

Mr. John Q. Hewlett, residing about three miles from Baltimore, on the Frederick turnpike-road, raisedt his season seven hundred and eighty bushels of prime white wheat on a field containing 18 acres, 2 roods, and 6 perches—being a very small fraction under forty-two bushels per acre. The grain was sold for ninety-five cents per bushel.

The Irish labores on the Central New Jersey Railroad, about 12 miles from Easton, last week got up a quarrel among themselves about some local differences in their own country, which was not quieted until two men were killed and several others wounded.

On the 6th inst., at Newark, Del., twelve miles south of Wilmington, a man named Edward Ginn shot his wife, her sister, and his own child. They all died instantly. Cause not known. Ginn escaped, but the officers are on his track.

The Southern Press announces the death of Beverly Tucker, Esq., one of the Faculty of William and Mary College, more extensively known as a politician of the Nullification and Secession school. He was a member of the last Nashville Convention.

The distinguished politician Judge Woodbury, died at his residence in Portsmouth, N. H., on Thursday evening, September 4, at the age of 61. The immediate occasion of his death was an inflammatory tumor of the stomach, which rendered him incapable of taking nourishment.

Rev. Henry Giles, the lecturer, is suffering from a recent paralytic shock, by which he has lost the use of his lower limbs. He was obliged to deliver his oration, at the recent commencement in Waterville College, in a sitting position.

A gentleman received a letter by the Atlantic, the postscript of which announces the arrival in London, at the moment of dispatching the letter, of Mrs Judson and her children, all apparently in good health. They may be expected here in a short time.

Land Warrants are in fair demand at $155 for Mexican, but the supply is very much decreased. The new warrants, of which some 40,000 have been issued, mostly 40 acres, are unsaleable, but are disposed of in some instances at about 50c. per acre.

The ship Constellation, from Liverpool, arrived at New-York last week, with nine hundred and sixteen emigrants. This, we believe, is the largest number that has been brought to this city by one vessel.

The Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the North Ohio Methodist Conference says that the Missionary collections alone, of the present year, exceed those of any former year by some $1,200 or $1,400.

The Boston Commonwealth has been mulcted in the sum of $400, at the suit of Richard R. Sheckels, for certain reflections upon the case of the negro barber in Springfield last winter.

MARRIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 4th inst., by Eld. John Green, Mr. EDWARD D. SPICER, of DeRuyter, N. Y., to Miss ELIZA WELLS, of Hopkinton, R. I.

In Independence, N. Y., Aug. 19th, 1851, by Eld. T. E. Babcock, Mr. LEWIS P. SCOVEL to Miss CLARINDA SCOFIELD, both of Independence.

In Scott, N. Y., on the 30th of August, by Rev. J. R. Irish, Mr. JANNA N. PRATT to Miss MARY ANN HUBBARD, both of Scott.

DIED,

In Verona, N. Y., on the 4th of September, of consumption, MARIETTA WILLIAMS, aged 18 years. She went to Rhode Island last September on a visit, in hopes to improve her health, and for several months her friends thought the change favorable. During the past winter a series of meetings was held at the Valley School House in Hopkinton, which she attended, and there she sought and found Jesus to be precious to her soul. She united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Rockville, of which she remained a member until her death. A few weeks previous to her return to Verona, her health began to decline, and she was anxious to go home to the land that gave her birth. On the 20th day of August she arrived at her brother's, in Verona, much fatigued with the journey; she continued to fail, and two weeks after her arrival she fell asleep in Jesus. Her end was calm and peaceful. C. C.

At Quebec, (Canada,) on Monday, August 26, of cholera, THOMAS J. WILCOX, of Rockland Lake, N. Y., formerly of Westerly, R. I., aged 48.

In DeRuyter, N. Y., August 31st, of fits, SILAS MATTHEW, son of Robert and Anna Stillman, aged 15 months and 12 days.

LETTERS.

THE North-Western Seventh-day Baptist Association will hold its Fifth Anniversary with the Church in Christiana, Dane County, Wisconsin, commencing on the fourth day of the week before the first Sabbath in October, 1851. A. W. COON, Cor. Sec.

The Ohio Association.

THE Seventh-day Baptist Ohio Association will hold its first Anniversary with the church in Jackson township, commencing on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in October, 1851.

J. G. BABCOCK, Cor. Sec.

Our Anniversaries.

THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Ninth Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society will be held (God willing) with the First Church in Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in September, (11th day of the month,) commencing at 10 o'clock A. M. Eld. Nathan V. Hull is expected to preach the opening discourse.

THE PUBLISHING SOCIETY.—The Second Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society will be held with the First Church in Brookfield, N. Y., on Sixth-day, Sept. 12, 1851.

THE TRACT SOCIETY.—The Eighth Anniversary of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held with the First Church in Brookfield on First-day, Sept. 14, 1851.

☞ A meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Education Society will be held during the Anniversary season, at such time and place as the President of the Society shall appoint and notify.

Morning Line for Albany.

THE new and elegant steamer REINDEER, Capt. Albert Degroot, will leave New York from pier foot of Murray-st. every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday morning, at 7 o'clock, and returning, leave Albany every Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, at the same hour, making the usual landings each way. ☞ Meals served on board. For further information apply to JAMES BISHOP & CO., 3 Beaver-st.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call. that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH,
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Union Academy.

THE Academic Year of this Institution (located at Shiloh, N. J.) for 1851 and '52 will commence the first Wednesday in September, and continue forty-four weeks, including two vacations, of one week each, between terms.

The year is divided into three terms:

The First commencing Wednesday, September 3d, and ending Tuesday, December 9th.

The Second commencing Wednesday, December 17th, and ending Tuesday, March 23d.

The Third commencing Wednesday, March 31st, and ending Tuesday, July 6th.

Board of Instruction.

WM. C. WHITFORD, Principal,
And Teacher of the Classics, Natural Sciences, and higher Mathematics.
Miss RUTH R. HEMPHILL, Preceptress,
And Teacher of French, Painting, Drawing, and assistant in Mathematics.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed at the opening of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks. Those intending to teach District Schools are solicited to become members of this department. Especial attention will be given to the common English branches, and to familiar lectures and discussions on School-Teaching.

During the Winter Term the Agricultural Department will be under the instruction of Prof. Gurdon Evans, A. M., and will embrace the study of the best authors, and daily recitations. Two hours each day will be spent in the Laboratory well furnished with apparatus and chemicals, where students will be instructed in the Elementary Analysis of Soils, Minerals, Ashes of Plants, &c., and the various modes of testing for their constituent elements. Also, a course of Public Lectures will be delivered on the application of Science to Agriculture, and illustrated by a great variety of philosophical and chemical experiments. The object of this course of instruction is to afford ample facilities for farmers to become scientific, as well as practical; and enable them to render waste and worn-out lands productive, and retain them constantly improving under a high state of cultivation.

In connection with classes, Courses of Lectures will be delivered, during the Fall Term, on Natural Philosophy and Elementary Chemistry; during the Winter Term on Astronomy and Physiology; during the Spring Term on Geology and Intellectual Science.

TUITION—from $3 50 to $5 00 per term, to be settled in advance, or by satisfactory arrangement. Extras—Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $6 00; Monochromatic, $3 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, (breakage extra,) $10 00

Board in private families from $1 25 to $1 50 per week. Rooms can be obtained at a moderate expense.

Every care will be taken to render the school of the highest advantage to the student. The regulations will be few, but strictly and steadily enforced. Our object is at the same time we cultivate the intellectual and moral powers to develop also the practical.

Nothing sectarian will be taught or countenanced in the school. The exercises of the Institution will be suspended on the first and seventh days of each week.

LEWIS HOWELL, Pres. of the Board of Trus.

Miscellaneous.

American Contributions to the Great Exhibition.

The carriages of American manufacture are well worthy attentive examination. The first characteristic which would strike an untraveled Englishman with surprise, in viewing these vehicles, is their extreme lightness and the apparent incompetency of the slender axles and the thin spokes and narrow tires of the wheels to encounter the rough work of transatlantic roads. We are assured, however, that they traverse their course with impunity, surmounting all obstacles, even some nearly high enough to touch the axles, by the combination of that very lightness with toughness of timber and iron, and solidity of workmanship. Our attention was particularly attracted by one carriage, which, to all outward appearance, was a phæton on four wheels, and with a hood, built for the accommodation of two persons only, but with a stand projecting behind on a level with the base of the body, as if for the tiger in attendance. By an ingenious contrivance, however, the body of the vehicle is slid back to the extremity of the aforesaid stand, and from beneath the seat another seat is drawn forward towards the splash-board, and, by this simple action, not occupying more than two minutes, the vehicle becomes capable of accommodating four persons with ample room for sitting. This carriage is called by the American builders a slide-top buggy, although, as we have said, it bears much more resemblance to the English idea of a phæton than to that lumbering, jogging vehicle, hooded and two-wheeled, so many of which, in years agone, rumbled along London-st., and bore the euphonious designation of buggy.

Among the recent arrivals from the United States, is a species of moss, large quantities of which are found in wild parts of the Mississippi, hanging to the trees in masses, reaching sometimes the size of a man. When subjected to a baking process and other operations, it presents the appearence of horse-hair, and, being equally elastic, is offered as a cheaper substitute for that material as stuffing for mattresses, cushions and similar purposes, the price at which it could be made up being estimated at about one-third the cost of horse-hair.

In the United States divison is also exhibited a compass, on a new principle, by Mr. J. R. St. John, professing to remedy the deficiency of the old compass in notshowing the variations of the needle, and to mark those variations at all times, under all circumstances, and whether aising from local or artificial causes. The means he uses to accomplish that object may be briefly stated as two asteroids, one being electrically charged positively, and the other negatively, marking the variations upon the segments of circles beneath them. The instrument, we hear, has been submitted to the Admiralty, and will no doubt receive the attention of scientific men.

Gathering and Keeping Fruit.

To insure the safe keeping of apples for winter use, one point is of more importance than all others, although there are many minor points of some importance; and this is that they shall be singly and individually hand picked, and when barreled not be tumbled in from a basket, falling the height of the barrel, but either carefully handed down, or a small basket lowered and carefuly emptied. Freedom from bruises is one of the absolute conditions of safe keeping.

Apples intended for late keeping, should be gathered before heavy frosts occur in the fall. A temperature a little below thirty-two, or the freezing point of water, bursts the vesicles containing the juices, and causes an incipient fermentation, a loss of flavor, and premature ripening.

Apples barreled, from the tree especially, if put up in tight barrels, sweat, and the condensed vapor settles and is held by capillary attraction at the points of contact, causing eventually rot and decay. This may be avoided by laying them on a floor from ten to fourteen days, not over eighteen inches deep, and not long enough to allow wilting. A dry cellar, and the temperature from twenty-eight to thirty-two, greatly insures their preservation from decay.

Apples intended for transportation any distance, should be so shaken down and the barrel entirely filled, that in heading up, the upper tier should absolutely touch the heading, and even be bruised a little, by the force required to put the head to its place.

Fruit intended for late or spring eating should, about February, be overhauled, wiped and re-packed.

Those intended for family use, should be so arranged, that the period of rip ening, or eatability, should come along in succession according to their respective properties—par example, mark Holland Pippins, No. 1; Seeknofurthers, No. 2; Greenings, No. 3; Spitzenburgs, 4; Swars, 5; Russets, 6; and so on, according to the varieties the orchard produces. Apples are flat, tasteless and insipid, unless eaten in their season of perfection.

Apples put into a water-tight cask, and allowed to stand all winter in an open outhouse, whereby they are frozen like rocks, invariably come out bright and fair in the spring.

It is an abstruse subject, and the rationale difficult to arrive at, as to what causes the entire change of principles in some vegetables, roots and fruits, that takes place in freezing and thawing. The potato once frozen and thawed in cold water, in the dark, has all its original properties so entirely changed as to bear no analogy to its former constituence.

Vinegar may be so frozen as to lose its properties of acetous acid, and become an inert composition of malate of potash and sugar, and various other substances are so changed as not to be recognized. [Rural N. Yorker.

Experiment with the Fire-Annihilator.—An experiment was made on Sunday in the Champ de Mars, at Paris, by Mr. Phillips, of his method of extinguishing fires. A building of about 40 feet long and 25 feet high was constructed of wood, with a staircase outside, leading up to the first story. At about 4½ o'clock the construction was set fire to, and in a few minutes the flames were seen to burst out from every part. About a dozen men then rushed up the staircase, and placing themselves on a sort of gallery which ran outside, broke each a bottle containing the composition prepared by the inventor, and almost immediately the flames subsided, and the fire appeared extinguished. The experiment seemed to have succeeded, when all of a sudden the flames burst out again, and Mr. Phillips not being provided with a further supply of his liquid, it obtained the mastery, so that it was found necessary to call in the aid of the firemen to demolish the building. Generals Magnau and Carrelet were present, and Mr. Phillips explained to them the cause of his failure, declaring that he would take measures to secure its success on the next occasion.

Hay in England.

In England hay is scarcely ever put in barns. It keeps well in stacks, made up as they are in the neatest manner, and carefully thatched with straw. Nothing is more beautiful than the workmanlike manner in which they are put up; and for hay the long stacks are decidedly preferable to those of a round form, as it is cut down for use, in such case, to more advantage. The formation of a stack, which is often done by women, is a work of much skill, which is the fruit only of practice; the thatching of a stack in the best manner requires both art and experience, and there are men who make it a profession. When well executed, the hay for years is impervious to wet.

During the formation of the stack—which, when intended to be large, must sometimes wait for several days the progress of haymaking, the most careful farmers have tarpauline or canvas covering, to suspend upon poles over the stack, in order to protect it from rain. I refer to these minute circumstances, to illustrate the extreme carefulness with which much of the husbandry is here conducted. When the hay is to be used, a whole stack is never removed to the stable at once, but it is carefully cut down, as a loaf of bread might be cut, and always done up and bound in trusses, intended to be of fifty-six pounds each, and in that way carried to be distributed to the animals. This requires some extra labor; but the farmers find their account in it. How different this is from the careless and wasteful manner in which things are managed with us, where I have often seen horses and oxen standing knee-deep in the litter of the very best hay, which has fallen and been tossed out of the mangers. [Coleman.

The Eye Sight.

A correspondent of the Portsmouth (N. H.) Journal furnishes these hints:—

"The direction in which the light is admitted is very important. It should not come directly in front or on a line with the eyes, nor below them; for in these positions the direct rays fall into the eyes, and so fill them with the light that they cannot receive the reflected rays from the object at which we are looking, while it is from these reflected rays alone that we must perceive the objects viewed. Any one may prove this by laying a sheet of paper upon which he is writing, directly before him, with the lamp in front and upon a level or below his eyes; after looking at the writing in this position for a few moments, let him remove the lamp so as to cause the light to come a little from the rear and above the line of his eyes; he will at once perceive the relief afforded, and the greater distinctness given to the writing. Or let him, when the lamp is in the former position, shade his eyes with his hand so as to shut off the light but what is reflected from the paper, and the same effect will be noticed.

"The best direction for the light to come in reading is a little from the rear of the left shoulder. In the evening the lamp should be placed just so that it cannot be seen from the corner of the eye. But in writing or working at a family table in the evening, it may be necessary to have the light come in front. In this case the astral lamp with the ground glass shade is a good light, provided it be high enough and sufficiently opon below the shade to permit the rays to fall upon the table all around. The modern solar lamp, with the shade wholly closed at the bottom, is excellent for lighting rooms, but is not suitable for the centre of a working table. The cutting of figures in plain glass on the ground glass shades destroys their value as shades, and indeed makes them more painful and injurious to the eyes than to have them wholly of plain glass. But the best of the lamps for the eyes is the old fashioned bonnet lamps, or such as are now sometimes sold under the name of study lamp. The interior of the bonnet should not, however, be pure white or bright, as in that case it operates too much as a reflecter, casting the rays too strongly down upon the objects on the table, especially if these be white paper or work. A cream color for the inner surface of the shade or bonnet will be found sufficient if the lamp be tolerably powerful."

Wheat Crop in New-York.

For several years past, says the Albany Evening Journal, the farmers in some of the River and Northern counties in this State have been very unsuccessful in raising Wheat of a quality that would compare with that grown in the valley of the Genesee; and in some it has been found impossible to raise any on account of the insect. But this year a total change has taken place. Dutchess, as well as Columbia, has raised Wheat sufficient to supply their entire population for a year to come. A considerable amount has been grown in Rensselaer and Albany, but to what amount we are as yet unadvised. The farmers of old Washington now boast of growing Wheat of the best quality; and it is confidently asserted by competent judges that the quantity of Wheat raised in that county this season will be more than sufficient to supply the entire population of Washington County for a year to come. It is a well-known fact, that in some sections of the State a portion the crop has been destroyed by the weevil; but more than a sufficiency has been raised in other parts of the State to make up the deficiency found to exist in those localities. In the State the crop is large, probably a full average, if not rather larger than last year.

The American Reaping Machine.

Mr. Mechi, of Triptree-half, Kelvedon, Essex, has addressed the following letter on the subject of reaping by machinery to The London Times:—

I write a hasty line to say that the American reaping-machine, by McCormick, has been at work all day on my farm, cutting a heavy crop of wheat, very long in the straw, partially laid, and estimated at five quarters per acre. I have arrived at the following conclusions: that it will act perfectly on level land, with a standing crop; that it will cut from 10 to 16 acres per day, according to circumstances; that the quantity cut depends much on the activity and strength of the man who has to remove it by rake from the board on which it falls—it is hard work for a man to remove one acre and a quarter per hour; that our open furrows and deep water furrows are much against the perfect action of the machine; that the paddle-wheels do not in any way beat out or injure the corn; that certain trifling modifications in its details will be required where (as in my case) the straw is very long; that it will cut laid corn where it falls toward the machine; that where it falls from it, it is desirable to cut such portions by hand; that a proportionate number of hands to bind the cut corn will be required according to the crop. The machine will be cutting all day tomorrow. I should wish to have finished my harvest with it, but the proprietor desires to try it in other counties. In conclusion, I feel a conviction that all our reaping will soon be done by horse or steam machines.

To Make Cheese.

A person, whose dairy enjoys a high reputation, gives the following directions for making cheese:—

"Take a gallon and a half of water, and throw into it a pint and a half of common salt, boil and skim it, and add three or four ounces of rose leaves. After it is sufficiently steeped, let it cool, and put in one ounce of saltpetre and four runnets. A great spoonful of this preparation is enough to turn fifteen gallons of milk. When the curd is made, dip it out carefully, and put into a cloth that sets in a vessel with its bottom perforated with holes. Let a person on each side of the cloth take up the corners, and raise the curd carefully and turn it from one side to the other in the cloth, in order to the better draining off the whey; then lay it as before, in a vessel perforated with holes, and thus turn it once in fifteen or twenty minutes, and in the intervals place a follower upon it, with a stone, above; cutting the curd through each time. When the whey it out, season it with salt to suit your palate, while cutting it up in small pieces with a suitable knife; then put it up for pressing. Let it stand under thirty or forty pounds' weight twenty-four hours and then turn it, and let it stand twenty four hours, more under the same. A severe pressure, which is sometimes given, spoils a rich cheese entirely.

"Set your cheese in closets made for the purpose, which flies cannot enter. The outside may be rubbed with a mixture of butter and Spanish brown, which answers very well, but other mixtures may answer equally well. A small quantity of otter, say the size of a kernel of rye, sewed up in a cloth, may be put in each cured.

"Never wash out your cheese cloth with soap, but boil it out in whey. [Complete Far.

The Art of Embalming Rediscovered.

At a meeting of the Asiatic Society in London, some time ago, a human hand and a piece of beef, preserved by means of a preparation of vegetable tar, found on the borders of the Red Sea, in the vicinity of Mocha, were presented; a specimen of the tar accompanied them. Col. Holt, who presented the specimens, observes:—

During my residence on the Red Sea, a conversation with some Bedouin Arabs, in the vicinity of Mocha, led me to suspect that the pincipal ingredient used by the ancient Egyptians in the formation of mummies was nothing more than the vegetable tar of those countries, which is called by the Arabs, Katren. My first trials to prove the truth of this conjecture were legs of mutton; and though made in July, when the thermometer ranged at 94 deg. in the shade, they succeeded so much to my satisfaction, that I forwarded some to England, and have now the pleasure to send to the society a human hand prepared in a similar way four years since. The best informed among the Arabs think that large quantities of camphor, myrrh, aloes, frankincense, etc., were used in the preparation of the mummies. These specimens will however prove that such additions were by no means necessary, as the tar applied alone penetrates and discolors the bone. This tar is obtained from the branches of a small tree or shrub, exposed to a considerable degree of heat, and it is found in most parts of Syria and Arabia Felix."

Remarkable Spell.

The Rondout Courier notices a very singular case as occurring at Napanoch. About a month ago a daughter of a citizen of that place fell, without previous monition, into a deep sleep, lasting an unusual time, and since then reccurrent attacks have followed at intervals, one of which, an apparently profound slumber, lasted within a few hours of six days! During all this period of sleep, about a wineglass full of milk was all the nutriment which could be adminstered. Every effort to arouse her when in these torpors fails, save with a remarkable exception. The voice of a former Pastor of the Church at Napanoch appears to arouse consciousness, and, with some exertion on his part, the spell is broken for a time. The case seems to baffle all medical skill so far. The patient is 15 years of age.

Some year or two ago, adds The Courier, it will be remembered that a man from Ellenville was taken to the New-York Hospital in an appearent deep sleep, from which he could not be aroused. We noticed this fact, but forgot to mention that he died in a brief time, insensible to the last. Post-mortem examination established, that in his case a depression, or spiracle from the skull into the brain, produced the torpor. This case, however, is different from the other, as, we understood, the man never recovered from the first attack.

Origin of the Penny Postage.

A traveler sauntering through the lake districts of England some years ago arrived at a small public house just as the postman stopped to deliver a letter. A young girl came out to receive it. She took it in her hand, turned it over and over, and asked the charge. It was a large sum—no less than a shilling. Sighing heavily she observed that it came from her brother, but that she was too poor to take it in, and she returned it to the postman accordingly. The traveler was a man of kindness as well as of observation; he offered to pay the postage himself, and in spite of more reluctance on the girl's part than he could well understand, he did pay it, and gave her the letter. No sooner, however, was the postman's back turned, than she confessed that the proceeding had been concerted between her brother and herself; that the letter was empty; that certain signs on the direction conveyed all that she wanted to know; and that, as they could neither of them afford to pay postage, they had devised this method of franking the intelligence desired. The traveler pursued his journey, and as he plodded over the Cumberland fells he mused upon the badness of a system which drove people to such straits for means of correspondence, and defeated its own objects all the time. With most men such musings would have ended before the close of the hour, but this man's name was Rowland Hill, and it was from this incident and these reflections that the whole scheme of penny postage was derived.

Prescott the Historian.

In her very entertaining book of travels in this country, recently published, Lady Emeline S. Wortley thus refers to Prescott the historian:—

I had the great pleasure of a visit from Mr. Prescott before I left Boston; he came from Nahant to see me with his daughter. I was delighted to have an opportunity of making acquaintance with this justly celebrated historian, whose works I had read with such lively interest. Even by the side of his handsome (and, by the way, very English looking) daughter, he still looks quite a young man, and he seems to have a flow of spirits equal to those of Lord Stanley; there is not a particle of pomposity about him, and his style of conversation is of the most fresh, original, agreeable and striking kind; and with all his stores of learning and varied knowledge, there is the most complete absence possible of anything approaching to pedantry. His eyesight is unfortunatly defective, but no one would observe this in society. He appeared rather absent. A short time after he had taken leave and left the room with his daughter, we heard a knock at the door; on saying "Come in," Mr. Prescott apppeared again, and said he had left his cane there. He looked, and we looked; chairs were inspected, sofas pushed about, and tables trotted out, from their places, when presently I heard a subdued exclamation from Mr. Prescott, who had found the cane—in his hand, were I certainly did not think of looking for it. He laughed good humoredly at his forgetfulness, and he and his cane vanished presently together.

The Scourge of Consumption.

During the prevalence of Cholera we called attention to the fact that the deaths by Consumption through the year, in many eastern cities, equal the mortality by a cholera season. Circumstances having led us to take special notice of diseases of the Respiratory system, we are still more deeply impressed with their prevalence and fatality. The statistics on Public Hygiene prepared by the American Medical Association, present the following facts. In the city of Boston, during a period of three years, from 1846 to 1848 inclusive, there were 6888 deaths from Consumption, while in the same period there were 2826 from Typhus Fever, and 1606 from Dysentery. From 1844 to 1848 inclusive, five years, of 48,733 deaths in the whole State of Massachusetts, 13,004 were from diseases of the Respiratory system, and only 2020 from diseases of the Digestive system. The deaths in Massachusetts from diseases of the organs of respiration average only thirty per cent. of the whole mortality. In Lowell, in every 10,000 deaths about 2500 are from diseases of these same organs. The sanitary reports of the city of New York disclose similar facts. It is no unusual thing in the weekly report of deaths in this city to find from 30 to 50, and upward, from Consumption. In Philadelphia the proportion of diseases of the Respiratory system is also large, and even as far south as Baltimore, of 2996 deaths in 1846, 548 were from Consumption; in 1847, of 3414, 580, and 1848, of 3861, 620 were from the same cause. The First Inventor of Steamboats.—The Vienna correspondent of The Morning Chronicle says: In the archives of Venice an interesting discovery has been made, from which it would appear that a Frenchman of the name of Gautier, professor of mathematics at Nancy, and member of the Royal Society of Paris, was the first to invent navigation by steam. In the year 1756 he submitted his plan to the society, of which he was a member, and it met with no countenance from that body. He then published a treatise on the subject, which attracted the attention of the Venetian Republic, and procured for him an invitation to the shore of the Adriatic; he went, but death soon put an end to his labors. A year or two afterwards the theory of Gautier was practically exemplified on the Seine, amidst the acclamations of the Parisians. The treatise by Gautier on "Navigation by Fire" is the discovery alluded to above.

Fire Annihilator.—The European Times dwells upon the importance of this invention, and says: It has been fully tested; and the results have been highly satisfactory. Numerous public exhibitions have taken place in London and also upon the Thames to prove its power to the admiralty and shipping companies for the effectual protection of life and property on ships. The gas employed for extinguishing fire by means of these machines is carbonic gas with nitrogen, and steam, which rushes from the small machines with great force. The vapor is perfectly harmless to life, and enables parties to breathe in the densest smoke, not only extinguishing fire, but preserving life. We understand that a building is about to be erected at the north end of the town for the purpose of demonstrating the efficacy of the Fire Annihilator Machine, for which Messrs. Mortons are the sole agents; and it is also intended to have a demonstration on the river if an old vessel can be had for the purpose.

Remedy for Plum Knots.—The old-fashioned remedy, "to cut and keep cutting," still proves infallible. Unfortunately it is very rarely applied, even by those who think they have given it a fair trial. Perhaps the disease has been permitted to advance for two or three months before it has even excited attention. The knife is then made use of, and a single operation is regarded as enough. No wonder that a remedy, applied in such a burlesque manner, should be considered inefficient. We observe that the application of copperas water to the wounds made by the excision of the knots on the larger branches, is spoken of highly by different cultivators.

Father Mathew, the devoted apostle of Temperance, has administered the total abstinence pledge to six thousand persons in Buffalo. Since his arrival in the United States upward of five hundred thousand persons have taken the pledge at his hands.

Horrible Accident.—The Pittsburg Gazette says that a terrible accident occurred near Turtle Creek, about one o'clock on Friday last. A number of persons on their way home from a party, were compelled to pass a precipice about two miles from the place where the party was held. The night was very dark, but most of those who were in the company knew the way. The foremost couple soon began to fear that those behind them had wandered off the path, and called to them to take care. They replied, however, that they knew their road. At that very instant a cry of horror was heard, succeeded by a crash, as of some heavy bodies having fallen from a great distance to the ground; deep groans followed, and all was still. The terror-stricken party, though conjecturing the fearful nature of the accident which had happened to some of them, were unable to afford immediate assistance. A light was procured as soon as possible from the nearest farm house, and after descending to the bottom of the crag, it was found that a Mr. McElroy, and a young lady with whom he had been in company, lay at its foot. Mr. McElroy was perfectly dead, and his body was most horrible crushed. It would probably have been better for the young lady had she too shared his fate, for her back and legs were broken. She had, besides, been otherwise severely injured, so that it was a matter of surprise to all how she escaped instant death. No hopes of her recovery are entertained.

A Slave Whipped to Death.—The Winchester Virginian gives the following particulars of a horrid affair in Clarke County, Va. on Wednesday week, which has excited great indignation in that section. The result of it was that Col. Jas. Castleman, and his son Stephen, were indicted on Monday, for having cruelly and unmercifully beaten two slaves the Wednesday previous (causing the death of one of them,) belonging to the former. They have been held to bail in the sum of $5,000 each.

The Winchester Republican says: From the evidence of the principal witness, a white lady, the negro was fastened up for punishment, by having his hands tied and a chain put round his neck, thrown over a beam, and locked, just leaving sufficient length for the unfortunate object to stand upon the ground. He was then whipped with the tongue-strap of a wagon, having a heavy buckle at the end, having been previously stripped, that the blows might be laid on the bare skin. After beating him in the most unprecedented manner, for some time, they left him bound in the situation described, for the purpose of whipping his companion. The occurrence took place about sunset. A son of Castleman deposed that, about 10 o'clock at night, his father came into his house, and announced that the negro was dead. He had been left in the standing position in which he was whipped and died in that way.

The Language of Young Ladies.—The Rev. A. Peabody, in an address before the Newburyport Female School, which has been published, enlarges upon the use of exaggerated, extravagant forms of speech—saying splendid for pretty, magnificent for handsome, horrid or horrible for unpleasant, immense for large, thousands or myriads for more than two. "Were I," he says, "to write down, for one day, the conversation of some young ladies of my acquaintance, and then to interpret it literally, it would imply that, within the compass of twelve or fourteen hours, they had met with more marvelous adventures and hairbreadth escapes, had passed through more distressing experiences, had seen more imposing spectacles, had endured more fright, had enjoyed more rapture, than would suffice for a dozen common lives."

Variety.

A new method of ballasting vessels for a voyage without cargo, has lately been brought out, which, it is thought, will be found exceedingly convenient, as well as economical. The system is a tier of water-proof bags along each side of the keel inside, and one or two forward and aft. These are filled with water, which can be easily pumped out again. There can be very little loss of time, either in receiving or discharging such ballast, and there is no expense in getting it in.

Some interest has been excited in Pittsburg by the performance of a Mr. McCormick, who walks, head downwards, on (or rather under) a slab of polished marble, to which his feet attach themselves, as he asserts, by atmospheric pressure. He made some six or seven steps, the slab being only nine feet long. This experiment is said to be the result of many years' research and labor, and involving philosophical principles.

A capital of but little less than $2,000,000 is used in the various branches of the salt manufacture at Syracuse, N. Y., and the product of the springs has increased from 154,071 bushels in 1805, to 4,268,919 bushels in 1850. There are 10,000 vats employed for coarse or solar salt, and 10,000 kettles for fine salt, producing 100,000 bushels per week, with a consumption of 120,000 cords of wood annually. Nearly a million of barrels are used every season for packing salt.

Sheep raising in Wisconsin is represented to be realizing the most sanguine expectations of the farmers, the climate being remarkably favorable and the country furnishing abundance of feed. The expense of rearing the animal is said to be merely nominal, and the natural increase of the flock is at the rate of fifty per cent. per year. The same facts are applicable with equal truth to Iowa.

A pension of £200 a year on the civil list has been conferred upon Mr. Silk Buckingham, who has contributed much to literature, especially by his useful records of travel. A pension of £200 a year has also been given to Colonel Torrens, the author of several works on Political Economy. Mrs. Jamieson, the authoress of "Characteristics of Woman," "The Female Characters of Shakespear's Plays," &c., has also received a pension on the civil list of £100 a year.

Rocks that are to be hauled to a distance should be put in piles before winter and lie there till the warm sun of February has thawed the snow from the heaps. Then they are handled without mittens, and the team will draw on the snow four times as many as on the bare ground. There is generally a right time to do this work, and the sagacious farmer will find it.

Central Railroad of New Jersey.

Summer Arrangements, commencing Monday, March 31, 1851.

THIS Road extends from ELIZABETHPORT, 35 miles, to WHITE HOUSE, N J, reducing the staging between the terminus of the Road and EASTON to 25 miles.

This line leaves New York by steamboat Red Jacket from pier No 1 North River, and connects with trains on the New Jersey Railroad, which leaves New York from foot of Cortland-st.

TRINS UP—Leavo New York by steamboat Red Jacket, pier No 1 North River, at 9 A M, passenger; 1 P M, freight; and 5 P M, passenger; and by N J Railroad, foot of Cortland-st, at 9 A M, and 2 and 5½ P M.

Trains leave White House and following places for New York as follows:

White House at 3¾ A M, freight; 5 40 A M, passenger, at 1 40 P M.

Somerville at 4 30 A M, freight; at 6 05 A M, passenger, at 2 05 P M.

Bound Brook at 4 50 A M, freight; at 6 15 A M, passenger, at 2 15 P M.

Plainfield at 5 20 A M, freight; at 6 35 A M, passenger, at 2 35 P M.

Westfield at 5 50 A M, freight; at 6 50 A M, passenger, at 2 50 P M.

Elizabethtown at 7 15 A M; freight at 10 30 A M; passenger at 3 15 P M.

Elizabethport at 7 30 A M; freight at 10 45 A M; passenger at 3 30 P M.

On Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, trains leave Somerville for Pespack, Lesser Cross-Roads, and Pluckamin.

STAGES will be in readiness on the arrival of the 9 A M train from New York at the White House to convey passengers to Easton, Wilkesbarre, Bethlehem, Allentown, and Mauch Chunk, Penn, and to Clinton, Flemington, Lebanon, Milford, and Belvidere, N J.

N B—All BAGGAGE at the risk of the owners until delivered into the actual possession of the Agents of the Company and checks or receipts given therefor.

Milton Academy.

Monochromatic Painting,	2 00
Water-Color Painting,	3 00
Drawing,	1 00

Board can be obtained in private families from $1 00 to $1 50 per week. Rooms can be obtained, by those wishing to board themselves, at a reasonable expense.

Remarks.

All the English branches usually taught in our Eastern Academies, together with the Classics, and the Modern Languages, (French, German, and Italian,) will be taught in this Institution. The mode of instruction will be in accordance with the latest and most popular method adopted in our best Eastern Institutions, aiming, primarily, at a thorough and practical qualification of School Teachers, and preparing students for an advanced standing in a College course.

Weekly meetings are held in the village by three different evangelical denominations, either of which students can attend.

The plan of instruction and government of this Institution will aim at a harmonious development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of students, in a manner to render them thorough scholars, and practical, useful citizens; and the public may feel assured that no exertion shall be wanting on the part of the teachers and proprietors of the school to render it worthy of patronage and confidence. au14 4t

THE EMPIRE OF JAPAN.

Memorials of the Empire of Japan. Edited, with Notes, by THOMAS RUNDALL. Printed for the Hakluyt Society.

This is one of the most valuable publications of the Hakluyt Society. It contains an account of all that is accurately known of one of the greatest, and altogether the most singular empire that has ever existed. Although the people of Japan form a large portion of the population of the globe, in so far as concerns intercourse with the rest of mankind, they are little more than if they were the inhabitants of another planet. Two nations only, the Dutch and the Chinese, are permitted a limited access to their shores; and for themselves to quit them is by law a capital offense. This isolation has now been persevered in for two whole centuries. For any authentic information respecting Japan, we have to refer to ancient writers, the best of whom is a century and a half old, which is pretty nearly the same thing as if we were obliged to draw our knowledge of India from Jao de Barros, or of the Phillipines from Pigafetta. The present volume consists of a description of Japan from the Harleian MSS., as old as the time of Elizabeth, most graphic and faithful; six letters of William Adams, a most original character; and a most judicious preface, appendix, and annotations by the editor.

The Japanese empire consists of one very large island, and three of considerable size, containing between them an area of about twice the extent of Great Britain, with many small isles, so that the natives say the whole group numbers 1,000, which means, however, no more than that they are almost innumerable. "Japonia," says the old annonymous writer whose account of Japan is contained in the volume before us, "may be said to be, as it were, a bodye of many and sundry Ilandes, of all sorts of bignesse; which Iles, as they are separated in situation from the rest of the whole worlde, so are they, in like manner, inhabited of people, most different from all others, both for manners and customs."

The Japanese islands lie between the same north and south latitudes as Spain and Italy, but come within the limits infested by the violent and dangerous hurricanes of the China Sea. The land is mountainous, abounds in volcanoes, and is very subject to earthquakes. "In these Iles," says the same writer we have quoted, "The summer is very hot and burnynge, and the winter extreme coulde. Yet is the climate temperate and healthie; not much pestred with infectious or abnoxious ayres; but very subject to fierce windes, tempestuous stormes, and terrible earthquakes, insomuch that both ships in the harbour have been oversete, and driven ashore by the furie of the one, and houses on the land disjoynted and shaken to pieces by the fearful trembling of the other."

Many of the low valleys are eminently fertile, and those fertile portions are very populous. Of the total population of the empire, no account has ever been rendered by any European writer, although a yearly census appears to be taken by the government. If as densely peopled as China, it ought to amount to 37,000,000. As, however, the civil polity of Japan, and the industry and ingenuity arising from it, are greatly below those of China, while the fertility of its territory is much inferior, so large a number is not likely; and perhaps if we take the average density of its population at 150 to the square mile, which would give a population of 24,000,000, we shall be nearer the mark. The population accumulated in some of the cities appears to be very great. Our early writers give that of two or three of them as being equal to that of the London of the reign of James I; and Kœmpfer, in 1690, gave the actual census of Miaco, the ecclesiastical capital, at 529,726, of which 52,169 were priests, being nearly ten in a hundred of the whole—a proportion of sturdy beggars, for they live on charity, which would certainly not be found among the more civilized and industrous Chinese.

The most favorite exercise of Japanese skill and industry is exhibited in the cultivation of the soil, and chiefly in the shape of drainage, embanking, and irrigation. The grains and fruits cultivated are, generally, the same as those of temperate Europe. The first consist of barley, the common food of cattle, of wheat, in very little estimation, and of rice, which is the chief food of the people, with several pulses. Rye and oats are unknown, nor do we find any mention made of maize. Tobacco seems to have been introduced by Europeans in the beginning of the seventeenth century; and the reigning Emperor of Japan, like his cotemporary of India, published edicts against its use, in the same spirit wherein the cotemporary of both, our James the First, blew his celebrated counterblast. The harmless weed has survived by more than two centuries the three silly monarchs, and brings into the treasury of the successor of one of them the sum of £5,000,000 annully. The cotton plant is extensively cultivated in the southern provinces, and the tea-shrub is also largely cultivated, but in a careless and slovenly manner, so as to yield a produce, very inferior in all respects, to that of China. The domesticated animals of the Japanese are the ox, the buffalo, the horse, the hog, the common fowl, and the duck. The three last only are used for food, and the horse is confined to the saddle.

Two centuries' experience attests that the Japanese can live, or, at least, are content to live, without foreign trade. When they did possess it, the foreign commodities which found a market with them were ivory, sapan-wood, pepper, cloves, steel, lead cannon, silk and cotton goods of India, and English broad cloth. The market for all these was very limited; but it appears to us very clearly, for no other reason than that they were offered at enormous prices, which disabled the purchasers from buying. Thus, the price of pig-lead, which is now in our market worth no more than £17 a ton, is complained of as ruinously low at £27, whereas pepper is thought not remunerating under a shilling a pound, while in the London market, after being conveyed four times as far as Japan is from the source of production, it is, just now, sold for one-fourth part of that price.

The staple articles exported from Japan by the Portuguese, Spaniards, and Dutch, were copper, gold and silver. In the beginning of their trade the Dutch, it appears, exported annually, on the average of thirty years, £500,000 worth of gold, and £450,000 worth of silver, while in a single year, of the two precious metals together, the amount was no less than £1,150,000. But the Japenese entertain the same horror of losing their wealth by the abstraction of the precious metals which the Chinese do, and which we ourselves, under the influence of a ridiculous theory, did a very few years ago. Copper of very fine quality, cast in little ingots, much resembling in form, and somewhat in color also, sticks of red-sealing wax, is the only staple article now allowed to be exported by the Dutch or Chinese. The former had, at one time, exported it to the extent of from 300 to 400 tuns a year. The metals which abound in the Japanese empire are gold, silver, copper, iron, and tin. Of the latter, old William Adams, to whom we shall presently refer, says, "Tin is as good and as cheap heer as in Ingland." Among the articles which may possibly be exported from Japan, in the event of a fair trade being ever established with it, is cotton, wool, and possibly also hemp, and some other textile materials.

European nations have never made so contemptible an exhibition on any foreign theater of adventure as Japan. Instead of being met here, as in the countries between the tropics, by timid populations, or as in North America. by savages who retired before them like the wild beasts of the forest, they were encountered by a resolute and tolerably civilized people, with the inclination and means to resist. The Portuguese were the first European people that arrived in Japan, forty-four years after crossing the Cape of Good Hope. The Spaniards soon followed, and both were received by the Japanese, seemingly a volatile people, and fond of novelties, as Cæsar said of the Gauls, with open arms. They were allowed to propagate their religion without impediment and restraint. The fact is, the Japanese government was utterly indifferent to religious doctrines, rites, or practices, as long as religion forebore to meddle in affairs of state, and did not endanger the public tranquility, and its own existence. No less a person than the Governor-General of the Phillipines, who had been shipwrecked in Japan, on his return to Spain, tells the following anecdote, highly illustrative of the ordinary toleration of the Japanese government in matters of religion:—

"There was no less than thirty-five different sects of religion in Japan. Some deny the immortality of the soul, others acknowledge various gods, and others adore the elements. All are tolerated. The bonzes of all the sects having concurred in a request to the Emperor that he would expel our monks from Japan, the prince, troubled with their importunities, inquired how many different religions there were in Japan? 'Thirty-five,' was the reply. 'Well,' said he, 'where thirty-five sects can be tolerated, we can easily bear with thirty-six; let the strangers remain in peace.'"

For nearly fifty years the Portuguese and Spaniards propagated Christianity with a success unknown in any part of the East; but in 1587, we find the first symptoms of displeasure expressed by the most able, enlightened, and tolerant of the sovereigns of Japan, Taico Sama, who dispatched in rapid succession two commissioners to the Vice-Provincial of the Portuguese, demanding an explanation and answer to the following five demands:—

"1. Why he and his associates forced their creed on the subjects of the empire? 2. Why they incited their disciples to destroy the national temples? 3. Why they persecuted the bonzes, (native priests of Buddha)? 4. Why they, and the rest of their nation, used for food animals useful for man, such as oxen and cows? Finally, why they permitted the merchants of their nation to traffic in his subjects, and carry them away as slaves to the Indies?"

It is certain, from the nature of these charges, that the Christian priests had been insolent, overbearing, and refractory, and that their conduct was already deemed dangerous. It may be remarked that at the moment when this was passing in Japan, both the Spaniards and Portuguese were under the rule of the most bigoted, intolerant, and persecuting of European sovereigns, Philip II. One charge alone of the Japanese monarch wears a somewhat ludicrous and trivial aspect, especially to an Englishman—the using of the flesh of oxen and cows for food, or, in other words, "the eating of beef;" yet it cannot be denied that the prohibition to slay kine is maintained on more rational grounds by the Japanese than by the Hindoos. The answer of the vice-provincial was not very satisfactory. He admits the destruction of the heathen temples, but pleads that the missionaries could not control the holy zeal of the native converts. He admits the carrying off to foreign lands, into slavery, the subjects of the emperor; but pleads that this was the work of the Spanish and Portuguese traders, and not of the priests. Still the Christian priests and their converts were treated with comparative moderation, yet strictly watched. The Portuguese Governor of Goa remonstated by letter, and the Spanish Governor of the Phillipines sent envoys to Japan for the same purpose. In conversation with these envoys the emperor justified the proceeding he had adopted in regard to the fathers, stating that the priests from Europe had traversed the country accompanied by large bands of disorderly persons, to the destruction of peace and good order, and in violation of the law; that they had endeavored to seduce his subjects from their allegiance; and that they made no secret of their design to effect the conquest of the country, as had been the case in the Phillipines. The emperor then made the following pertinent observation: "Conceive yourself in my position, the ruler of a great empire; and suppose certain of my subjects should find their way into your possessions, on the pretence of teaching the doctrines of Dsin. If you should discover their assumed zeal in the cause of religion to be a mere mask for ambitious projects; that their real object was to make themselves masters of your dominions, would you not treat them as traitors to the state? I hold the fathers to be traitors to my state; and as such do I treat them.

For fifty years more, with partial persecutions and restraints, Christianity was allowed to be propagated in Japan; but, eventually, under the successor of Taico Sama, a most direful persecution of the Christians commenced, and in 1637 came the end. In the words of Kœmfer, "Japan was shut up." All European residents, with the exception of the Dutch, were expelled; a price was set on Christians generally, and on priests in particularly; the promulgation of Christianity was prohibited; and all natives, if they quitted the country, were prohibited from returning on pain of death. It is very certain that the Christians were persecuted, not as religionists, but as rebels. The jealousies of the Portuguese and Spaniards towards each other contributed to the overthrow of both; and the Dutch, who had at this time, been near thirty years in the country, had a good opportunity, and availed themselves of it, to punish their old persecutors in Europe.

The Dutch arrived in Japan about the year 1600, and there they have continued ever since; their trade reduced, from time to time, from unlimited shipping and capital to two ships, and a capital of £72,000 a year; while, from being allowed to range over the whole empire, they are now imprisoned in a little barricaded islet of about 1,600 feet in length and the same in breadth. Their first factory was at Firando, and from thence they were removed to their present virtual imprisonment at Nangaski. The Japanese government, at the time of their removal, was evidently alarmed at the position of the Dutch, although probably without any good reason. The emperor, therefore, sent a commissioner to Firando, who required them to attend before him. His lecture is a curiosity worth quoting. After comparing the creeds of the Portuguese and Dutch, he pronounced them to be essentially the same, and then proceeded as follows:—

"In former times it was well known to us, that you both served Christ, but on account of the bitter enmity you ever bore each other, we imagined there were two Christs. Now, however, the emperor is assured to the contrary. Now he knows you both serve one and the same Christ. From any indication of serving him you must for the future forbear. Moreover, on certain buildings you have newly erected, there is a date carved, which is reckoned from the birth of Christ. These buildings you must raze to the ground presently."

[Conclusion next week.

AN IMPRESSIVE SCENE.

Horace Greeley wrote his last letter from Rome, just after he had visited that stupendous ruin the Coliseum—which in ancient times was the amphitheater, where so many bloody gladiatorial combats took place. It was large enough to accommodate one hundred thousand persons, covering a circuit of over sixteen hundred feet, and having an arena of three hundred and eighty by two hundred and eighty feet. Mr. Greeley relates the following incident:—

We were fortunate in the hour of our visit. As we slowly made the circuit of the edifice a body of French cavalry were exercising their horses along the eastern side of it, while at a little distance, in the grove or garden at the south, the quick rattle of the drum told of the evolutions of infantry. At length, the horsemen rode slowly away to the southward, and our attention was drawn to certain groups of Italians in the interior, who were slowly marching and chanting. We entered, and were witnesses of a strange, impressive ceremony. It is among the traditions of Rome that a great number of the early Christians were compelled by their heathen persecutors to fight and die here as gladiators as a punishment for their contumacious, treasonable resistance to the 'lower law' then in the ascendant, which the high priests and circuit judges of that day were wont in their sermons and charges to demonstrate that every one was bound as a law-abiding citizen to obey, no matter what might be his private, personal convictions with regard to it. Since the Coliseum has been cleared of rubbish, fourteen little oratories or places of prayer have been cheaply constructed around its inner circumference, and here at certain seasons prayers are offered for the eternal bliss of the martyred Christians of the Coliseum. These prayers were being offered on this occasion. Some twenty or thirty men, (priests or monks, I inferred,) partly bareheaded, but as many with their heads completely covered by hooded cloaks which left only two small holes for the eyes, accompanied by a large number of women, marched slowly and sadly to one oratory, chanting a prayer by the way, setting up their lighted tapers by its semblance of an altar, kneeling and praying for some minutes, then rising and proceeding to the next oratory, and so on until they had repeated the service before every one. They all seemed to be of the poorer class, and I presume the ceremony is often repeated or the participators would have been more numerous. The praying was fervent and I trust excellent—as the music decidedly was not; but the whole scene, with the setting sun shining redly through the shattered arches and upon the ruined wall, with a few French soldiers standing heedlessly by, was strangely picturesque, and to me affecting. I came away before it concluded, to avoid the damp night air; but many chequered years and scenes of stirring interest must intervene to efface from my memory that sunset and those strange prayers in the Coliseum.

HEAVEN.

BY MRS. SOUTHEY.

Oh! talk to me of heaven! I love
To hear about my home above;
For there doth many a loved one dwell
In light and joy ineffable.
Oh! tell me how they shine and sing,
While every harp rings echoing;
And every glad and tearless eye
Beams like the bright sun, gloriously.
Tell me of that victorious palm
Each hand in glory beareth;
Tell me of that celestial calm
Each face in glory weareth.

Oh, happy, happy country! where
There entereth not a sin;
And death, who keeps its portals fair,
May never once come in.
No grief can change their day to night—
The darkness of that land is light.
Sorrow and sighing God has sent
Far thence to endless banishment.
And never more may one dark tear
Bedim their burning eyes;
For every one they shed while here,
In fearful agonies,
Glitters a bright and dazzling gem,
In their immortal diadem.

Oh, lovely, blooming country! there
Flourishes all that we deem fair,
And though no fields nor forests green,
Nor bowery gardens there are seen,
Nor perfumes load the breeze,
Nor hears the ear material sound,
Yet joys at God's right hand are found—
The archetypes of these.
There is the home, the land of birth
Of all we highest prize on earth;
The storms that rack the world beneath,
Must their for ever cease;
The only air the blessed breathe
Is purity and peace.

Oh, happy, happy land! in thee
Shines the unveiled Divinity,
Shedding through each adoring breast
A holy calm, a halcyon rest.
And those blessed souls whom death did sever,
Have met to mingle joys for ever.
Oh! soon may heaven unclose to me!
Oh! may I soon that glory see!
And my faint, weary spirit, stand
Within that happy, happy land!

ELISHA'S STAFF—2 KINGS IV. 29

The following morsel of Biblical Criticism is taken from Kitto's Daily Bible Illustrations, a work of rare value, full of ingenious and thoughtful suggestions on the sacred narrative:—

A friend, since deceased, once told us that he never was able to find in any commentary, or to obtain from any minister whom he had consulted, an explanation that he could regard as satisfactory, of Elisha's view in sending his staff to be laid upon the face of the dead son of the friendly Shunamite. As the prophet went himself, why send his staff before? and as no effect resulted from the operation, what was his view—apparently a mistaken one—in sending it at all? Attention being thus drawn to what seemed a matter not likely to have been overlooked by any commentator, we turned over a good many volumes of all sizes, and ascertained with some surprise that our friend's information was correct. There is a dead silence on this point; and even Krummacher, who has written a whole volume on a part of the history of Elisha, has passed this over, though he as well as others do suggest reasons for the failure of the experiment.

Elisha evidently sent his staff by his servant with the expectation that it would be effectual to raise the dead. This was great faith in him; faith as strong as any that his great master exemplified—almost; for Elijah was the first to conceive the great thought that even the raising of the dead was not a thing too great for faith to ask. Elisha had that for a precedent; but he was the first to think that even his presence was not needful to this effect—that his faith might act thus mightily even at a distance, by the mere instrumentality of his staff, indicate the power and influence from which it came. But why his Staff in particular? One might think that the mantle of Elijah would more readily have occurred to his mind in connection with such a purpose and such ideas. We should ourselves at once have understood that. It would have been a most intelligible sign.

Now, it may be possible to explain both why he did not send the mantle, and why he did send the staff. As to the former point, little explanation is needed; for, bearing in mind what has been already stated in regard to the value and importance of the prophetic mantle, every one can feel that he would not himself like to trust it out of his own possession; and, in point of fact, the eastern inheritors of saintly mantles never do let them go out of their immediate charge on any account whatever, scarcely, indeed, will allow them to be separated from their persons. They even sleep in them.

To see why he did send his staff, we must consider that the prophetic staff was probably of some particular shape or material, which indicated the authority and function of the person who bore it—being to him, in his degree, what a sceptre was to a king. In fact ancient sceptres, as symbols of power, were only rods or staves. So, in Ezekiel xix. 11, we read of "strong rods for the secptres of those that bare rule." Now, the authority of the owner of such an official or symbolical staff was, and even to this day is, considered to be as effectually delegated, for any occasion, to the person to whom it is entrusted, as it would be by a signet ring. Thus, when Captains Irby and Mangles left an Arab camp to proceed to Shobek, the sheikh Abu Rashid sent on with them an Arab bearing his own mace, to ensure for them the same reception as if he had himself been in their company.

In connection with this matter, we cannot fail to recollect the rod of Moses, which was the instrument of all his numerous miracles in Egypt, and in the wilderness, and which he was on all occasions enjoined to use. We remember also that the chiefs of the tribes had staves or rods as the symbol of their authority; and that the budding of Aaron's rod, when laid up with theirs, became the sign of the peculiar powers with which he was invested. This rod was preserved for a standing memorial in the tabernacle. Even the magicians of Egypt had rods like that of Moses, which they used in the same manner, as signs of the thaumaturgic power with which they claimed to be endowed.

In India the orou-mulle-primadu (i. e., cane with one knot) is believed to possess miraculous powers, whether in the hands of a magician or of a private person. It is about the size of the middle finger, and must have only one knot in its whole length. Mr. Roberts, in his 'Oriental Illustration,' produces the following native declarations on the subject:—"A man bitten with a serpant will be assuredly cured, if the cane or rod be placed upon him: nay, should he be dead, it will restore him to life. 'Yes, sir, the man who has such a stick need neither fear serpents nor evil spirits.'" Mr Roberts adds, "A native gentleman, known to me, has the staff of his umbrella made of one of these rods, and great satisfaction and comfort he has in this, his constant companion. 'The sun cannot smite him by day, neither the moon by night; the serpents and wild beasts move off swiftly; and the evil spirits dare not come near to him.'"

Various reasons have been offered to explain why the application of the staff to the dead child did not produce the effect intended by the prophet. Some suppose that the fault was in the servant Gehazi, who either did not follow the particular directions given him by his master, or lacked the proper faith, or was under the influence of wrong motives and feelings. All this is, however, purely conjectural, and has no foundation whatever in the sacred narrative. Others imagine that Elisha himself was not free from presumption in supposing that his staff alone would be a sufficient instrument for so great a miracle, even without his presence; and that for this reason his call upon the Lord was not in this form answered. Finally, some lay the failure upon the mother's manifest want of faith in any result to be produced by the staff. To us the fact appears to be clearly this: Elisha did not at first mean to go himself to Shunem, and for that reason sent his staff to supply the lack of his own presence. If it had then intended to go himself, there would have been no need of his sending his staff beforehand; and his haste to do so might have suggested to the ungodly a detraction of the miracle, in the supposition that he apprehended the child would be too dead, before he came himself, to be revived at all.

But after he hand sent away the servant, his observations of the uneasiness of the mother—whom he now expected to go home satisfied, and her avowed determination not to leave him—which was a polite way of pressing him to go in person, induced him to alter his purpose, and, with the kindness natural to him, to forego his own engagements at Carmel in order to satisfy her wishes by accompanying her to her forlorn home. It was probably in consequence of this change of plan that no response was made to the first claim of faith by means of the staff. That appeal was in fact superseded the moment he resolved to go in person—the Lord thus reserving for the personal intercession of his prophet the honor of this marvelous deed.

THE GREAT CEMETERY.

The sea is the largest of cemeteries, and its slumberers sleep without a monument. All other grave-yards, in all other lands, show some symbol of distinction between the great and the small, the rich and the poor; but in that ocean cementary, the king and the clown, the prince and the peasant, are alike undistinguished. The same wave rolls over all—the same requiem by the minstrelsy of the ocean is sung to their honor. Over their remains the same storm beats, and the same sun shines; and there, unmarked, the weak and the powerful, the plumed and the unhonored, will sleep on until awakened by the same trump when the sea will give up its dead. I thought of sailing over the slumbering but devoted Cookman, who, after his brief but brilliant career, perished in the President—over the laughter-loving Power, who went down in the same ill-fated vessel we may have passed. In that cemetery sleeps the accomplished and pious Fisher; but where he and thousands of others of the noble spirits of the earth lie, no one but God knoweth. No marble rises to point out where their ashes are gathered, or where the lover of the good or wise can go and shed the tear of sympathy. Who can tell where lie the tens of thousands of Africa's sons who pershed in the "middle passage?" Yet that cemetery hath ornaments of Jehovah. [Never can I forget my days and nights as I passed over the noblest of cemeteries without a single human moument.

IGNORANCE AND PRESUMPTION.

Mere ignorance is not deserving of rebuke. No wise man will sneer at one who is less informed than himself, no good man will despise the unlearned. An honest, well-meaning person will not even be pitied for his ignorance, so that the expression of pity will give him pain. Many a man who cannot read or write, or who cannot spell correctly, may be a sound and original thinker whose views are worthy of high consideration. The most learned philosopher may receive from such a man hints of important truth and lessons of practical wisdom. But when an ignorant person grows dogmatic, prates of his superior wisdom, and sneers at the views of those who have bestowed some care and thought upon plans or measures that he would urge, then the exposure of his ignorance may have a salutary effect. When such a person denounces others as behind 'this enlightened age,' then the measure of his common-school education may help to determine the weight of his opinion and influence.

It is a common mistake that great reforms have been achieved mainly by uneducated men. This is not so. Some of the apostles, it is true, were men of that stamp, but these were aided by inspiration; moreover Paul—who was employed to develop the Christian faith—had the highest Jewish culture, and was not ignorant of Greek poetry and philosophy. Luther, Calvin, and their fellow reformers of the sixteenth century, though some of them were of humble origin, were not ignorant men. Not a few of them were men of the most liberal education for that age. The leaders in the Puritan movement were men of whom the universities of Britain might well be proud. There is after all a connection between even the art of spelling and the work of a reformer in church and state. [Independent.

REMARKABLE PROVIDENCE.

A Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, alluding to the lamented death of Rev. Dr. Duncan, of Baltimore, says:—

The recent decease of Rev. John M. Duncan, in your city, revives the relation of an interesting incident in his early life. On her passage from Ireland, the vessel in which young John and his family were passengers was cast away. For some time all on board were threatened with death by famine. At length, lots were cast for human victim to appease the pangs of hunger. The lot fell upon the venerable grandmother of that noble boy—Mrs. Margaret Duncan. Unwilling to resort to such a horrid remedy, the ship's company resolved to postpone the dreadful death for a few hours. The hopeless period again arrived, when lots were again cast for a sacrifice of life; again the lot fell on the same lady. By common consent, another respite was granted, and by perfect agreement a third time, the same ordeal was to be passed.—Stange to tell—the third time that aged lady was doomed to die. A brief space of time being allowed for preparation, the pious woman, perfectly resigned to her fate, made one vow unto the Lord, that if he would avert the pending blow, and in mercy save the ship's company, she would consecrate herself more fully to his service—would, on their arrival at any port, erect a temple in honor of his name, and educate and qualify, so far as in her power, her grandson—John M. Duncan—for the minstery of the Gospel.

That prayer was probably heard; for as the lady appeared on the deck to render up her life, a voice from aloft announced the welcome tiding, "Sail O!" A vessel hove in sight—came to their relief, and in safety they all reached Philadelphia.

In that city, the venerated grandmother promptly performed her vow. She became a more devoted Christian; she erected the handsome church edifice which there bears her name to this day—and her grandson, educated and qualified for the sacred office, spent a long life of piety and usefulness, and then surrendered his happy spirit surrounded by numerous affectionate friends.

VOLTAIRE'S LAST WORDS.

Voltaire was fertile and elegant, his observations are very acute, yet he often betrays great ignorance when he treats on subjects of ancient learning. Madame de Talmond once said to him, "I think, sir, that a philosopher should never write, but with the endeavor to render mankind less wicked and unhappy than they are. Now you do quite the contrary; you are always writing against that religion which alone is able to restrain wickedness, and to afford us consolation under misfortunes." Voltaire was much struck, and excused himself by saying, that he only wrote for those who were of the same opinion as himself. Tronchin assured his friends that Voltaire died in great agonies of mind. "I die forsaken by gods and men," exclaimed he in those awful moments, when truth will force its way. "I wish," added Tronchin, "that those who had been perverted by his writings, had been present at his death; it was a sight too horrid to support." [Wm. Seward.

MAJ. NOAH'S CITY OF REFUGE.—A correspondent of the Rochester American, in a letter from Tonawanda, says:—

"It was here that Major M. M. Noah attempted to carry out his philanthropic purpose of founding a city of refuge for his scattered and persecuted brethren. A few rods from the river there stands a little brick tower, which is fast crumbling to ruin, erected by him more than a quarter of a century ago. In the eastern wall there is placed a stone with a Hebrew inscription and the following in English:

'ARARAT,
A CITY OF REFUGE FOR THE JEWS,
Founded by Mordecai Manuel Noah, in the month of Tizri 5586, September, 1825 and in the 55th year of American Independence.'

This is all that remains of Major Noah's benevolent enterprise for the amelioration of the bad condition of his unfortunate race. He, like his project, has found a tomb—and his people are still strangers among the nations of the earth."

A POOR WOMAN'S OFFERING.—The following anecdote was related a few years ago, by the Rev. W. S. Plumer, while addressing the Virginia Baptist Education Society:—

A poor woman had attended a missionary meeting a few years since. Her heart was moved with pity. She looked around upon her house and furniture to see what she could spare for the mission. She could think of nothing that would be of any use. At length she thought of her five children, three daughters and two sons. She entered her closet and consecrated them to the mission. Two of her daughters are now in heathen lands, and the other is preparing to go. Of her sons, one is on his way to India, and the other is preparing for the ministry, and seeking knowledge on the subject of a missionary life.

Goodness is a moral telescope, through which we discern wonderful creations in the distance of being; but depravity is a fog, which narrows and distorts our ordinary vision. The universe, with its transcendant perfection, and perpetual promise, is unveiled to the first; but walls of brass, doom-written, impenetrable, and ever-collapsing, enclose the last with darkness and with torment.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 18, 1851.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

These were held last week in Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y. As our readers will be on the lookout for some account of them, we hasten to spread before them a general view of what was done.

What we have generally had to complain of, has been a lack of interest, on the part of the community, in the business of the meetings. Judging, perhaps from the experience of former years, that the details of a missionary or tract society were but little more than an expose of finances, and other things equally uninteresting, the people of the neighborhood have staid at home, except at such times as were appointed for preaching. On Sabbath days the congregations have been large and overflowing; but on days of business the number in attendance has but little more than sufficed for a decent show of politeness to the strangers from abroad. Happily, our people are beginning to understand their interests better. They are beginning to see that an Annual Report of a benevolent society is not less entertaining than a sermon. They are beginning to see that the details of such a document, which has cost so much time and labor to prepare it, are frequently of thrilling interest. They can now listen to accounts of the doings of our missionaries among the heathen, or of the results of tract distribution, and feel their souls burn within them. And we speak advisedly, when we say that none have followed the business of our Anniversaries through, without feeling themselves abundantly recompensed for all the time and trouble it has cost them. We know that some, who went with cold hearts, have come away burning with zeal in these enterprises of benevolence; and that the general effect has been to stir up the community to greater activity in "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report."

On this occasion, we must say that our Brookfield friends did well. From the commencement, and throughout, the attendance was good. On Thursday, the day of our Missionary Society's anniversary, the house was filled. On the day following, the Publishing Society's proceedings were listened to by a respectable congregation. And on Sunday, a crowded and well-behaved audience manifested their deep interest in the doings of the Tract Society. On behalf of these societies we thank our friends for such kindness. And if the churches where we hold our convocations knew how encouraging it is to be greeted with full houses, and how perfectly chilling it is to see a meagre, skeleton-like assembly, they would, (for politeness' sake, if nothing else,) never give us cause of complaint in this respect.

The Missionary Society.

The proceedings of this body were opened with a discourse by Elder N. V. Hull, of Alfred, from 2 Cor. 5:14, 15. For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them, and rose again. The theme of the discourse was, The love of Christ the vital principle of the missionary enterprise. We took some notes, but they are not sufficient to enable us to present a faithful outline of the sermon. Suffice it to say, that it was well adapted to the occasion, and that an attentive audience manifested their satisfaction with the manner in which the subject was handled.

After the discourse, the chair was taken by the President, who in a few pertinent remarks welcomed the Society to its Ninth Anniversary. After some unimportant business the Annual Report of the Board, giving a condensed statement of the doings of the past year, was read by the Corresponding Secretary. From this document we learned, that the subscription for building a missionary chapel in China, which was partly filled before the Anniversary of the previous year had been entirely completed; that a lot had been secured in Shanghae; and that the building was probably in process of erection. It farther appeared that the receipts of the treasury for general purposes had been sufficient to meet all the ordinary expenses of the mission. The Report also noted the fact that a Seventh-day Baptist church of seven members had been organized in China, as the result of the labors of our missionaries there, and that two of the native members bid fair to become able expounders of the word, so that we may regard the mission as furnished with four preachers, instead of two, as heretofore. There was also a detailed account of the conversion of one of these men in an extract from a letter of Bro. Carpenter, which, together with a letter from the man himself, embodied in the Report, was deeply interesting. The interest of the Report was further enhanced by the refetence which it made to the progress of Scripture translation among the Protestant missionaries of China. But we have not room for anything like an abstract of this document. It will soon be published in pamphlet form, and we hope it will be read by every member of the denomination.

The adoption of the Report was moved by Bro. Thos. E. Babcock, who accompanied his motion with some well-chosen remarks. He wished and hoped that, before the formality of voting its adoption, the whole of its suggestions and plans might be thoroughly understood, so that we might feel that we were not merely passing a vote, but pledging ourselves to some decided action in the missionary cause. In the Board he had all confidence, and that confidence rested on their uniform and long-tried faithfulness. They had now in this Report a plain, unvarnished statement of what had been done; and what less can we do than adopt it? But he was particularly anxious that the doctrine pervading the document, that we ought to press forward in the work, should be impressed upon every heart. The length of time that had elapsed since the gospel was first preached, and the fewness of those who had received its blessed influences, showed that a zeal was needed to which we had not yet attained; a vigor of effort which we had not yet put forth. He acknowledged and welcomed the fact that progress had been made. Many now feel themselves interested in a greater degree than heretofore; still we are far behind the standard of Christian duty. The Commission requires us to go into all the world. Our experience since we commenced—the success which has attended us—proves that we can extend our operations. When we first started, many fears were entertained that we should not be able to carry out our plans. He believed, however, that instead of impoverishing us, our benevolent efforts had had a contrary effect. The last five years had shown more improvement in the pecuniary and social prosperity of the denomination, than any five years preceding.

Many other interesting remarks were made by Bro. B., and he was followed by Bro. Gillette, who remarked upon the several divisions of the Report at some length; but our notes are too meagre to furnish an outline of his address.

Bro. J. H. Cochran spoke of our duty to prosecute the Western mission, and of the circumstances encouraging us to do so. He considered it vitally important. Our well-being, our very life as a denomination, depended on it. If we leave the West uncared for, our cause must fail, and our missions be abandoned. Our Eastern churches are becoming thinned out by emigration; and those who go West go into fields far away from religious privileges, directed too often by avarice. They do wrong, no doubt. We cannot justify them. They ought not, by any means, to manifest such a preference of wordly advantage. But we are not only to tell them wherein they are in fault, but we are to seek after them. We are not to give them up for their fault. Like Jesus Christ, we are to labor for the restoration of those who are "ignorant and out of the way." Our churches at the East are becoming diminished, and they may become extinguished. It was necessary, therefore, to obtain a footing at the West. He considered the dangers to which a Western missionary was exposed even greater than those of a missionary to the heathen. He was under temptation to abandon his missionary work. He was tempted to seek after landed property and riches. A missionary to the West, more than one to China, needed to be a self-denying, self-consecrating man. Those who have gone forth from us have not been sufficiently exclusive in their consecration to the great work, of preaching the gospel. But we must not be discouraged. Let us prosecute the work, and that too with a sense of the responsibilities under which we lie. We must make a movement which shall be felt. What hope have we as a denomination, if we cannot make our influence felt there? For his own part, he saw signs of promise there, and he expected good results.

Bro. O. P. Hull followed Bro. Cochran, and narrated many interesting incidents which had transpired under his own observation. Some of these were quite amusing, and all went to show the importance of the West as a field of labor for our denomination. We would be glad to give his speech in full to the readers, but we have not our notes sufficiently plain even for an abstract.

Besides the addresses, all of which were interesting, a resolution was adopted contemplating an agency for the more effectual promotion of the cause of missions among our churches.

The Society is to hold its next Annual meeting in Plainfield, N. J., on the First-day of the week following the second Sabbath in September, 1852.

The Publishing Society.

The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society held its Second Anniversary on Sixth-day, Sept. 12—Eld. Nathan V. Hull, one of the Vice Presidents, occupying the chair.

After singing and prayer, the Report of the Treasurer was read; from which it appears that the receipts of the Society for the year ending June 12, 1851, were $3,185 60, while the expenses were $3,308 03, showing a balance against the treasury of $122 43. Payments for the Sabbath Recorder were not quite as prompt and general during the past year as in previous years, and hence the deficit in the treasury—a circumstance which, it is hoped, will not again occur. A statement of the liabilities and assets of the Society showed its financial affairs to be in a healthy condition.
